ANNO DOMINI

"Year of our Lord!" the flight of time
Takes on a meaning new, sublime,
When linked with Him who came to be
The Light of all eternity.

"Year of our Lord!" to walk with Him
As comrade, though one's faith be dim,
The vision still would clearly shine
And earth be filled with Light divine.

"Year of our Lord!" if it could be
His year in all reality,
Then would His Kingdom come with power
And life would blossom as a flower.

"Year of our Lord!" each passing day
Would see life's evils brought to bay.
Men would be cast in finer mould
And common earth be turned to gold.

"Year of our Lord!" why is it then,
That He who died for love of men
Must watch the centuries go by
And see the world in darkness lie?

"Year of our Lord!" we must arise
To do the best that in us lies,
And for our past neglect atone
By making all the years His own.

—Frederick W. Neve.

He waits serene till we awake and see
His vision of earth as it would be
If He could always count on you and me.

TIDEWATER TALES

A book into which is gathered the folklore, traditions and history of Tidewater Virginia. Written in a delightful informal style by Prof. William C. Garnett.

The President of a College in South Carolina writes: "I have never read a work of this kind the style of which I have found more attractive, simple and yet elegant, interesting, but never monotonous."

A prominent attorney in Washington writes: ". . . the charming description of the old homes, the history and traditions, and the true-to-life stories in local color, combined to delight me."

"Turn This Way."

It is said of Miss Reside, the first woman missionary to Kiowa Indians of Oklahoma, that after she had been with the Indians long enough for them to know what it meant to be a Christian, they gave her a new name. They called her Aim-day-co. Chief Bigtree, in explaining this name, said, "When we Kiowas see any one on the wrong road we call out, 'Aim-day co'! ('Turn this way'.) Our sister came to us from a far land, and found us all on the wrong road and in great danger. She stood in a new road and called to us and said, 'Turn this way', and showed us the Jesus road. God bless Aim-day-co."—Selected.

THE LESSON ROUND-TABLE

In this new-idea International Uniform Lesson Commentary "the most eminent authorities in the country" discuss the 1930 lessons. "It is something finer than we have ever had heretofore," and is equally suitable for the teacher or pupil in the Sunday School, or for home study in every Christian home.

359 pages, $1.25

"The Lesson Round-Table" enriches class study periods and the home reading of Christian families.
The lessons for 1930 are particularly interesting; the study of the Gospel of the Kingdom as recorded by Matthew (first half of the year), the Representative Men and Women of the Old Testament (third quarter) and the Representative Men and Women of the New Testament (fourth quarter).
Every problem of the earnest Christian and the consecrated teacher has been studied by each leader in "The Lesson Round-Table," and some solution, built on actual experience, is offered.
The lesson writers include: John Timothy Stone, Ira Landrith, Peter Ainslie, Bishop McConnell, G. Walter Fiske and other Christian leaders.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

"Some can go, most can give, all can pray. But they don't!" says Captain Mountford.

One taper lights a thousand, yet doth beam no dimmer, giving all, but losing naught. Great fires are kindled by a single spark. Let my poor taper lighten some whose glow shall bless the world.
—Clipped.

Oh! be thou swift my soul to hear
The silent messenger within;
Close out the desecrating din,
And shun the babblers lingering near.
Open thine eyes and round thee view
In lives of men what God hath done,
The measure of the triumph won
In ages old as in the new.

Simplicity and purity are the two great elements of a happy life. Simplicity teaches us to seek not high things, but to condescend to men of low estate. Through purity of heart we see the hand of God in the circumstances of our lot, and in the merest details of life. Thus we are enabled to say, "All things are of God."—W. Shaw.

It is a gracious and blessed Saviour we have; He delights in our being near Him, and soon will have us so forever, and like Him, too. May He make you more and more like Him daily! Oh, cultivate intimacy with Him; it keeps the conscience alive and the heart happy. —J. N. Darby, in the Keswick Calendar.

Better a scar to show the arrow came,
Than to go through life unscathed by any mark;
Better the ashes eloquent of flame
Than to have the spirit's hearth forever dark.
Better to lose than miss the chance of gain,
Better a broken than a rusted knife!
Better to know love, even as a pain,
Than meeting death, all unaware of life.
—Elinor Lennen, in The Christian Century.

Whatever factor it is that makes men do good or unselfish work, let us by all means welcome and praise it. But I can only say still that I have found that faith in Jesus Christ as the Son of God makes men do that which nothing else will, and bear and suffer with equanimity that which nothing else would. —From "A Man's Faith."—By Sir Wilfred Grenfell of Labrador.

"When we come to the end of a perfect day" is fragment of a song nobody sings, a faintly sweet echo from the isles of the long ago—inhabited by old echoes, gradually dying—in the ceaselessly flowing river of time. The song was one of the ephemera of parlor piano and the vaudeville stage, but the line appealed with its pathos because in the general human memory there linger so few perfect days. Let any reader of this look back and try to recall the days of perfect peace and pleasure and whole-hearted happiness of a short or a long life. Frequently the tenderest and dearest of such recollections are saddened and clouded with mists of sorrows for losses and disappointments and disillusions coming after; but it is good for us to meditate on them, to feel that, whatever may have happened since, we knew and tasted and enjoyed the days, to understand what made them perfect. That lovely word, "meditate", comes from a Greek root suggesting the shepherd, alone and lonely, watching his flock, reclining in the field and breathing softly into lute or pipes his memories, hopes, dreams, fancies, and it fits exactly the mood in which we should summon from among the months and years gone by such perfect days as we have lived, to consider especially how much and how far our own thoughts, purposes, tempers, qualities, conduct, helped and brought the perfection and unmarred happiness.

Therein is useful and timely thought for the year just now beginning. The sunset of yesterday may have been gloriously beautiful, but it is gone and all we have of it is the memory that we did gladden our eyes with sight of it. Our real concern with life is not with what has been except to strive to learn from it what not to do, what to do and how to live and do and be in so many of the days to come as we may be permitted to see. The sun will rise and set again and the stillness and serenity and splendor of tinted clouds of the afterglow—like the closing of a well lived life—will enthrall all who have souls to answer and respond. It is for us, each responsible to God and to those with whom we are in contact, to determine how we shall use and do in the oncoming days, how meet the sunrise and the dawning and make for ourselves at the sunset and the darkening exultant pleasure in a perfect day, or dull indifference, moping and repining and regrets. How many of the days through which we may live in this coming year we will do our parts, faithfully and staunchly, to make perfect for ourselves and those more or less dependent on our regulation of ourselves will be for us to decide. It is for us to ask ourselves, very seriously and earnestly, how much of the happiness or unhappiness of the days past has been our own doing, how much of the beauty or bitterness to be planted in the days to come shall go from us; on how many or few of the days we may look back upon at the afterglow, the sunset time, as those we have done as we could to brighten and make perfect.

Let us analyze the minute by minute, hour by hour, occurrences of yesterday, the day before, today, and scan ourselves, our words and acts and intents. God Almighty, seeing and knowing all, knows that the same courage that carries the bravest soldier steadily forward in face of death and wins for him honors and adulation often is needed for us to judge and try ourselves, to put aside the vanities and smug self approvals and excuses behind which we cower, hiding ourselves from ourselves. All real courage is the triumph of the soul and conscience and divinity within us over the human, earthly craven instinct to shrink and hide from pain and danger. For most of us the sting of shame and contrition must come as we realize how little we deserve of God's mercy, how much opportunity for doing good we have neglected or fled from, how much evil we have done. Duty demands and valor invites acceptance and endurance of the sting.

These inner battles must be fought beyond knowledge of any but ourselves and the watching hosts of Heaven. As some of the most splendid martyrdoms are undergone without stake or scaffold or human observation or sympathy, so these struggles of ours are chronicled nowhere but in the eternal records. Results of our victories may reach further into the hereafter and yield blessings far wider and higher than the heralded and historic achievements of generals or kings. The final rewards, by comparison with which titles, fortunes, empires, of this life are empty baubles, await us; but some perfect days made here for ourselves and others create beauty and glory to abide and glow and strengthen and comfort.

We can try to make the perfect days by self-control, self-conquest, self-sacrifice, generous, devoted love, unflagging zeal to express in daily and hourly life the teachings of the life and death and words and acts of the Saviour and the will of the Heavenly Father. So trying, we may be gloriously surprised by the number of such days—perhaps more in this year of 1930 than in all the years before. Certainly there can be no ambition nobler, sweeter, more worthy of manhood or womanhood, than to make many perfect days to shine in memories of young and old and ourselves and not to be dimmed by time nor changes. The beginning of the year is a good time for beginning the battles with ourselves, the conquests in fruits of which our families, friends, associates, may share, the faithful striving to make many of the coming days perfect. The same stern, unyielding courage that inspires dauntless warriors to defy roaring cannon, crackling rifle fire, threatening bayonet, we can enlist for ourselves in the silent, unseen fights against subtle and destroying temptations of selfishness and sham and passion and temper. With it we can make darkening days bright, illuminate with splendor the clouds of brooding trouble and fear and anger, give sunshine and laughter and faith and hope instead of tears and dreads and sullen nursing of resentments and grievances. So endeavoring, we may be—surely will be if we continue faithful and brave—able to look back on a gleaming and happy succession of perfect days, felt and given; and at the afterglow see the Valley of the Shadow glow before us in unfading light, all clouds made beautiful and know that beyond are the approval of the Supreme Power, the victor's crown and glory and perfect days of which there shall be no ending.

"Live a moment at a time, and that moment for Christ. Think not of a holy life in its immensity, but think of a holy moment in its individuality, and remember a succession of holy moments constitutes a holy life."

Alfred B. Williams.

LUCIEN LEE KINSOLVING

AFTER nearly forty years of missionary service in one of the most remote jurisdictions of the American Church, after long journeying by land and water under varied conditions, the late Bishop of Southern Brazil was, on December 20, laid to rest in the cemetery of the Virginia Seminary, near Alexandria.

He was buried on the spot where, as a young man, with a rich and beckoning life before him, after a long night of struggle and prayer, he decided to go to Brazil as one of the two pioneer missionaries.

Fifty miles away, in the beautiful Loudoun hills, in the cruel days of the Civil War this man was born in a village rectory. His father was one of the strong men of the Virginia Church, strong in his Christian convictions, able and definite in his Church teaching, a wise and watchful shepherd of souls.

His mother, Lucy Lee Rogers, was a saint. She was well read, of great charm and marked social gifts, but her passion was the worship and service of her Lord. Before his birth, she gave him to the Saviour—and then she died, while her boy lived to crown her consecrated motherhood by an eloquent witness and an unselfish, chivalrous, stainless life.

As a youth everybody loved him. He made friends among all classes of people. His wise father let him go to teach school in the then dangerous mountains of Kentucky instead of to a nearby Virginia town, feeling that the rough discipline of that life would make a man of him. And it did. His four hard, dangerous years of life in Lee County, Kentucky, showed him what human society is without Christ. In that school he was getting ready for his life-work in Brazil.

No man who ever went to the mission field turned his back upon more at home. But from the start he rejoiced in the sacrifice. As another has lately written of him: "He was so splendidly buoyant that it was always a tonic to be with him. He gave the missionary cause a personal embodiment that touched the imagination of the Church."

With the splendid help of Drs. Morris, Brown and Meem —only one of whom, Dr. Morris, now survives—he laid wise, firm and broad foundations. Every step was carefully thought out. This was to be no partisan adventure. "We bring you a Church that is Catholic, but not Roman." That is what they said to the Brazilians. Schools were established, churches and missions built, a native clergy trained, thirty or forty of them, a suffragan bishop consecrated, Bishop William M. M. Thomas, who two years ago succeeded to the office.

Few people in the Church realize how much of the strength of Bishop Kinsolving was given in labors for the missionary cause at home. In nearly every large city in the United States, and in many smaller places, on platforms before great assemblies, often after hard night journeys, he made his moving missionary pleas to a Church needing to be aroused. He was chosen to preach the tercentennial of Jamestown in St. Paul's, Richmond, Va., in 1907, and —only one of whom, Dr. Morris, now survives—he laid wise, firm and broad foundations. Every step was carefully thought out. This was to be no partisan adventure. "We bring you a Church that is Catholic, but not Roman." who that heard him will ever forget that masterful address? He was selected to preach at St. Paul's Cathedral, London, during the Pan-Anglican Congress in 1908. He gave the oration on Washington at the University of Pennsylvania, and was given the degree of LL. D. His last hard field work was when he came home to the Convention at New Orleans. Who can tell by how much these sermons and addresses, into which he threw such dynamic emotion, shortened his span of life?

But none ever heard him murmur. He loved the cause he plead for, and was willing to spend and be spent for it. Cheerful and full of keen interest to the end, manly, patient, joyful, strong, he could look back with praise and thankfulness, and as he looked forward "greet the unseen with a cheer."

"Remember thy servant, O Lord, according to the favour which thou bearest unto thy people, and grant that, increasing in knowledge and love of thee, he may go from strength to strength, in the life of perfect service, in thy heavenly kingdom; through Jesus Christ our Lord."

BISHOP MORRISON FATALLY INJURED.

The Rt. Rev. Theodore Nevin Morrison, D. D., LL. D., Bishop of Iowa, was fatally injured on the afternoon of Friday, December 27. He was struck by an automobile while crossing the street to enter his home.

Aged seventy-nine, he was Bishop of Iowa for nearly thirty-one years. He was born in Ottawa, Illinois, February 18, 1850, the son of the Rev. Theodore Nevin and Anna E. (Howland) Morrison. He was ordained deacon on graduating from the General Theological Seminary in 1873. He had previously received the Bachelor of Arts degree from Illinois College and, in 1895, the same college awarded him the degree of Doctor of Divinity. Later he received the S. T. D. degree from the Western Theological Seminary and his LL. D. degree from the Chicago Law School. Bishop Whitehouse ordained him priest in 1876.

Three years later he was married to Miss Sarah Buck, of Chicago.

He served at only two parishes before becoming Bishop, St. Paul's Church at Pekin, Illinois, 1874-76, and the Church of the Epiphany, Chicago, Illinois, 1876-99. He was consecrated Bishop on the twenty-second of February, 1899.

The burial was from Trinity Cathedral, Davenport, on Tuesday, December 31. Requiem celebrations were held by the clergy of the diocese at 6:30 o'clock, 7, 7:30, 8, 8:30 and 9.

The Burial Office was read at ten o'clock. The clergy officiating were the Dean of the Cathedral, the Very Rev. R. F. Philbrook, the Very Rev. Marmaduke Hare, Dean Emeritus of the Cathedral, and the Rev. James Colletti, of Oak Park, Illinois, formerly a member of the Cathedral staff. A requiem eucharist followed, celebrated by Bishop Longley, who was assisted by other bishops.

The Rev. R. J. Campbell, rector of Grace Church, Cedar Rapids, read the anthem at the grave, and Bishop Longley read the committal and the balance of the service.

BISHOP SESSUMS SUDDENLY STRICKEN.

The Rt. Rev. Davis Sessums, D. D., deeply beloved Bishop of Louisiana, died suddenly about 4 P. M. Christmas Eve, from an attack of angina pectoris. His death came as a shock to all who knew him, for he had appeared to be enjoying good health and on the night previous to his death he had returned from an official visit to Bastrop in Northern Louisiana.

Funeral services were held in the Cathedral on December 27, at 11 A. M. The service proper was preceded by a clebration of the Holy Communion, in which participated Bishop Gailor of Tennessee, Bishop Mikell of Atlanta, Bishop Bratton of Mississippi, and Bishop Green, Bishop Coaodjutor of Mississippi.

Bishop Sessums was born July 7, 1858, in Houston, Texas. He was a graduate of the University of the South, and was a member of the first Master of Arts Class to be graduated from that University in 1878. He was ordained to the priesthood in 1882, and was made assistant rector of Grace Church, Galveston, Texas, the following year. The same year he was called as assistant rector to Calvary Church, Memphis, where he remained until 1887, when he accepted the rectorship of Christ Church, New Orleans, Louisiana. In June, 1891, he was elected assistant bishop to the Rt. Rev. J. N. Galleher, D. D., Bishop of Louisiana, and upon the death of the latter in December of the same year, he succeeded to the Bishopric. He is survived by his widow, a daughter and a son.

Not only has the Diocese of Louisiana sustained a great loss in the death of Bishop Sessums, but the entire Church mourns the passing of a noble and beloved leader.

THE EPIPHANY, OR MANIFESTATION OF CHRIST TO THE GENTILES

Berkeley Minor

COLLECT.

O God, who by the leading of a star didst manifest Thy only begotten Son to the Gentiles; Mercifully grant that we who know Thee now by faith, may after this life have the fruition of Thy glorious Godhead: through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

An earlier form of this collect I like better; it reads thus: "May be led onward till we come to gaze upon Thy majesty by sight.

THE collect refers to the first Epiphany or manifestation of Christ to the Gentiles after His birth, viz.: to the wise men from the east. The leading of a star naturally suggests traveling in darkness or the night-time, and is suggestive of the heathen darkness which then covered the world and in which some guiding light was so much needed. Nearly seven hundred years before the Prophet Isaiah had spoken of this darkness and the light that was to enlighten it. In the sixtieth chapter of that noble prophecy, Isaiah cries out: "Arise, Shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee. For behold the darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people; but the Lord shall arise upon thee, and His glory shall be seen upon thee. And the Gentiles shall come to Thy light, and kings to the brightness of Thy rising."

THE Epistle is Eph. 3:1-12. This Epistle is a long parenthesis from verse 2 to verse 14, in which we are told by Paul of that wonderful Epiphany or manifestation of Jesus Christ to him near Damascus, that through him might be preached to the Gentiles "the unsearchable riches of Christ." It begins: "For this cause I, Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles—" and breaks off suddenly, as though the thought of the heavenly vision constrained him to speak of it, and its consequences to himself, and to the Gentile world. This feast of the Epiphany was called in old times the Feast of the "Epiphanies" (Bishop Coxe tells us), so many of which have been so graciously given us by God through His Son. The Church gives us two of these to meditate upon at this season; both to the Gentiles, one in the Epistle, through St. Paul, and the other in the Gospel, to the Magi, or Wise Men from the East.

St. Paul speaks three times in this Epistle of a mystery; First, a mystery revealed to him by Jesus at his conversion. Second, his knowledge of this mystery of Christ, how far it was revealed to him, now that he is converted. Third, "the fellowship of the mystery," i. e., how he was commissioned to make this mystery known to all men, both Jews and Gentiles; make it common property to all the world.

This is one of the many mysteries which meet us at every turn as we pass along the way of life from birth to death. Many of them are explained and made clear as we grow older, if we earnestly and reverently study God's revelation, and manifestation of Himself in nature and in the Bible. Many more we may hope to understand in a future state of existence, where we do not, as here, see in a mirror darkly, but face to face with our Lord, knowing as we are known by the Omniscient One (1 Cor. 1:12). Yet I take it, man, a finite creature, cannot hope ever to understand all the mysteries of his infinite Creator. Even everlasting life will not bring us to the full knowledge of even one of the great mysteries of the Godhead, the Trinity in Unity, for example.

Think of the wonderful things of this created universe, which we are so far from understanding fully, the sun, the stars, the comets, the nebulae, and of small things even more difficult; the molecule, the atom, the ion. If these finite, created things so puzzle us, what are we to think of our capacity for full comprehension of the almighty power and infinite wisdom and skill of their Creator, the Maker of "heaven and earth and of all things visible and invisible?" So the intellectual part of the soul of man, however gifted with genius, a Newton or a Laplace, an Asa Gray or an Agassiz, or a Maury, shall never sound the depths of that divine skill and wisdom through all eternity, while the rest of our spiritual being, "the feeling heart the judging head", shall never be satiated in viewing Christ's mercy and love in that sphere:

"Where all is made right that so puzzles us here;
Where the glare and the glitter and the tinsel of Time
Fade and die in the light of that region sublime;
Where the soul, disenchanted of flesh and of sense,
Unscreened by its trappings and shows and pretense,
Must be clothed for the life and the service above
With purity, truth, faith, meekness, and love . . . "
—William Allen Butler's "Nothing to Wear".)

Consider for a moment the mystery in this Epistle revealed (says Paul) to him by Christ Himself at his conversion near Damascus and other Epiphanies later in his life (at least three of them spoken of in Acts). It was a great mystery to Paul before his conversion this plan of God to give "His only begotten Son, that whosoever (be he Jew or Gentile) believeth on Him, should not perish, but have everlasting life" (John 3:16), and a mystery to all God's chosen people. The Messiah, they thought, was for them alone. This was their belief in spite of many prophecies in the Old Testament, indicating God's purpose as to the world-wide mission of His Son. But none are so blind as those who will not see; that judicial blindness spoken of by Isaiah (6:9 and 10), which passage Jesus refers to in Matt. 13, verse 15, where He says: "This people's heart is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes they have closed; lest at any time they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and should understand with their heart, and should be converted, and I should heal them." The great peril of such a state of mind toward religious truth, is shown by the fact that no passage of the Old Testament is so often quoted in the New as this one from Isaiah. It seems also to have been a mystery to Paul, after this mystery had been revealed to him of God's purpose to save all mankind, that God should have chosen him "less than the least of all saints" (as he calls himself), for so great a work. The deep humility of the Apostle is shown, when he says: "Unto me, who am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given, that I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ; and to make all men see what is the fellowship of mystery (that is, how all men are fellows or sharers in this), which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God, who created all things by Jesus Christ." God's Holy Spirit will reveal all mysteries to us, so far as our finite minds can receive them, if only we seek Him with our whole heart.

IN the Gospel for this day (Matt. 2:1-12), we have an account of the first Epiphany, or manifestation of Christ to the Gentiles, after His birth, to the Magi, or Wise Men from the East. The very first Epiphany of all, of the infant Jesus, was to Jews, the shepherds who were "abiding in the fields (near Bethlehem), keeping watch over their flock by night" (Luke 2:8). Two other Epiphanies come next, at Jesus' "Presentation in the Temple", both to His own people; first to the "just and devout", Simon, and immediately after, to Anna, a prophetess, who departed not from the Temple, but served with fastings and prayers, night and day (Luke 2). This first Epiphany to Gentiles from the East is appropriate to this Epiphany, when we celebrate His first Manifestation to us Gentiles. Of this visit of the Magi, Dr. Noah Davis says: "Concerning this event many traditions have been handed down, some merely silly; that the visiting Magi were three in number, is inferred from the gifts being three (yet is not said so by St. Luke); though Chrysostom and Augustine say four times three, or twelve, the number of the tribes, and of the Apostles. The "Venerable" Bede names the three, Melchior, Balthasar and Caspar. Melchior is said to have been an old man, a descendant from Shem, an Asiatic; Balthasar, a middle-aged man, a descendant from Japhet, a European; Caspar, a young man, a descendant from Ham, an African. Thus are represented the three periods of life, the three races of mankind, and the three old world continents. That they were oriental kings is inferred from the prophecies (Isaiah 60:3); "and the Gentiles shall come to Thy light, and kings to the brightness of Thy rising" (Ps. 72:10); the kings of Tarshish and the Isles shall give presents; the kings of Arabia and Saba shall bring gifts."

"And lo, the star which they saw in the East, went before them till it came, and stood over where the young Child was. When they saw the star, they rejoiced with exceeding great joy."

"Cold on His cradle the dew-drops are shining;
Low lies His head with the beasts of the stall;
Angels adore Him in slumber reclining,
Maker, and Monarch, and Saviour of all.

"Shall we not yield Him in costly devotion,
Odors of Edom, and offerings divine;
Gems of the mountain, and pearls of the ocean;
Myrrh from the forest, and gold from the mine?

"Vainly we offer each ample oblation;
Vainly with gifts would His favor secure;
Richer by far is the heart's adoration;
Dearer to God are the prayers of the poor."

THE WORLD SPIRIT

By Thomas Semmes

BEGINNING with a passage of St. Matthew's Gospel (16:13-17) and the parallel passages in St. Mark 8; and St. Luke 9; we may trace very clearly our Lord's dealings with His disciples in drawing them away from their worldliness and self-seeking to a more spiritual conception and understanding of His Kingdom. The ordinary reader in passing Peter's noble confession of Christ and our Lord's hearty commendation of it, pointing to its divine source, would think that it contained all the elements of spiritual surrender to Him, and a full determination to follow, in all things, the Master he believed to be the Son of God. But Peter had very dim and uncertain knowledge of what his confession involved. He had the intellectual conviction of the person of Christ, but he had not arrived at the knowledge of the spiritual nature and demands of the kingdom "within". As we read his wonderful confession, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the Living God" and then turn a few pages to St. Mark 14:71, and read, "Then began he to curse and to swear, saying, I know not the man of whom ye speak", we see an awful chasm too deep and terrible to explain in a casual way. There is, however, an explanation and we may find it by a careful reading of the intervening narrative. Every effect has a cause.

Immediately after the confession which Peter made, Christ began to reveal to them the nature of the Kingdom He came to establish on earth. It was the very opposite of the human idea of a worldly kingdom of temporal power, of political freedom and victory over enemies and oppression. Such a kingdom was the day dream of many a Jew and had in its conception much that was pleasing and to be desired. If the Jews who came to the Lord to trap Him about the tribute tax had been called upon to follow Him to establish such a kingdom they would no doubt have done so with a courage equal to any the world had seen. All their dislike and objections would have been removed. But what would they have gained? Even had they conquered they would have established only another earthly kingdom full of wickedness and self-seeking. Solomon and David had been over such a kingdom and when Jesus held in His hand the silver coin which represented the tribute money it clearly indicated what it had come to, humiliation and subjugation. The prophets had foretold this. Rebellion against God's spirit laws had withdrawn God's protection and delivered them into the hands of their enemies, and the same spirit of rebellion now refused to receive His Son and, and through Him, the message of God's truth. The same spirit would soon bring about the destruction of any kingdom they might establish.

But Peter's confession showed a high attainment of faith. His error was that he thought Christ would use His divine power to establish a world kingdom by force in which he and the disciples would occupy positions of influence and power. This material conception filled his heart with self-seeking ambition; the very opposite to that of Christ. It was perishable because it contained the elements of decay in itself. His Master's Kingdom in the hearts of men would not perish because its principles were truth and, therefore eternal. "Not by might nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of Hosts." This is the mighty working principle of the kingdom and of the believing and victorious life.

So when Peter confessed Him to be the Son of God, He began to reveal to the disciples the nature of His Kingdom. It began with a cross for its Founder and Head. After confession comes revelation. When a man reaches a point of exalted faith, God shows him higher and greater truth. The kingdom was to be founded on divine law and self-sacrifice. No other power could constrain men and women to become willing subjects of the kingdom. Peter did not know this. He put his own weak human judgment against the wisdom of God. "This shall not be," he said. Then Christ told him that his spirit belonged to the world and to men and savored not of the things of God. He laid down the great principle over which men stumble today that all men entering His Kingdom must deny self and take up the Cross daily and follow Him. Even after such a plain revelation, while on the way to Jerusalem, they discussed the absorbing topic, who should occupy the highest position in the new kingdom, and when He asked them what they had talked about they were ashamed to tell Him.

A greater test came when they came down from the Mount of Transfiguration. Three chosen disciples were with Him. Peter did not appear to any advantage on the Mount. His heart was too full of himself. It is significant that both James and John wrote so strongly afterwards their warnings against the world spirit. "Love not the world," said one. "The friendship of the world is enmity with God," said the other. When they reached the foot of the mount, while the illumination of the divine glory was still upon the face of Christ, they found the disciples humiliated and confused by their failure to heal a sick boy. After Christ had performed the miracle they asked Him why they could not do it. Such power would be useful in the new kingdom. He then taught another great truth. Only fervent prayer could control evil spirits and perform wonders. Their preparation for such work had been poor. Debating their selfish and ambitious desires was not the way to obtain spiritual power.

Again they were taught the lesson of the danger of earthly possessions and honors. A rich young ruler came to Him to know the way of life. He had been faithful and religious. Jesus loved him. He pointed out the sacrifice which would gain a high spiritual place for him. Get rid of your riches, feed the poor and then come and follow me into poverty and hardship. His disciples were amazed. Perhaps they had counted on getting rich in their high positions and this was a death blow to their hopes. But Peter could not surrender his ambitions so easily. "Behold we have left all, what shall we have?" Jesus answered: "Persecutions here and life hereafter."

They began to be afraid of Him (Mark 10:32). His eyes were fixed so steadily on a cruel death. They could not comprehend it or its object. It reversed all their thinking. How could a kingdom grow out of this?

Again on their way a village refused to receive them. The anger of the Boanerges flamed out, "Let us call down fire and consume them." But Jesus said to John, "You do not know your own spirit." "Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of." It was the same world spirit which grew out of pride and self-seeking. This same pair of younger disciples came with their mother to make sure of their places in the coming kingdom no matter what the nature of the kingdom might be. "Master, we would that thou should do for us whatsoever we shall desire." "What would ye that I should do for you?" said Christ. "Grant unto us that we may sit, one on thy right hand, and the other on thy left hand in thy glory: "(Kingdom," St. Matt.). Doubtless their motive was mixed and their understanding very imperfect, but their desire was very clear. They wanted a very high place in the Kingdom and the other ten were angry and jealous of the brothers who were so near to their Lord.

At last the time came for Him to suffer. They were gathered in the upper room and the holy supper had been instituted with its revelation again of the cross. Still they could not understand. They asked each other which one would betray Him, sorrowfully no doubt, but they could not free their thoughts from worldly ambition. There, in the presence of Christ, teaching divine truth with infinite patience and love, with the shadow of the cross upon Him, they once more debated the absorbing question as to which of them should be considered greatest in the new kingdom. No wonder the three chosen disciples slept during His agony. No wonder they all forsook Him and fled. No wonder Peter denied with oaths and cursing, that he ever knew Him. Christ went to the cross alone, because the world spirit had conquered His disciples for the time and they could not take it up with Him.

Is this not true? Is it not the reason that men and women will not follow Christ because His way leads to the cross? No man can truly enter His kingdom unless he is willing to pass through Gethsemane to Calvary. We must be willing to surrender to the will of God even unto death. This is the opposite of the world spirit. The Spirit of Christ can only come to us through constant, prevailing prayer to God.

THE GOSPEL IN WALL STREET

By The Reverend J. J. D. HALL

249 West Forty-third Street, New York City.

A LITTLE more than eighteen months ago I had the opportunity to become special preacher in this most unusual place. The Rev. William Wilkinson held this corner for twenty years. The place is thronged with people from many parts of the world. What Wall Street says and does has a far-reaching effect. St. Paul sought such centers to disseminate the Gospel.

When I left Galilee Mission in Philadelphia, I determined to bring the truths I had learned in the Rescue Mission to the Church as far as I was able. When the opportunity came to do this work, many friends said I would be obliged to modify my preaching so as to meet conditions in such a center. I am not at all conscious of any change in my way of preaching or presenting the truth. It is true that the very cream of America pass and repass this point, but they need the Gospel just as much as the prisoners or those in a rescue mission.

The idea of sin has faded from the minds of many people in this city, doubtless through the kind of preaching they have had to listen to. I divide everybody into one of two classes—lost or saved. I show the depths to which sin will bring us—using as illustrations the current events—and the way out of it all—the power of Christ to blot out sin and give us complete victory. Do people want to hear this style of preaching? Come and see. Many have said that they have never seen such crowds as gather and listen eagerly. Many write telling of the good they have received. Countless numbers tell of the change that has been wrought in their lives since hearing the truths revealed in the Bible.

I consider myself the Lord's recruiting officer. An appeal for the ministry is very often made. About twelve men have made their decision and a good number of others are on the anxious bench. One is a Hebrew, who shows great promise of usefulness in the ministry. I offer nothing in a material way, but everything in a spiritual way. A comfortable rectory and $3,000 per year will appeal to the lounge-lizards and riff-raff, but not to Spirit-filled men.

I stand on a little bench for a pulpit and hurl the old-time truths at that vast throng and they listen most eagerly and attentively. One has to be ready for all sorts of interruptions from all sorts of people. Last year a band of Reds descended on the place in force and began to denounce the government, capital, etc. In three minutes the whole place was seething. I held my ground and used the occasion to hurl some wholesome truth at all in hearing distance. It required every bit of spirit and of courage in one to do this. Arrests followed and then a summons to court as a witness, proved another opportunity to preach.

If the young students for the ministry and men just beginning the work would come and work in such a place it would soon change the face of the Church. Evangelism would be here in earnest and not a paper edition of it. Christ rarely ever preached indoors and His followers rarely preach outside. Suppose the Bishops set the example by getting out into all the centers of trade and commerce where the throngs are and there preach the Gospel of Christ—every one knows what the effect would be. I think it would reduce if not eliminate the ads in Church papers by so many clergymen hunting new fields of labor—not forgetting to mention the size of salary needed and the kind of rectory wanted. If any layman or clergyman is not being used as he feels he should be, I advise the reading of St. Luke 24:9 and Acts 1:8 and 19:2 for the remedy. Any one desiring to spend some time in this city in such work may easily be shown how it may be done if he will write the author of this article.

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSE.

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice, eternal treasures, indeed. "Thy word have I hid in my heart, that I might not sin against thee." Ps. 119:11.)

This week the following verse was submitted by

Miss Estelle T. Oltrogge, of Jacksonville, Fla.:

"Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.

Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest unto your souls.

For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light" St. Matt. 11:28-30).

Who will send one from the far-away places as well as very near us?

A PRAYER.

For Ministers and Christian Workers.
(Col. 1:29 in the Greek.)

Work in me, Power of God,
Work in me mightily;
That I may toil and strive for souls
With Thine own energy.

Work in me, Power of God,
Oh, work efficiently;
Then shall I speak with Thine own force
And turn men unto Thee.

Work in me, Power of God,
That I may stronger be,
And energise that I may fight
And more than conqueror be.

A CHRISTMAS PRAYER.

By Henry Van Dyke.

The day of joy returns, Father in Heaven, and crowns another year with peace and good will. Help us rightly to remember the birth of Jesus, that we may share in the song of the angels, the gladness of the shepherds, and the worship of the wise men. Close the doors of hate and open the doors of love all over the world. Let kindness come with every gift and good desires with every greeting.

Deliver us from evil by the blessing that Christ brings, and teach us to be merry with clean hearts. May the Christmas morning make us happy to be Thy children and the Christmas evening bring us to our beds with grateful hearts, forgiving and forgiven for Jesus' sake. Amen.

On every plant on which we tread,
Are written words which rightly read
Would lead us from earth's fragrant sod,
To hope and holiness and God.

The simplest flower of the vale,
The softest note that swells the gale
The common sun, the air, the skies
To them are opening paradise.

Here we find sermons in stones,
Books in murmuring brooks,
Tongues in trees,
And good in everything.

IMMANUEL HYMNAL: The Macmillan Company, New York, N. Y. Price, $1.75.

An excellent new hymnal with evangelical emphasis, that has, in addition to the old favorites, a multitude of hymns that are not generally known in this country. Every fifth hymn tune is new. This has been made possible by the elimination of the mediocre. Hymns by writers, like Bishop Moule and others associated with the English Keswick Movement have been introduced. There is a splendid section of hymns of the Holy Spirit. The book is to be recommended to those who would like to enrich their store of inspiring hymns and tunes.

THE SAVIOURS OF MANKIND: By Dr. W. R. Van Buskirk. Cloth. Pp. 537, with Index. Published by the Macmillan Company, New York City. Price, $3.00.

A fascinating book for the light it sheds upon religions alien to the Christian faith. Written by a Presbyterian divine, one expects it to deal justly with the claims of the New Testament that there is one "only Saviour"; "there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved". But we are disappointed in this, for the essence of the message is that all religions, for the people who adopt them or find themselves inheriting them, are the best for them, Christianity among them all, having its message for those who are disposed thereto.

The treatment of the character of our Lord Jesus is along the humanistic lines now so prevalent on all hands. Reference to the supernatural in His life is glossed over and the problem of His dealing with sin and conquering death and him who is its author is indifferently regarded. If

Dr. Van Buskirk has ever read Ohaspe, that ponderous volume of over one thousand pages, he will find himself antedated; for there we are told that the world has had forty-nine saviours. Consideration for the good doctor impels us to regard that he is trying under a misleading title to associate men who have done their part in the uplift of the world with the supreme work of the Son of God. Moses was in his way one such. But St. Paul, whom he includes, would cry out in protest against this fellowship; for no one more insistently maintained that his gospel of salvation was not of man, not of himself, but by revelation of Jesus Christ.

A sidelight on the matter is happily presented, by the recent pronouncement of Dr. Stanley Jones in The Christian Patriot of Madras, India. On all hands those who had admired his early dedication to the missionary endeavor of the Church, were confused and heart-wrung by his seeming reversal of position in his book, "The Christ of the Indian Road." Now, he pleads with evident grief that such an interpretation of his message as we had taken, was far from his intention. He admits that he was careless in his treatment of the subject of missions to the people of India. He would reverse all that we have deplored in his book. He does not believe that the Hindus have a good enough religion for them. He does acknowledge that when he wrote, "An adequate goal for character, a free, full life, God", he should not have left that bald statement without explanation. Vehemently he urges that India needs the redemption of the Cross. He protests against the very thing that Dr. Van Buskirk seeks to vindicate, namely, the combining of all religions in one great aspiration. His words are: "One of the greatest dangers before Christianity at the present time is the increasing attitudes tending towards syncretism. At the heart of the Gospel is a core of exclusiveness. We cannot escape it. Christ is not presented in the Gospels as one of the good ways, or even the best way, but THE WAY. Nor is He presented as bringing forth good truths, or even the best of truths; but He is THE TRUTH."

When St. Paul went to Corinth, he determined to know nothing among the people of that proud city, but Jesus Christ and Him crucified. Dr. Teusler, founder of the great International Hospital in Japan, when urged to omit the distinctly Christian features of his undertaking with the offer from the government of abundance of money for his buildings, he replied: "I came to heal the sick and to declare the gospel of salvation to the spiritually sick people of Japan. I cannot depart from that purpose." This brave messenger of the Cross has had a hard life to live; but is strong and cheerful in the hopeful completion of one of the largest hospitals in the Orient.

With such learning as Dr. Van Buskirk displays, such evidence of wide reading and deep thought, our hearts warm towards him in longing that the slip he makes on page 394, by according to our Lord the capitalizing of Him, may come in due time to be his reverent custom, and his heart-felt tribute to the "one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus".

INTERPRETATION.

Mr. Editor:

Since the undersigned has been twice attacked, once by name, in your columns, I ask, in all fairness and journalistic ethics, that you give me space to reply. My former letter was not published and none of the clergymen whom you have censured has been heard from. This editorial passing of judgment, without hearing the other side is tantamount to convicting a man without a hearing. No court in the land would do that. It is like walking up to a man and shooting him down, when he has no weapon and no means of defense. It is like creeping up on him in the dark and stabbing him in the back. It is, in fact, worse than any of these methods, since it wounds his character and reputation, without allowing him to defend his position. Even the secular press has its columns open to replies on the part of those who are censured or condemned by others. Any other method is unethical and un-Christian. "Doth our law judge (condemn) any man before it hear him?" (John 7:51).

In connection with the proposed inter-denominational communion service in St. George's Episcopal Church, New York City, when the Christian Unity League was in session in that church, there was no intent to disregard the canon law of the Episcopal Church. It was not a matter of direct breach of law, but of interpretation of law. Whether or not this disputed canon, Number 23, regarding the illegality of non-Episcopally ordained men "officiating" in an Episcopal "congregation" (this was not to be an Episcopal, but a Christian Unity League congregation), whether or not any other broader interpretation might have been given this canon by the Bishop of New York, I am not alleging or contending. But if you, Mr. Editor, and others who have attacked our position, wish to put your opinion against that of Mr. George W. Wickersham, one of America's best legal minds, and a member of St. George's vestry, that is certainly your privilege. I still contend that the service might have been held without breach of law and without any hurt to the Protestant Episcopal Church. I also aver, that if the law is to be interpreted in a way to make it impossible for Episcopalians to share their altar with other Christians, then, in all frankness, it ought to be deleted or else amended in General Convention.

Do you realize, Mr. Editor, that such a ruling would make it impossible for Jesus Himself to have any part in our communion service—as He was not "ordained to minister in this Church?" Imagine, if you can, the implications of such a ruling—a ruling that would rule out the very Head of the Church Himself! If Jesus should come to Richmond, would He be allowed, under strict interpretation of the letter of our laws, either to receive communion or to take any part in a communion service at the altar of any Protestant Episcopal Church? Are we debarred from being "Christians" in our Church?—and from acting as Jesus would act? "Him that cometh unto me I will IN NO WISE cast out." "Whosoever will, let Him come." "Ye make the Word of God of no effect by your traditions."

We read that Jesus "received sinners and ate with them." Are we nobler and finer than our Saviour, that we cannot receive and eat not with "sinners"—but with Christian men and women of other churches? Or do we hold that these "other Christians" are WORSE than "sinners?" "If God so loved us, we ought also to love one another." Where is our logic—not to say our fraternal love and our Christhood?

By the ruling of Episcopal authorities I have twice been debarred from acting as I think a Christian minister ought to act towards other Christians. I deferred to this partisan interpretation out of respect to and for the constituted authorities, both in Baltimore and in New York. Incidentally, the late Presiding Bishop Murray did not prohibit the writer from taking part in the Baltimore communion service, as you say, but the Bishop Coadjutor did write me an "unofficial letter" in which he strongly advised against it. I yielded to his judgment. But what would Jesus do? Those of us whom you have castigated are anxious to apply the test in all Church matters: "What would Jesus do?" "What would Jesus say?" "What would Jesus think?" If that be revolution, if that be rebellion, if that be "socialistic Bolshevism," then make the most of it. This writer is not a rebel, has none of the inclinations of a rebel and has never done the act of a rebel in the Church—but, honestly, he would like to be able to treat all Christians as equal "before God", and will do so in so far as it lies in his power—and WITHIN the range of the VOWS he has taken!

THE GENESIS AND EXODUS OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE DIOCESE OF VIRGINIA, AS FOUNDED ON THE PRAYER BOOK ALONG THE MOUNTAINS FROM ELKTON TO GROTTOES—SOMETIMES KNOWN AS THE WEST BLUE RIDGE MISSION.

Mr. Editor:

It is a pitiful story—humbling and humiliating—but it should be told.

This work was begun in 1905 under the auspices of the Protestant Episcopal Church, with the Prayer Book as its proper foundation, and with the approval by letter and in person by the then and present Archdeacon.

That the work was done assiduously and energetically may be estimated by the success which attended the effort in its various departments.

That it was well done educationally is attested by the fact that, in a District and County contest among the school children, the School at Yancey won in its District in its grades and in the County contest at Harrisonburg it won three out of five prizes with a close shave for the fourth; that the County School Superintendent told his own people—he was a Dunkard preacher—as was told by one who heard him, that the Episcopal Church was doing the best work with the best schools in the county, and later, finding the teacher at Rocky Bar with a salary of only thirty dollars, gave her a first-grade certificate which entitled her to a forty dollar increase in her salary, which he paid out of public school funds, remarking that she was the best teacher in the county, had the best school in the county, and was worthy the increase in every particular. And the School Board, on their own motion appropriated more than $200 of public funds to these schools in one session.

That the civic influence among them was of the best is evidenced by the fact—whose import, it is certain, no one will gainsay or discount—that at Christmas in 1920, when there were at least five seasonal celebrations for the children, which the populace attended en mase, given in different parts of the Mission, there was not a smell or sign of liquor at any one of these celebrations, though Christmas was with them as with most people in the old days, the time for debauchery and dissipation; that it was said many times by the Commonwealth's Attorney of Rockingham that a marvelous change had taken place during this period among the mountain people—the section known as East Rockingham—and that at that time he rarely had a man or woman before the grand jury from that section.

That they were well versed in the Bible and the Prayer Book is witnessed by the fact that the Chairman of the S. S. Association of the District—perhaps the County—announced publicly at one of these meetings that the children in these mountain schools and Sunday schools were better versed in the Bible than any children he had examined in District or County; that during one session of the school, when it had a larger class of children tnan was present at other sessions, and in the Sunday school, forty of these children said "by heart" the whole of the Church Catechism, which enabled them to "play" "The Lady Catechism"—no mean accomplishment—with such splendid success that encomiums of praise came from native and visitor alike.

That the spiritual influence was notable and of a high order may be seen from the two following illustrations, selected from many. One, a "cussing" mountain boy, for which he was then noted, was attracted to the Sunday school and in due time confirmed. After five years of faithful every Sunday attendance he conceived the idea of a Rock Church at Rocky Bar. The phrase seemed to catch him. After much talk he, with others, made the proposition that they would haul the stone from the mountain if the money was gotten for the building. This was done and in due course the church was built. Meantime the flu epidemic broke out in the neighborhood and, after arduous work with friends and neighbors, he was stricken down, and though Doctors attended him day and night, pneumonia set in and he died. The last conscious words of this poor mountain boy was a Church blessing on his rector. Just before passing into the Great Beyond, he raised his trembling hand and said: "You know, Parson, it is the peace of God which passeth understanding!" The other was an ignorant mountain man who, shot down needlessly and cruelly by a psuedo officer, lay on his bed for six months wasting away with a severed spinal column. Ere he breathed his last, under the Church's administration, he was able to tell in his own language those present and to comfort a sorrowing mother with that statement which is the hope of the world, "He is the onlies' one."

For the material side it may be added: that a church was built in Pine Grove—a new point in Page County; that a stone school house was built at Ingham in Page, where a church had already been built; that a dwelling house and sixty acres of land, to which other lands were added by purchase was bought as the Settlement House, a church moved from another point and put up, a parish house, school house, manager's house and cannery, afterwards changed to a dance hall, when the contract with the man who had agreed to run it as a cannery for five years had been broken and the man dismissed—all this at Yancey; that a hall was bought, a stone school house and a stone church (the one now disembowelled) were built at Rocky Bar—in all some $25,000 worth of property; it being conservatively estimated that during the fifteen years of the rectorate referred to some $50,000 was collected and expended in these buildings and in running the schools—in some years as many as six teachers were employed.

That the industrial work was succeeding was attested by the fact that in 1919 there was a return in profits to the Mission from the Cannery and Molasses Mill some five hundred dollars, at the same time serving the people in saving their produce, and that in the year 1920, when the slump came, with careful management, there was no loss, which a very few in the business might say, that this work was growing in usefulness to the people in preparing their produce and so providing them with much food for the winter, and might have been continued as a resource to the Mission under the management which had been provided, but for the ruthless breaking of the contract had with the man to do the work, and his flat dismissal with a rebuke from the Archdeacon administered publicly that the Mission could not thus be tied up for five years.

That the work had grown in favor and met the approval of the neighborhood, both mountain and valley, was emphasized by the concourse of people who attended a poorly advertised "good-bye" meeting—so poorly advertised indeed that the Archdeacon did not get to it—had no invitation—and from the many words of praise at that time and even now of the splendid work that had been done, and this the public is still attesting.

If so much might be accomplished in half a generation in practically virgin soil, with the service of its Prayer Book and the Church's uplifting and upholding teaching, where was the need of a change to a Eucharistic, aenemic Romish service? And that with a people who could only protest? With these results as actualities, the proof of whose existence was easily ascertainable, might not the least sympathetic onlooker have felt somewhat safe about ultimate and permanent results, even though the present did not reassure him?

But eliminating possibility of personal prejudice and sympathies, with this showing of results, easily ascertained, if not apparent to all who wanted to know of them, is there anything that justifies a radical change in policy as the Church lays it down, and the introduction to these people, who might not protect themselves, of a doctrine which is abhorrent to the true teaching of the Prayer Book and what has ever been taught by the Protestant Episcopal Church in Virginia? As the evidence is adduced to prove that this radical and ruthless change was made under the protest of the people, let the reader ask was this change necessary? If not, then why was it allowed to be made?

It is a pitiful story of ecclesiastical perfidy and negligence and neglect of the rights of these unprotected people.

I shall relate what I know and saw first of all:

When this invader of the rights of these mountain people, as the possible successor of him who was then on the eve of leaving the mountain Missions, of which the Bishop had eighteen months' notice as a probability, was first spoken of, the Bishop was told that he and his wife would be entertained at the Settlement House for six months on probation, at the end of which time his suitability might be determined. Nothing was heard of this proposition. Being unable, it was said, to carry out his publicly advertised purpose of erecting a fifty thousand dollar memorial to the Archdeacon on Roche's Mountain, where there might have been fifty people in ten miles square, he was brought down and placed in charge of the then West Blue Ridge Ridge Mission—coming into the rectory the same day that the outgoing rector left, without consultation with him of this purpose.

In less than a year the industrial work had been abandoned, by breaking a contract, as has been shown; his flock of goats, imported for their milk for the sickly and underfed mountain children, had chewed the bark off the trees of a very promising young orchard, and the engine house in the yard had been changed into the entrance to the chicken house, built on the edge of the side yard. These are amusing now as they were then, but they might have put some one on guard who had his advancement and employment in hand. But no, he was advanced to the diaconate and then made a presbyter; then he might and did do his perfect work, for about this time he became possessed of much money with the people asking where did he get it? Where? Perhaps his use of it, with the current rumors as to its donors may enlighten the reader.

But full fledged with the Church orders and much money he went to work. I do not say that the stone church, which the people built, as will be shown, was the first to suffer at the hands of this apparently paid agent, but it is not too much to say that it suffered most.

This was the church for which the people hoped and prayed. The work there had been started under a prejudice so strong that the school house would not be loaned for church services. This prejudice had been overcome; the school house had been enlarged by a cooperative agreement with the people and the school trustees, and for years it was the church's school. Services and a Sunday school had been conducted in the building. To this church, for its building, the people hauled their stone from the mountain, and a solicitor had gone here and there meeting with remarkable success in securing the money—"the rocks"—to put their rocks in a rock church founded on the Rock of Ages! A Dunkard preacher, who had learnt his trade in Philadelphia, now at home on a visit, did the stone work; a local carpenter, with unusual knowledge in his craft, did the wood work. By dint of hard work, getting information here and there from other churches and sources, put in the chancel furniture—and he and the people loved it so—particularly the young man who was the prime mover in the effort, and who had so caught the Church's teaching that ere he was called to his reward, left a blessing for his rector. In this church, with the praise about him of a grateful people, to whom he had by his skill presented the lovely church in all its appointments, this man was the first one confirmed in the first class ever had in the church.

A pitiful story that these people under solemn protest should have been robbed of the work of their own hands. The interior was especially attractive with appropriate furniture made by this man; pulpit, lectern, prayer desk, font, with an unusually pretty holy table, and a most attractive chancel rail.

Today, it is a dismantled, disembowelled church. No pulpit, no lectern, no prayer desk, no holy table, nor chancel rail (save the one since has been put up by one of the teachers). In its bareness and barrenness it was left to the people with an ugly, rugged ALTAR obtruding itself on the view, and by its obtrusiveness shutting out the lettering to a memorial window erected by a former teacher to a loved one. And here it may be said, that the opposition to the change in one quarter was silenced by the promise to make the ALTAR a memorial to her loved one, but there is not letter, sign, or symbol visible about it to suggest that fact. The altar must have been objective for the flooring in front of it is common chestnut plank. Was ever ecclesiastical vandalism more shamefully perpetrated on a more helpless people? Was the change necessary?

What were some of the results of this change? Did these results justify the change? How have the people reacted to the change from the Prayer Book teachings of the Church, with its resultant wholesome effect herein narrated to that of the Eucharistic teaching of altarized churches with priestly trappings?

This is what I hear: That at the school where in other days forty children could repeat the Church Catechism word for word and where the "Lady Catechism" was splendidly played by them, children were allowed to come to the day school under the influence of intoxicants, that the cannery building was changed into a dance hall after the abandonment of the industrial work, to do which a contract had to be broken—the man put in charge meantime protesting that he knew nothing of such kind of work. (It might be well to say here that the mountain man who was his chief advisor in doing away with the contract and the man to do the work, led the charge against him when he was forced to leave that Mission.) That, where under the former policy there was no sign or smell of whiskey at those Christmas celebrations, under the new policy in a year there were as many on the road for bootlegging as there were at home; that the cooperative plan with the county authorities whereby the rector was allowed to name all the teachers of the public schools, under conditions, was abandoned; that the cordial fraternal relations with other churches had been disannulled, and the children in the Sunday schools not allowed to fraternize with the children of other Sunday schools, that it would lower the standards of the church to do so; that now, at the Rock Church, which aforetime had the love and affection of the people, the common expression is as I was recently told, "When you wish anything done (as putting in an altar, for instance), go to the Episcopal Church, but if you want religion you'll have to go somewhere else to get it." The altar seems to have altered and changed things.

But some one will say, they like the Eucharistic service, the Holy Communion as administered with the priestly trappings and colors and altars? In answer to this, it may be said that at a service of this kind held recently when the Archdeacon was present, assisted by an English army man, after eight years of such teaching, with a crowded house, the result was not a paltry half dozen of the mountain people to go to the communion. Then why and wherefore was the change in the services made? What was the motive? It is not known, but it might help in ferreting it out from the viewpoint of the man who did the changing, that it was here that he was to spend in this mountain mission the two thousand dollars that was put in his hands, as was known in Church circles, by a certain party in the Church, whose business it is to work havoc in places where the people cannot help themselves—as for instance poor Ripon in the far west, who had such trouble getting ride of one of these misguided agents. This agent did well, and but for the fact that the people eventually rose up in arms and forced him to leave, charging him with immorality, he might still be in the field. On account of some "sob stuff" worked on the "Powers that be" the charge was never inquired into. He is now an Island Missionary drawing money from the Church, which he is doing his best to disrupt, if not from his former apparent employers.

The story is done. A pitiful one, isn't it? As you contemplate do you not marvel that no voice nor hand was raised to save this church for the people that the people might be saved to the Church? Do you marvel that a listener was amazed when he heard the Archdeacon say publicly at a ministers' meeting in Richmond last winter that he felt safer about the mountain people, coming fresh as he did from this region—even Yancey—where he had bestowed a blessing on a parting missionary of another church —that he then felt safer about the mountain people than ever before?

It may be too late to save this Mission from this flagrant vandalism; it is too late, it is feared to save the Rock Church, where the people are sent away when they want religion; this must ever stand with its ugly obtruding rock altar as a monument to the perfidy of one who might have been at least honest with the people, and to the neglect and negligence of those who should have protected these helpless mountain folk from such heartless mistreatment.

Other Missions, of which I know nothing personally, may be saved to the Church and the Church to the people, but for the area under review the situation is hopeless.

In time the two, who are faithfully, with splendid effort, holding steadfast along the old ways of the Church, will pass out, and then, with those in charge who are now gradually forcing on the people views that are not in keeping with the Prayer Book, the Protestant Episcopal Church will take its place, and who shall say under changed conditions it is not the proper one? Will takes its place along with all the other fads that have disturbed these neglected people and left them in abject and woeful ignorance. With the aggressive insisting and persistence of this party, though quietly done, and the opposition thereto, if there be any, asleep at the switch and doing nothing, Mountain Missions generally will follow the lead of Rocky Bar in its exodus from the faith and affection of the people—with silent buildings left here and there—costly monument to the egotistical folly of its builders—reminders of what the Church lost from its failure and neglect.

What price Glory? What price fifteen years of ceaseless, tireless labor in behalf of a people? What price a letter of this kind and character? The price that every man pays who runs up against a system well set in its ways and who dares to tell the truth? So be it.

It is a pitiful story of perfidy and neglect, in relating which the effort is made not so much to find the fault, as to fix the facts.

The Late Canon Nolloth.

Tribute by Former Colleague.

(We reprint the following account of a noble, saintly character from the London "Record".)

The late Canon H. E. Nolloth was so well known to and deeply respected by a large number of our readers that we venture to quote the following passages from the sermon preached at Beverley Minster on the Sunday after the Canon's passing home, by the Rev. W. E. Wigfall, Assistant Perpetual Curate at Beverley Minster, who was associated with Canon Nolloth in the work at Beverley for thirty years.

Taking as his text the words from Haggai 2:9, "The Glory of the latter house shall be greater than of the former." Mr. Wigfall, in the course of his sermon, said:

Your thoughts and mine are occupied with the end, so far as this world is concerned, of a life that has been very closely bound up with our own lives, and the life of this town of Beverley, and especially of the Minster and its parishes of St. John and St. Martin. . . . You and I, like those Jews of old, have a house, dedicated to the service of God: a house of which we are very proud (I sometimes wonder whether we are too proud of it, and of its by-gone glories). Our holy and beautiful house!

He whose memory occupies our thoughts loved it with a love that is beyond our power to express. And in the directions he gave for the carrying out of his funeral we can see how his thoughts had gone back to its very earliest days. Have you realized that his body's last journey to Beverley was, for its last few miles, over the same track by which his great predecessor St. John of Beverley came from York in the year 718 to the quiet retirement of his Church Inderawood, and that, according to his directions, his body was placed at rest just above the last resting place of St. John, thus linking himself up with the Minster's earliest days, and claiming association with its earliest possessors? And so he loved to live in thought through all periods of its history. Are there stones here and there that were cut by the hands of Norman workmen? He would argue stoutly that they were still in the positions where they were placed at first. But he not only looked back and revelled in the past, he also looked forward still more eagerly to the future, and, doing so, wished to leave this Minster even more beautiful than he found it; that it might be the joy and pride of many generations. And, to that end, he spared neither thought nor expense. He feared not, either to restore in suitable manner stonework decayed by time, or to add what was in keeping with the original design. So when the second jubilee of Queen Victoria gave him the opportunity, he launched a scheme for filling the niches on the west front with statues, and gave liberally to it.

The bells were not so well in tune as they might be. He rested not till they were recast, properly tuned on scientific principles and re-hung in steel frames; ten in number, instead of eight. And to this noble peal he added a "bourdon" of seven tons weight, and of deep and sonorous tone. But time would fail me to tell of improved heating, carved stone work, beautiful mosaics, and colored glass. Thus, he not only looked back upon the past glories with affectionate longing, like those Jews of Haggai's day, but also forward into the future with eager desire to make the Minster a glory of future generations, even a greater glory in the latter days than in the former. With what success let future generations says! But beside the fabric he loved the services, and strove to make them worthy of the Minster and its traditions.

The idea he had in his mind, and expressed to me in those far-off days when I first knew him, was that of a good musical service, such as we love to hear in our Cathedrals and College Chapels. His desire in all this was that here in the Church below we might take our part in that perfect praise which the hosts of heaven offer to God with an enthusiasm that never dies. One of his favorite hymns (we sang it last Sunday evening) aptly expresses it:

"Yet, Lord, to Thy dear will
If Thou attune the heart
We, in Thine Angel's music still May bear our lower part."

But it was not alone the fabric and music of services that absorbed his attention. His great desire was to see this church filled morning and evening with a congregation of earenst worshippers. "Oh, that men would therefore praise the Lord for His goodness, and declare the wonders which he doeth for the children of men!" And to that end he gathered the men together in a Bible Class, where he taught them to believe in and to love that wonderful book as the Word of God.

He was very impatient with the objections of higher criticism and modern science, knowing that neither had any foundation except unwarranted assumption on the one hand, and the ever-shifting currents of scientific research on the other. He was never tired of opposing "monument facts" against "higher critical fancies". Is there any wonder that he drew men round him and held their attention? For, after all, work for God does not depend for its success upon the charm of a human personality, nor the compelling force of ability; it is God who draws men to Him. And when a man thus honors God, first by firmly believing the message God has given to men, and then by proclaiming that message in spite of all opposition, is it any wonder that God should "confirm the word by signs following"? Beside this he was unwearying in following up his work by diligently seeking out his men, and letting them know in many ways he cared for them, that their well-being was of the greatest concern to him. It made them think. And then the question arose in their minds: Why does he care for us? He is not a Beverley man. What are we to him? And then the glory of the latter house shone out greater than that of the former, for it was filled and illuminated by the glory of His presence Who thought not of Himself, but of those He came to save; Who taught men to give themselves for their fellows as He had given Himself for them. If this man, the servant of Jesus Christ, cares so much for us, and thinks so much of us, what does the Master Himself think? And so they become followers of Jesus Christ; followers together of him, fellow imitators with him of Jesus Christ the Lord. He worked hard, too, in the cause of temperance, and was a strong advocate of total abstinence, caring nothing if people called him a "teetotal fanatic", rather glorying in it.

I often wonder whether we see so little drunkenness in these days because of the work done in time past by such men as he, in Bands of Hope among the young, and advocacy of "the pledge" among grown-up men and women; together with whole-hearted example on the part of the advocates. He knew of a cure for the craving of alcohol. It became famous. Some forty or more years ago I met in Oxford a young man who was eager to preach the gospel of Jesus Christ, and who worked hard in preparing himself for an efficient ministry. I see in Crockford's Clerical Dictionary today that he is rector of an important parish and an honorary canon of the Cathedral. That young man was in Oxford because he had been helped to go there by Henry Edward Nolloth. And many another young man could confess that he had received encouragement from the same kind hand at the outset of his career. I myself know well, and I gratefully acknowledge, how ready he was with sympathy in sorrow, and with helping hand in time of trouble.

Do you wish to raise a memorial to him? A memorial that would please him more than anything else? Then make the latter glory of this house of God greater than it ever was in former times by filling it with earnest worshippers, Sunday by Sunday, morning and evening; by realizing that the greatest glory of worship is a consciousness of the presence of God the great Spirit, filling and illuminating not only this holy and beautiful house, but the whole universe.

The funeral service for Canon Nolloth bore fitting testimony to his character. The large congregation in Beverley Minster, including parishioners, representatives from York Minster, and Oxford University, and numerous friends, the solemn yet hopeful service, and then interment in the cemetery near spacious Westwood, with bright rays of the setting sun—the whole occasion was in glorious harmony. The rector said that the name of Canon Nolloth would always be held in esteem and affection, for its strength was in "The Lord our Righteousness". Some of Canon Nolloth's favorite hymns were included in the service. Canon Nolloth left detailed directions in writing as to his funeral arrangements, and one of these was that his old friend, Mr. Camidge, should play the organ, and that the piece he desired to be played was "Volkslied." This Mr. Camidge did at the service.

For Our Sightless Friends.

Dear Reader:

Can any work be more appealing than to help the Blind to have a Bible?

Can you conceive of any endeavor more worthy of the support of Christian people?

Because we believe your answer will be "no", we ask you to kindly forward a contribution again this year for our Blind Fund.

With appreciation of all you have done and will continue to do for our sightless friends, I am,

CHURCH OF ENGLAND NEWS.

The Church and the Soviet Government.

(S. C. London Correspondent.)

The recent debate in the House of Lords on the resumption of diplomatic relations with Russia in which the Archbishop of Canterbury spoke out forcibly on the determined opposition of the Soviet Government to every form of religion, has been followed by a great outburst of indignation. One London daily newspaper gave itself furiously to protest, and disavowing all political bias, has organized a National Protest and has called into existence a "General Committee of the Christian Protest Against Russian Persecutions." Over this committee, Prebendary Gough presides.

The opinions of many well-known religious leaders have been published and are interesting, if only as an illustration of the way men of equally high Christian standard may differ on questions which are even so definitely moral as these. It is also interesting to notice, as perhaps some proof of the conscientious convictions behind political opinions, that in this matter men who are sincerely religious and may be supposed to be actuated by the purest religious motives, follow the lines which might be anticipated from a knowledge of their political views.

Whether the great end in view will be better attained by a refusal to have any relations with the Russian Government or through the influence of an Ambassador present on the spot, each one must judge for himself. The writer believes that if the Government decide on other grounds that it is better to resume diplomatic relations with the Soviet Government, Christian forces should not seek to frustrate their purpose on the ground that persecution is meted out to Russian Christians. The strength of the Christian Church has always been more manifested in its readiness to suffer than in its appeal to the secular power. It is very significant that Pastor William Fetler, General Director of the Russian Missionary Society, who is so familiar with the situation in Russia, appears whole-heartedly in favor of this move. He says: "I feel it to be an answer to prayer, because in many parts of Europe there has just been held a day of prayer and complete fasting for this very same object."

It is difficult to say what will be the outcome of this protest, but at least it will serve one useful purpose if it calls forth renewed prayer on behalf of the Christians in Russia.

Church Union in India.

The Committee of the Church Missionary Society have put forth a statement concerning the proposed Union of the Anglican Church, the South India United Church, and the Wesleyan-Methodist Church in South India. It expresses its cordial approval of the principles involved. The statement put forth by this Society cannot be lightly regarded. The large majority of Indian Christians of the Anglican Communion in the four Dioceses of Dornakal, Madras, Tinnevelly, and Travancore and Cochin, are within the Society's Missions. The Parent Committee in London has formed this judgment after taking into review all that can be said with regard to the past, and with regard to the general outlook within the Church. At the same time it has undoubtedly been influenced to some extent by the fact that the desire for unity in South India proceeds primarily from the Indian Christians themselves and has been consistently voiced by the Indian Church leaders, as well as, and perhaps more than, by missionaries. The committee notes that none of the proposals now put forth relating to Church Order, goes beyond the terms of the Lambeth Appeal of 1920, and that the four basic facts of Faith and Order laid down in the Lambeth Declaration of 1888 as the ground of unity, are accepted.

If the C. M. S. is true to the principles which have guided it throughout its great history, it can do no otherwise than approve the proposed scheme of Reunion, and call for prayer that the Spirit of God may lead the Christian Churches along the lines of His Will and that the Kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ may be set forward.

How serious the situation is becoming in the Church of England through the Reunion question following so quickly upon the Prayer Book controversy, may be judged from a pamphlet just put forth presenting a report of present-day movements towards reunion, prepared by a Committee of the English Church Union. After dealing with the Lausanne Conference of 1927 and briefly with the Malines Conversations of 1921-3-5-6, it refers to the project for union in South India and draws certain conclusions. These conclusions include this paragraph, which they feel bound to put forth in view of statements which are being made that there is "No real risk of separation":

"If the Lambeth Conference approve and the English Episcopate asesnt to the South India proposals in their present form—in particular, if the Church of England is to be in full communion with those who are simultaneously in full communion with non-episcopal bodies; if concessions are made for an interim period on grounds of 'economy' but without definite provision, required in the judgment of the Committee to justify such concessions, that at the end of the interim period episcopal ordination and confirmation will be universal; or, if approval is given or necessarily implied of the view that episcopal ordination is not necessary, at least in all ordinary circumstances, for the valid celebration of the Holy Eucharist—then the gravest question will arise for many Church people as to whether it is possible to remain in conscientious communion with the See of Canterbury. So far as members of the committee can at present judge, there are many for whom it would not be possible."

The position of Evangelicals in the Church of England has been strengthened by the issue this week of two small books—the one by Archdeacon Hunkin, "Episcopal Ordination and Confirmation in Relation to Intercommunion and Reunion"; and the other by Mr. Albert Mitchell entitled, "The Faith of an English Churchman." The former contains some research work and shows what has been the attitude of the Church of England at various crises in regard to Non-Episcopally ordained men, with special reference to their Ministration in the Consecration of the Lord's Supper. The latter is a thought-provoking book dealing with a series of subjects, such as the Fatherhood of God, the Trinity, the Incarnate Redeemer, the Holy Spirit, the Word and the Sacrament, the Ministry, Forgiveness, and so on. Each is dealt with succinctly and helpfully. To those who are already conversant with the Christian Faith, it will help to a more simple understanding of essential Truth.

Prebendary H. W. Hinde.

The appeal for an old, homeless, friendless, penniless woman, inserted as "ad" in our issue of December 14, was in behalf of and at request of party living in St. Louis, Missouri, and not in Virginia.

"Always Abounding in the Work of the Lord."

Dr. Larkin W. Glazebrook sends two more reports of his missionary journey in the Western Dioceses. He writes with continued enthusiasm that he has found "such old-time religion" and says, "I am being given many opportunities and privileges."

In the report to Bishop Parsons of the visit to the Diocese of California, he notes twenty addresses delivered in his eight-day stay before audiences varying from eight to five hundred.

He says:

"I am most appreciative for the cordial cooperation of the Bishop, Archdeacon Porter, the clergy and lay people of this outstanding diocese. I was given every opportunity to present the Message of the Commission on Evangelism. My visit to this diocese was more than worth a trip across the country."

A six days' visit to the Missionary District of San Joaquin included a four-day mission in Harford Parish, in accord with Bishop Sanford's wishes.

Several of these services the Rev. Arthur Walters and several of his people drove twenty miles to attend.

Dr. Glazebrook and his family enjoyed a brief rest during the Christmas season at Del Mar, California, where he remained until January 2.

He will resume his work on January 5 in the Diocese of Sacramento.

KENTUCKY.

Rt. Rev. C. E. Woodcock, D. D., Bishop

Action of the Bishop, Dean and Chapter of Christ Church Cathedral, Louisville.

At the eleven o'clock service, Sunday, December 22, the Dean announced that word had just come that the Very Rev. Charles Ewell Craik, Doctor in Divinity, and Dean Emeritus of the Cathedral, had passed to the rest of Paradise.

Christ Church was founded in 1822. Only twenty-two years after, the Rev. Dr. James Craik became its rector. In 1881, the Rev. Charles Ewell Craik became his assistant, and the following year, upon the death of the father, succeeded him in office; in 1894, when Christ Church was made the Cathedral Church of the Diocese, he became its first Dean. In 1916 he sustained an extremely severe accident, which it was supposed would prove fatal, and from which he never fully recovered; and the next year he resigned, and was elected Dean Emeritus. Thus for eighty-five, of the one hundred and seven years of this congregation, father and son have been connected with it.

Dr. James Craik was one of the most eminent of the clergy of the Episcopal Church in his day; but among his people was known and loved above all as a pastor, and by them was affectionately called "The Good Shepherd". The son followed in the steps of his illustrious parent. A number of the most important accomplishments of this "Mother Church" among the parishes of the city had their initiation during his ministry, notably the beginning of the Endowment Fund of the Cathedral, and the building of the Cathedral House; but he, too, was above all the pastor, and this in nowise better attested than in the hold he had upon the affections of the poor, and those in distress.

This connection of eighty-five years, and an active ministry of nearly three quarters of a century by father and son in this old congregation, has left an indelible impress; and, under God, the work which it has accomplished and the position it occupies in the community today, are in large part its fruitage. For this we thank God.

To the bereaved widow and her sons, and to the entire family, we extend our heartfelt sympathy, and most earnestly pray that our loving Heavenly Father will lift up the light of His Countenance upon them and give them His own abiding peace.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Rt. Rev. Thomas J. Garland, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. Francis M. Taitt, S. T. D., Coadjutor.

Ordinations.

The Rt. Rev. Francis M. Taitt, Bishop Coadjutor of Pennsylvania, officiated Monday morning, December 23, in Old St. Peter's Church, Philadelphia, at his first ordination since his consecration, when he advanced two men from the diaconate to the priesthood. They were the Rev. William Hugh Fryer, now serving as a curate on the staff of St. Peter's, and the Rev. Cedric Earl Mills, now in charge of St. Cyril's Church, Coatesville, and the Church of the Ascension, West Chester. The Rev. Dr. E. M. Jefferys, rector of St. Peter's, presented Mr. Fryer and preached. The Rev. E. Sydnor Thomas, rector of St. Barnabas, Germantown, presented Mr. Mills and read the Litany.

Bishop Slattery's Christmas Sermon.

The Rt. Rev. Charles Lewis Slattery, D. D., preached in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, Boston, on Christmas Day. The following is a brief summary of his sermon:

"We beheld His glory."

The early Church felt that Christ's revelation of His Father was a revelation of humility. They expected Christ to return on the clouds of Heaven with amazing pomp and ceremony. Even St. Paul said that Christ emptied Himself of the glory which He had with the Father. Forty years later, a great mystic proclaimed, "We beheld His glory." It came over him that no outward radiance could transcend the divine life which men saw day by day in Jesus of Nazareth. Henceforth all life becomes the medium for the Divine.

Christ Himself told His followers that even Solomon could not compete with the lilies of the field. He who believes in the Christ of Christmas Day dares to find God in the life of every day.

Christ's glory was manifest when He took little children into His arms, when He touched the leper, when He sat with his friends at supper, when He talked to them on the mountain.

Only gradually can the world rise beyond the vulgar estimate of noise and crowds and glitter. Still the world looks for God in the fire, in the wind, in the earthquake. Only those who know Him face to face discover Him in the still small voice. The Christian looks forward to seeing his Master, but when he sees Him, he shall see Him in the glory which He had in Bethlehem, in Nazareth, in Jerusalem, the elemental glory which does not depend upon any outward pride or circumstances.

Resolutions on Dr. Downman's Resignation.

The resignation of the Rev. J. Y Downman, D. D., for forty-one years rector of All Saints' Church, Richmond, and its first and only minister, was announced to the congregation December 22, at a special meeting following the morning service.

Frederick S. Valentine, register, who made the announcement to the congregation, told of the efforts made by the vestry to persuade Dr. Downman to reconsider and the deep regret with which the resignation had been finally accepted by the vestry at a meeting Thursday night, after the efforts proved of no avail. The following resolutions of the vestry were read by Mr. Valentine:

"Resolved: That in view of the letter of Mr. Downman of October 15, 1929, resigning as rector of All Saints' Church, and in view of the resolution of the vestry refusing to accept same, and their offer and suggestion to him that they be allowed to furnish him an assistant and after considerable correspondence and frequent interviews with the committee appointed by the vestry to dissuade him from taking this step, it has been impossible to induce him to change his mind or convince him that his resignation will be a severe blow to the congregation and the vestry, and will be regarded by all as a loss that will, in all probability, never be entirely retrieved by any successor, however capable and consecrated to the work of this church he may be.

"Therefore, be it further resolved: That as our rector seems to be inflexible in his opinion that on account of his age, it is best for the church that he resign and that a younger man be secured, and after two months' consideration by him and continuous but futile efforts during this period by the vestry to induce him to change his mind in this matter, it is with reluctance that the vestry is constrained to accept his resignation to take effect at such time as he may designate; it is further resolved: that a committee of five members of the vestry consisting of the senior and junior wardens, Colonel Button, Mr. Valentine and Mr. Alfriend be and they are hereby appointed to carefully look into the matter of securing a rector for All Saints Church to succeed Mr. Downman, with the request that they act and report their conclusions to the vestry as speedily as possible, consistent with the importance and far-reaching effect of their decision."

Resolutions on behalf of the congregation, expressing regret at the resignation of the rector and approving the action of the vestry, were offered by Alex H. Sands and adopted by the congregation. These resolutions were as follows:

"Whereas, The vestry of All Saints' Episcopal Church has this day laid before the congregation the resignation and acceptance by them of our beloved rector who for over forty years has been our faithful leader in the cause of Christ, and

"Whereas, the vestry have shown by their resolutions that they have done all that was humanly possible to prevail upon the rector to withdraw his resignation without success and that, therefore, the resignation had to be acted upon as reported; therefore,

"Be it resolved that this congregation appreciates and approves the action of the vestry as shown in the resolutions this day read; that it unites with the vestry in recording its deep sense of regret at the action of its beloved rector; it is further

"Resolved that the senior warden doth forthwith appoint a committee of five, two of whom are to be chosen from the vestry and three from the church at large, who shall be entrusted to prepare suitable resolutions of respect for our rector and regret at his action in so resigning—this committee to report back to a call meeting of the congregation to be called by the senior warden."

Dr. Downman had been in the active ministry for forty-six years, having been ordained by Bishop Peterkin in Alexandria in 1883. He held his first charge in West Point and from there accepted a call to Danville. Leaving Danville to accept a parish in Greenville, S. C., he remained there until 1888, when he was called to the rectorship of the new All Saints' Church here, where he conducted the first service of the new church on Christmas Day, 1888.

Under Dr. Downman's ministry the new church, organized by former members of old Monumental Church, grew and prospered. In 1898, a lot on West Franklin Street was tendered as a gift to the church and the decision to erect a new church building was reached. The present French Gothic edifice was begun and on December 7, 1898, the cornerstone was laid. The first service in the new church was held in January, 1900.—Richmond Times-Dispatch.

Preaching Mission Planned For 1930.

The Diocesan Commission on Evangelism, of which Dr. Anson Phelps Stokes, canon of Washington Cathedral, is chairman, announces preliminary plans for a preaching mission to be conducted in representative Episcopal churches throughout the Diocese of Washington, from November 16 to 23, 1930. A mass meeting in the new Constitution Hall will begin the Mission, after which twenty-five Mission preachers will hold daily services for a week in parishes in the District of Columbia and Maryland. This program was approved at the last Annual Convention of the Diocese of Washington. The main object of this Mission as set forth in a memorandum sent to the rectors of the several parishes is "to deepen the spiritual life and sense of consecration of all communicants and other persons affiliated with the Episcopal Church; thereby increasing their effectiveness from the standpoint of the work of the Church and of Christian citizenship." It also is hoped that the Mission may reach many of the unchurched of the diocese.

Of the missioners at least fifteen will come here from other communities. They will be clergymen, including some six bishops who have demonstrated unusual gifts as Mission preachers. They will be stationed at different parishes. These churches will become "mission centers" for the parishes of their neighborhoods. The visiting clergymen will make their headquarters at the College of Preachers of Washington Cathedral.

Two meetings also will be held at the College of Preachers in advance of the mission, enabling each missioner to meet with the clergy of his center. The Rt. Rev. Philip M. Rhinelander, warden of the College of Preachers, is cooperating with the commission on evangelism in arranging for the Mission.

The opening meeting will be unusual, as arrangements have been made to transfer the regular evensong service of Washington Cathedral on that date to Constitution Hall. The Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, Bishop of Washington, will preside and there will be two addresses by representative Churchmen. The music will be furnished by the Washington Cathedral Choir of men and boys, augmented by many choirs of other churches in the diocese. The service will be broadcast.

The exact character of the individual missions will be determined by the missioner in conference with the rector of the parish in which the mission center will be situated, and the clergy of neighboring parishes, so as to adjust the services to local needs and conditions. It is expected the most important preaching services will be held every evening and an early celebration of the Holy Communion will be privided every morning where possible. Special meetings for women, for children and other groups also will be considered as a phase of the daily program.

In Memory of Mrs. McKim.

Handsome vestibule doors are being installed in Epiphany Church in memory of Mrs. R. H. McKim, who, with her husband, worked long and lovingly for the parish. They are the gift of her two sons and her grandchildren. The "Epiphany Parish Guide" carried the following comment:

"These beautiful gates by which we shall enter with thanksgiving into the Lord's courts are a truly appropriate memorial to the gracious Christian lady whose devotion to this church is ever gratefully remembered. The doors are designed by Mr. Frederick H. Brooke, Mrs. McKim's son, and in their details are an inspiration from the wonderful Gothic forms of Winchester Cathedral and Trinity Church at Stratford-on-the Avon."

A "Singing Christmas."

A "Singing Christmas" was the objective in Washington of those who planned the community tree and celebrations and so it came about. The churches sang and sang on Christmas Eve, when all through the diocese there were carol services, celebrations of the Holy Communion and in some places pageants with music. Festival services on Christmas Day and Sunday-school celebrations emphasized the significance of music in the Church's worship, especially during the season of Christmas. A better understanding of the carol has come about and people everywhere, shut-in, or out in active life, listened to the carols, some hundreds of years old, with very fresh interest.

Special carol services were held in some of the churches, notably Epiphany Church, on Christmas Eve; Ascension Church and St. Alban's at the same hour; Christ Church, Georgetown, on December 29, at 7:30 P. M., and Washington Cathedral, December 29, at 4 P. M.

Almighty God, Who hast given us Thy only begotten Son to take our nature upon Him, and as at this time to be born of a pure Virgin; Grant that we being regenerate and made Thy children by adoption and grace, may daily be renewed by Thy Holy Spirit; through the same Our Lord Jesus Christ Who liveth and reigneth with Thee and the same Spirit ever, one God, world without end. IN THINE OWN HEART.

Though Christ a thousand times
In Bethlehem is born.
If He's not born in thee,
Thy soul is still forlorn.
The cross on Golgotha
Will never save thy soul;
The cross in thine own heart
Alone can make thee whole.

Whate'er thou lovest, man,
That, too, become thou must;
God, if thou lovest God,
Dust, if thou lovest dust,
Go out, God will go in;
Die thou and let Him live;
Be not, and He will be:
Wait, and He'll all things give.

To bring thee to thy God,
Love takes the shortest route;
The way which knowledge leads
Is but a roundabout.
Drove out from thee the world,
And then like God thou'lt be,
A heaven within thyself
In calm eternity.

Let but thy heart, oh, man,
Become a valley low,
And God shall rain on it,
Till it will overflow.
Oh, shame! The silkworm works
And spins till it can fly,
And thou, my soul, wilt still
On thine old dearth-clod lie.

Man, if the time on earth
Should seem too long for thee,
Turn thou to God and live,
Time-free, eternally.

—Angelus Silesuis (1624).

Three Kings and a Baby.

It was morning-time. An eastern traveler, mounted on a milk-white camel of unusual size, was making his way alone across the desert. Before him the vast reaches of sand stretched on and on toward the horizon. With noiseless tread the camel swung steadily forward. The traveler sat motionless under the awning, lost in thought. The hours passed unheeded.

By and by he was roused from his reverie by the approach from the north of another camel, similar in size and whiteness to his own. Even as he watched its coming, a third appeared to view, journeying from the south. The three men at a tiny oasis in the desert where a palm tree gave them welcome shade and where there was a spring of water. The travelers dismounted and stood for a moment gazing at one another in wonder. At last one of them spoke. "Though we have never met before, each one knows the mission of the other. In our searchings of the heavens we have seen a new star, and through the goodness of God that star has brought us together on our way to find the King whose birth it heralds." The others bowed in silence. Then they said together, as of one accord, "Great is our God, and greatly to be praised."

The first speaker went on. "I am from Egypt. My name is Balthasar." Then another spoke. "I am from India. My name is Melchior." "And I," said the third, "am from Greece. My name is Gaspar."

"It is even as the Hebrew read from his sacred book," Balthasar said, as if to himself. "Unto Him shall the nations seek." Then he roused himself. "But come, let us refresh ourselves that we may be on our journey."

The swift night of the desert was falling when they finished their supper. But there seemed to be no doubt in their minds that they could find their way. They mounted again their camels and started on over the trackless desert. Then, out of the darkness there came a light, at first faint and trembling, growing in brightness until it shone in splendor before them. "It is the star," they cried with one voice. "God is with us!"

As the three travelers from the ends of the earth were making their way over the desert, King Herod was spending troubled nights in his palace in Jerusalem. Many vague rumors had come to him during the days before about the birth of a Child who, according to the Jewish prophets, was to become King. Always fearful that some one would take his throne from him, Herod heard the news with dread. Yet he hesitated to make any inquiries lest it seem that he was giving attention to an idle rumor.

One night he was pacing up and down his balcony, unable to sleep for the fear that obsessed him. The balcony overlooked the city. Suddenly, he noticed what seemed to be a commotion in the streets, for torches were moving rapidly from place to place. Then he saw that there was a procession and that it was coming toward the palace. In spite of the cold terror that almost overcome him, he hastened into his room so that the attendants might not know of his weakness.

He heard the guard at the palace gate questioning those who sought admittance. He listened intently and heard the clear voice that called, "Where is He that is born King of the Jews?" for we saw His star in the east, and are coming to worship Him. "It was as he had feared. There was another claimant for the throne! Summoning all of his courage, he called to an attendant and ordered that there be brought before him the strangers who were so carelessly disturbing him in the night.

As soon as the three travelers entered the room, King Herod knew that he had to contend with no common men, but with noblemen of holy lives and great wisdom. And so he received them courteously and asked them what they sought. Balthasar answered for them. "We are seeking the newly born King of the Jews, for we have seen His star in the east and are come to worship Him."

"And where is He to be born?" Herod asked.

"It is to find the answer to that question that we are come to Jerusalem, O King," Balthasar answered.

Herod thought for a moment. When he spoke again it was with the utmost graciousness. "There are in Jerusalem," he said, "certain men who have searched diligently into all of the Jewish literature. They know all of its prophecies. If there is to be a new king of the Jews born at this time, they will know at what place He may be found. I will send for them and have them put at your disposal all of their skill.

The strangers bowed in token of their appreciation of the courtesy, and King Herod left the room. A few moments later an attendant led them to another part of the palace where they were invited to rest until the report from the Jewish scholars was ready.

By and by the door opened, and a group of men clothed in the robes of the scribe entered. "We have been asked to bring you our report," one of them said. The travelers indicated their readiness to hear it. "There can be no doubt," the spokesman said, "the promised King will be born in Bethlehem of Judea; for thus it is written through the prophet:

"And thou, Bethlehem, land of Judah,
Art in no wise least among the princes of Judah;
For out of thee shall come forth a governor,
Who shall be shepherd of my people Israel."

Their decision having been given, the scribes retired as gravely as they had entered.

The travelers were burning with eagerness to be on their way. Now that the end of their long journey was in sight, they could scarcely restrain their impatience to be off. But King Herold had left instructions that they were to be shown to his chamber before they left the palace; so they found themselves obliged to suffer the delay.

"The scribes have reported to you?" he asked when they were before him. And when they had told him what interpretation of the prophets the men had brought, he said, "Go and search out exactly concerning the young Child: and when you have found Him, bring me word that I also may come and worship Him."

The Wise Men were then shown out of the palace with all the ceremony attendant upon the visit of kings, and servants bearing torches went before them to the gate of the city.

The travelers were glad to be alone in the darkness outside the city walls. Eagerly they searched the sky. And, lo! the star which they saw in the east went before them. And they rejoiced with exceeding great joy when they saw the star, and urged the camels forward.

Dawn was just breaking when they entered the little town of Bethlehem. Guided by the light of the star, they came to the place where the young Child was. As they passed through the doorway, they saw the star disappear in the brightness of the morning light.

And the King they had come so far to find! They saw Him, a Baby in His mother's arms. Around Him were no kingly furnishings. There were no gaudily decked servants to wait upon Him and no armed soldiers to protect Him. There was only a simple room, such as the poor of any town might inhabit, and there was only Mary to care for Him and Joseph to protect Him. But the Wise Men had no doubts. They entered reverently and fell upon their knees praising God. In a few moments they arose, and going to their camels, they brought their richest treasures in jeweled caskets, and laid before the Child gifts of gold, frankincense, and myrrh.

And being warned of God in a dream that they should not return to Herod, they departed into their own country another way.—Richmond Christian Advocate.

FOR THOU ART WITH US.

Charles Nevers Holmes.

Whatever place our feet shall tread,
Within our home, abroad,
We need not doubt, we need not dread,
For Thou art there, O Lord.

On desert sand, on stormy sea,
Beneath skies frowning, fair,
We need not fear where'er we be,
For Thou, O Lord, art there.

In sudden sorrow, sleepless grief,
Through nights of ceaseless tear,
Thy rod and staff shall bring relief,
For Thou abidest here.

Yea, though we wait at death's sad bier
And walk mid death's dark shade,
We fear no evil, far or near,
And shall not feel afraid.

When God is Silent.

Unanswered prayer should not be an obstacle to faith. With the natural eye the believer sees no evidence that God is working, but the eye of faith sees "him who is invisible." The natural ear hears no sound of coming relief, but by faith the Christian accepts the promises of God's Word and knows they will be carried out. This truth is beautifully expressed by Sir Robert Anderson in "The Gospel and Its Ministry": "Faith must be prepared for a refusal. Faith trusts for safety, but never fails when perils come. Faith looks for food and shelter, but never falters when 'hunger, and thirst, and cold, and nakedness' becomes its portion. The faith that cries with the Psalmist, 'At midnight I will rise to give thanks unto thee,' is truer and greater than the faith that could bid the sun stand still upon Gibeon; and the sufferings of Paul denote a higher faith than the mightiest acts of Elijah! 'A night and a day I have been in the deep'! Paul—the beloved child and saint of God, the faithful and honored servant, the chosen vessel to bear His name before the world, the foremost of the apostles—clinging to some frail plank upon the wild lone sea, hour after hour for a whole sun's round; in hunger, and thirst, and cold; the sport of every wave; lost to earth, and seemingly unknown to heaven; and yet he had a God who could have delivered him by a word! And though deliverance came not, he kept his heart and eye fixed upon unseen realities, and reckoned the present sufferings unworthy to be compared with the coming glory." It was the same Paul who by inspiration wrote: "Rejoice evermore. Pray without ceasing. In everything give thanks: for this is the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning you."—Sunday School Times.

THE CHILD OF LONG AGO.

For the sake of one small Child of long ago
I shall go down dark alleyways, and dim,
To find the children there and give the gifts
I could not bring to Him.

And for His sake I shall go seeking those
Who have forgotten stars may shine for them,
To tell them of one everlasting star,
The Star of Bethlehem.

For the sake of one small Child I shall be kind.
He was so kind through life to those who came,
To seek Him in the throng, to touch His hand,
Or call Him by His name.

And for that Child's dear sake I shall be glad,
And I shall place a candle, slim and white,
Upon my sill that it may light the way
For those who walk at night.

And if I mark where others bear a load
And lend a hand until the burden lifts,
Perhaps, as He accepted gold and myrrh,
He will accept my gifts.

The Common Sense of Jesus.

We do not ordinarily think of the common sense of Jesus and the phrase may jar the reverence of some souls. We usually think of His truth and goodness, His mercy and His might, but common sense seems to be such a human virtue. And for this very reason we should find it in Jesus in an uncommon degree. All human virtues reached in Him their climax of perfection and it is this humanity of Jesus that brings Him near to us and identifies Him with us in all our experience. Let us take an instance of His common sense. When He had restored the child of Jairus to life, what was the first thing He did? "And he commanded that something should be given her to eat." Are we not a bit surprised? Would we not have expected that He would say and do something religious? that He would call for the Bible and read a psalm of thanksgiving and offer a prayer and then talk to the child about her soul? But nothing of the kind: "he commanded that something should be given her to eat." How human it was and yet was it not the very thing common sense would suggest? No doubt He did in time pray and talk with the child, but at first she was emaciated and exhausted and in no condition to be talked to about religion. First she needed some nourishment to put her in possession of herself and then more important matters would be in order. It is not always good judgment and common sense to rush at a person with the abrupt inquiry, How is your soul? Or, Have you made your peace with God? The person may be in such a state of mind or body as makes such a question inopportune and possibly repellent. There are times, more frequent than we may think, that it were better first to give a person something to eat. Some nourishment may restore the balance of mind and body and put the person in such a mood as will open the way for the more directly religious approach. Jesus frequently illustrated this psychological fact. There is a fine art in knowing how to approach people on religious subjects along the line of their everyday experience or the circumstance, however trivial, of the moment. We may more often than we suspect block our approach to people and even repel them by some untactful or unhappy way of opening the subject of religion. Jesus was a master at this as at every other point, and we do well to study and follow His methods.—Exchange.

Tribute to a Dog."

The best friend a man has in this world may turn against him and become his enemy. His son or daughter that he has reared with loving care may prove ungrateful. Those who are nearest and dearest to us, those whom we trust with our happiness and our good name may become traitors to their faith. The money that a man has he may lose. It flies away from him, perhaps, when he needs it most. A man's reputation may be sacrificed in a moment of ill-considered action. The people who are prone to fall on their knees to do us honor when success is with us may be the first to throw the stone of malice when failure settles its cloud upon our heads. The one absolutely unselfish friend that man can have in this selfish world, the one that never deserts him, the one that never proves ungrateful or treacherous, is his dog. A man's dog stands by him in prosperity and poverty, in health and sickness. He will sleep on the cold ground when the wintery winds blow and the snow drives fiercely, if only he may be near his master's side. He will kiss the hand that has no food to offer; he will licked the wounds and sores that come in encounter with the roughness of the world. He guards the sleep of his pauper master as if he were a prince. When all other friends desert, he remains. When riches take wings and reputation falls to pieces, he is as constant in his love as the sun in its journey through the heavens. If fortune drives the master forth an outcast in the world, friendless and homeless, the faithful dog asks no higher privilege than that of accompanying him, to guard against danger, to fight against his enemies, and when the last scene of all comes, and death takes the master in its embrace, and his body is laid away in the cold ground, no matter if all other friends pursue their way, there by the graveside will the noble dog be found, his head between his paws, his eyes sad, but open to alert watchfulness, faithful and true even in death.—Senator Vest of Missouri.

All ye Gentile lands awake!
Thou, O Salem, rise and shine,
See the day-spring o'er you break,

For our light is come at length,
Brighter than all earthly day,
Source of being, life and strength,
Whoso on this light would gaze,
Must forsake all evil ways.

A Father's Wish.

Hodder and Stoughton has just published a book entitled "G. A. Studdert-Kennedy"; by His Friends. In it is included a letter than Woodbine Willie sent his wife while serving in France as to the training of his little son. Mr. Studdert-Kennedy wrote:

"I. Make him a sportsman. Encourage him to play games and always to play the game.

"2. Teach him to despise cowardice and never to be afraid of anything or any one save God.

"3. Teach him as soon as you can what his body is for, about his powers of procreation, and about the necessity of cleanliness in body and mind.

"4. Teach him to tell you everything about himself, and specially everything of that sort.

"5. Teach him that being a gentleman means using your life to serve and help your fellow men as much as ever you can, and that it is dishonorable to desire only to make money and be comfortable. If he has brains teach him that he must use them to lead men on to better things, and to teach them a gentleman should choose one of the poorly paid but honorable professions.

"6. Teach him to love and reverence women. Encourage him when young to have plenty of girl friends, and to treat them as comrades and never to play with them and deceive them. Teach him that the man who deceives a woman is a scoundrel and that he must try to live straight.

"7. Last, and most important, about his religion. Teach him to love Jesus Christ as the pattern God-Man. Teach him that and leave him free. Don't force his religion in any way, especially if he has brains. There are bound to be in these coming years very rapid developments in Christian thoughts, let him go his way, and do not be pained or shocked so long as he keeps his love to Jesus Christ. If he wants to become a priest, let him, but never force him any way. Only teach him constantly that a gentleman must give not get, must serve and not be served.

"Guard him from vulgarity and snobbishness, and never let him speak contemptuously of any one or anything except a coward.

"I think that is all. Kiss him for me and give him my blessing, and when he is old enough tell him my life story as you would tell it, knowing that I tried hard most of the time to do right, and when I sinned I was sorry in my heart, as I am now.

"I don't believe I am going to be killed, but I don't know, and any way I am content, so long as God can comfort you."

His Good Turn.

He was trudging down the street, in his khaki shirt, cotton puttees and stiff-brimmed Scout hat with the three dents in the crown. He was wondering what "good turn" he would find to do that day, as I stepped alongside of him, and got in step with him.

"Hello, Harry!" I greeted him; he lives around the corner from me and is patrol leader to the Scout troop in our church. "What's up today?"

"Don't know yet; going to see. Got to be there at two. Got a blister, too."

"Why do you go? No idea what they want?"

"Go 'cause it's orders—blisters don't count. I've done most everything, sold war bonds; distributed bills; kept holiday crowds back in line; carried suitcases for the C. E. girls; stopped a man's artery from spouting—I, crickets! what's wrong here?"

At the downtown street intersection ahead, the traffic was in a tangle at the busiest hour, and no traffic officer on the spot.

"Say, she's tied up in forty bowknots," said Harry. "Why don't the cop come?"

That's what every one was wondering. Then a portly man brushed up—the mayor. He took in the situation; his eye lighted on the sturdy Scout.

"See here!" he snapped at Harry, "something's happened to the cop; next best thing's a Boy Scout. Snap into it and unsnarl this mess; you can do it; it's orders."

"Yes, sir," responded Harry, saluting, sober as a deacon. Orders were orders. People stared at first as they caught sight of the drab-colored youth taking the missing traffic cop's place.

Then, in the matter-of-fact way of one used to doing whatever he is ordered to do, in the best way he knows, Harry began blowing his patrol' leader's whistle, and windmilling his arms. He was perfectly cool, and master of the situation. And the tangle began to untangle. Steady, ordered streams were flowing first this way and then that, when the belated cop arrived.

The Boy Scout had made good where it took steady nerve and manly grit. He's a neighbor boy, in our Scouts —Pittsburgh Advocate.

A Tribute to "Nelle."

Having lived all my life on a farm, I have known many domestic animals. Yet I have never known any animal to show such great devotion or to express it in such a peculiar way as "Nelle" did her love for my father.

I distinctly remember my first view of Nelle. She was then a lanky bay colt with four white "stockings" reaching almost to her body and a broad "blaze" down her face. I thought her very beautiful as she snuggled close to her mother's side. How I did hope father would buy her! After much talk in which the words "thoroughbred" and "race stock" figured prominently, a price was agreed upon. Nelle was ours!

Proudly, I helped father put her into a stall and I almost lived with her, petting, currying and feeding her until she was turned into the pasture with the other stock.

Then came the time for her to learn to work. This was the beginning of trouble.

She was not an apt pupil. She pranced, danced, balked, bit and kicked until the morale of all the other horses was upset. If we attempted to plow or cultivate with her "single" it took two men to hitch her to the plow and then the unlucky plowman was forced to stumble along as best he might as she raced between the rows of corn, really doing more harm than good.

Another peculiar trait of Nelle's was that while she would voluntarily leave a bin of oats to be rubbed and petted she never allowed any one except members of our family to pet her. If any outsider attempted such familiarity, she was not averse to using her heels.

After two or three years of trying to make her do her duty father decided that it was cruel to require farm drudgery of an animal so high-strung, so he stopped using her for anything except as a carriage horse.

At this she was a star performer, but few were brave enough to drive her. She was not only fleet-footed but also tricky, quick to jump, shy or run; and once she was between the shafts she was so impatient to be off that the driver was forced to make a flying leap into the buggy.

Neighbors prophesied that she would kill somebody some day.

When she was about seven years old father had a long illness from which he never fully recovered. When he became able to totter around the barnyard, Nelle became almost his shadow. She followed him wherever possible, much as a dog follows a beloved master. She never failed to greet him with a low whinny, whether she saw him on a crowded street or caught a glimpse of him at the window of his room.

Creeping paralysis made father's movements painfully slow. His hands were so stiff that he was scarcely able to grasp the lines, much less to guide a horse. Yet, for years he drove her—Nelle the untamable.

Some of the "hands" would hitch her to the buggy and, hoping to arrive with life and limb intact, would take a flying trip from the barn to the house. The moment father appeared, however, Nelle ceased her antics.

She would stand perfectly still, her head turned to the side so that she could watch his every movement while he laboriously pulled himself into the buggy and, if in winter time, adjusted the rugs and put on his gloves. These tasks sometimes required fifteen minutes, yet Nelle never moved the buggy an inch until father picked up the lines and said, "Let's go, Girl." Then she would jog along slowly along the road such as any old Dobbin, never under any circumstances shying or becoming frightened.

This change in her might be accounted for by the fact that she was growing older, except that she never changed toward any one except father. She lived to be eighteen years old and the day before she died she ran away and completely demolished a buggy.

Her devotion to father and her marvelous care of him, gave to him many happy hours that otherwise would have been denied him.

And, after many years, we remember with gratitude—that peculiar but loving horse, Nelle.—E. J. Gold, in Our Dumb Animals.

BEGIN RIGHT.

A naughty little weed one day,
Poked up its tiny head,
"Tomorrow I will pull you up,
Old Mr. Weed," I said.
But I put off the doing, till
When next I passed that way
The hateful thing had spread abroad,
And laughed at my dismay.

A naughty little thought one day
Popped right into my mind.
"Oho," I cried, "I'll put you out Tomorrow, you will find!"
But once again I put it off,
Till like the little weed,
The ugly thing sprang up apace,
And grew into a deed.

So, boys and girls, heed what I say,
And learn it with your sums;
Don't put off till tomorrow, for Tomorrow never comes.
Today pull up the little weeds,
The naughty thoughts subdue,
Or they may take the reins themselves
And some day master you!

The Green Bowl.

Many years ago there was a Chinese boy named Ah Chee. His father was a potter. One day Ah Chee was playing in his father's workshop.

"Father," said Ah Chee, "may I make a bowl?"

"Yes, my son," said the potter. "Get clay and wedge it."

Ah Chee went to a bin of very fine, white clay. He took out a large handful and wedged it. Then he carried it to a wheel and shaped a bowl. The clay was so fine that he could make the bowl quite thin. Ah Chee then put the bowl on a shelf to dry.

Early the next morning Ah Chee was in the workshop.

"Where is the glaze, Father?" he asked.

"In the bin next to the clay," said his father. "Yesterday I dropped copper powder in that bin, and I fear the glaze is spoiled for my use, but it will do for a little boy's bowl."

Ah Chee opened the bin. In it was a white glaze powder covered with dark bits of copper. He put three handfuls of the glaze in a bowl and mixed it with water until it looked like whipped cream.

Ah Chee picked up a hollow stick of wood and dipped one end into the glaze. This end he put near the bowl. Then he blew through the other, thus spreading the glaze over one side of the bowl. In the same way, he blew glaze on other parts of the bowl until it was completely covered. The glaze soon dried and made a powdery coating.

"Why do you glaze bowls, father?" asked Ah Chee.

"To keep them from leaking," said his father. "Fired clay has tiny holes in it and water can leak through these holes. Glaze melts in the kiln and makes a glassy coating on the clay. There are no holes in glass."

Ah Chee's father was getting ready to fire his pottery. He put it in great unglazed bowls. Ah Chee put in his little bowl with the others. The great bowls were piled into a kiln and walled up and a wood fire made underneath. All that night Ah Chee's father stayed awake to keep the fire going with fresh fuel.

The next day Ah Chee fed the fire, while his father slept. That night they let the fire die out slowly. In the morning the kiln was opened and Ah Chee looked in. His father's bowls were white and shining, but when he saw his bowl his eyes opened wide and he cried: "Why, Father, my bowl is green!" Ah Chee held up a shining light green bowl. It was so thin that light could be seen through it. His father looked at the bowl in surprise.

"How beautiful!" he said. "The copper has made the glaze turn green."

"Then I have made my glaze more beautiful by dropping copper in it."

Ah Chee was very proud of his little green bowl. He took it home and ate rice from it every day.—Playing With Clay, I. W. Wheeler.

MARKETING IN WINTER.

A dark and misty morning,
The streets all shining wet;
The market lights gleam out upon
Black pavements, sleek as jet.

Within are peppers, red and green,
And squashes with odd shapes,
And golden global oranges,
And shyly purpled grapes.

I smooth the satin onions
And the carrots' fine green manes,
And I buy some red tomatoes,
When I market in the rain.

Jack's Courage.

Crash! Bang!

Jack's heart nearly stopped beating, and his eyes grew wide with horror; there was mother's best vase on the floor broken into hundreds of pieces.

"People shouldn't put vases on little tables just where a fellow couldn't help bumping into them," murmured Jack. Still he had been told not to go into the drawing room in his heavy boots, and he began to feel rather queer. "Oh, well, they'll think it was the cat," he said to himself, and off he went.

Every one had started supper when Jack came in again, and he slipped quietly to his place.

"Where's Puss?" he asked.

"Oh, she's in disgrace," answered Margaret; "we've shut her up in the cellar. She knocked over mother's new vase."

"No one seems to know anything about it, so we thought Puss must have done it," said mother.

"Oh," said Jack, and nothing more was said about the vase.

Jack took out his lesson books, but somehow he could not study. What was it that new teacher had said, something about courage; oh, yes; he remembered. "Courage consists not only in bearding a lion or facing a mad bull, but in the quiet performance of unpleasant duties or the cheerful acceptance of deserved censure."

"Acceptance of deserved censure." Yes, that meant taking the blame on yourself, he remembered that.

"Me-ow, me-ow," came faintly from the cellar, and that ????

"Yes, Jack," answered mother, softly.

Why would that queer feeling come in a fellow's throat!

"I—I knocked the vase over.

"I'm so glad you told me, son," she smiled back at him. "I don't mind so much about the vase, but I'd hate to think my boy wasn't truthful. Wouldn't you like to let Puss in?'

"My, won't I work hard for father in the garden this summer and buy her a new vase," thought Jack, as he went to the door and called Puss.—Lillian Ladyman in Jewels.

Raymond was the proud owner of a black and white dog, which was a nuisance to the rest of the household. But Raymond could not be persuaded to part with it. At last the boy's father made him an offer.

"My boy," he said, "I'll give you ten shillings if you'll get rid of that dog."

The following morning Raymond claimed the half sovereign.

"That's excellent," said his father. "Here you are. How did you get rid of him?"

Raymond smiled as he pocketed the money.

"I swapped him with Bobbie Brown for two black pups."—Pearson's Weekly.

How Faithful Cared For the Sheep.

(Based on a true event.)

It was in the late fall in the valleys and mountains of Wyoming. The leaves had turned various colors and the cold weather had already made itself felt. The winds blew steadily, as if a storm was soon coming.

"Be careful for the sheep, these days," warned Jim Colton, who was the owner of a sheep ranch. "There is apt to be a storm and heavy snow any day now."

"Yes, I will be careful, and will bring the sheep right home if I see the snow beginning to fall," answered Jonathan, the shepherd.

The next morning three thousand sheep began their usual march into the mountain valleys of the Big Horn area. The wind was still blowing and clouds could be seen gathering.

"It may snow before night, Jonathan, so remember what I told you!" warned Jim Colton.

"Yes, you can depend upon me," replied Jonathan. "And, besides, you know that big shepherd dog, our Faithful, will surely do his bit on a threatening day like this."

Jonathan whistled for Faithful, and the great flock of bleating sheep plodded slowly forward. It was a lonely life, but Jonathan had grown used to it, and that was the way he made his living. There were hundreds of sheep ranches in the West and in some places as many as one hundred thousand sheep on one ranch.

"Go, sic 'em, Faithful!"

Faithful was off after the straying sheep, rounded them up, and came back to the shepherd, wagging his tail and looking up for a word of appreciation.

"That's fine, Faithful; you never fail to do your duty, do you."

About the middle of the forenoon the flock arrived about eight miles inland from the corral. Here they grazed for many hours. Jonathan had his lunch and Faithful came around for his, too.

About the middle of the afternoon the clouds were dark overhead and it began to rain slightly, then turned colder; and finally big snowflakes began to fall. The storm was on, a heavy wind driving them forward.

Suddenly Jonathan stepped into a gopher hole, which was so large that in lunging forward he broke his leg. He sat down and examined it. Yes, it was in bad shape and what should he do about it? He could not very well drive the sheep, nor could he walk now. The storm was coming forth from the northwest with a terrible sweep.

"Come, Faithful," he called, "take them home; take them right home, quick, understand?"

Faithful barked joyfully and seemed to understand. He began to round up the frightened sheep. They, too, saw the storm coming and were glad to be on their way home.

About halfway between that plain and the home ranch there was a bridge, only large enough for about one thousand sheep to pass over at once. The shepherd always divided the sheep here into three groups, and held the second and third groups back until the first one had passed over the bridge safely. Faithful had always observed this, and had some part in its manouever.

The storm was fiercer than ever when the flock arrived at this bridge. Faithful kept them going forward rapidly. He allowed about one-third of them to enter the bridge and then drove the others back by cutting off the first thousand or so. He tried to use the same methods that his master Jonathan used.

Then, when the first group was over, he ran back and rounded up the second group, equally large. He brought them over safely, and caused them to move rapidly forward with the first group. Then he barked fiercely at the heels of the third company and rounded them all up, and drove them swiftly across the bridge. He hurried the whole three thousand onward, and it seemed that they were all well aware of the danger of the storm. Already the snow was several inches deep, and the path could hardly be seen; but Faithful kept them in it by his ability to sense direction.

It was nearly five oclock in the evening when Faithful and the snowy sheep arrived at the corral. Jim Colton was there and helped Faithful to drive them into the corral under the shelter of warm buildings. There was plenty of food for them there.

Jim Colton looked in vain for Jonathan. "Where's your master, Faithful? Where did you leave him? Has he had an accident?"

Faithful looked sad and bewildered. He barked, whined and frisked about, running toward where his wounded master lay in the snow, then returned to Mr. Colton again, with eyes which seemed to tell a sad story, and which seemed to plead for help for his master. Jim Colton secured the help of two ranch hands. Hitching up two of the best horses and a light sleigh and taking Faithful on board, they rushed in search of Jonathan.

Through miles of blinding snow and severe winds they traveled. When they neared the spot where Faithful had left Jonathan he jumped off the sleigh and frisked around, barking and attempting to find the trail of his master. Suddenly there was a joyous yelp; Faithful had found him!

"He's found him, I'll bet," said one of the men. Let's hurry and rescue him," hastily replied Colton.

They came to where the body of Jonathan lay and found him somewhat snowed under and very cold, almost frozen, but still alive, and able to talk.

"What happened, Jonathan?" inquired Colton.

"Oh, I broke my leg and could not go home. Did Faithful get all the sheep home?"

"Yes, he surely did, and he is such a wonderful dog! You know he had to divide the sheep at the bridge, or he never would have gotten them home, for the bridge would never have held three thousand of them!"

Jonathan was tenderly lifted up on the back end of the sleigh, and sitting beside him was old Faithful, who wagged his tail and licked his master's hands.

"Good old Faithful!" murmured Jonathan as he trailed away to unconsciousness.

Arriving at the ranch late that evening every one sought to help Jonathan in some way. He was bathed, cared for, fed and put to bed. Faithful lived up to his fine name by remaining close to the bed, seemingly pleased that his master was safe at home, even though the accident was so evident.

"Guess we'll have to give Faithful a good supper tonight," suggested Colton. "He has done the work of two today and proved himself a real hero in helping us find his master, and thus saving his life."

Faithful arose, stretched himself, and wagged his tail in real appreciation of the fine supper that was set before him. Jonathan was restored after some weeks of convalescence and seemed to love old Faithful more than ever.—Youth's World.

Crystalized Memories

"Man is of few days. He cometh forth as a flower, and is cut down; he fleeth also as a shadow, and continueth not."

SUCH quotations constantly remind us of the short duration of life. But the memories of our loved ones who have passed on will continue to live in our hearts.

The monuments we select to maintain these memories, should be cut from a stone which will properly carry to many generations to come the messages entrusted to them. This means stone of durability, beauty, contrast and strength. Granite is the only stone which meets such requirements and many granites fail.

Winnsboro Granite

stands preeminently the most lasting, the most beautiful, and inscriptions on it the most legible.

Be sure that "Winnsboro Granite" is specified in your contract for monuments. Like other high quality materials, there are many inferior substitutes, which resemble this granite on first appearance, but do not possess its lasting qualities and permanent beauty, because they contain more deleterious elements, such as water, lime and iron. These elements tend to disintegration and discoloration.

Have your monument dealer furnish you with a personal guarantee from the quarries that the monument you purchase is cut in genuine Winnsboro Granite.

The certificate of the quarries is signed by B. H. Heyward, Treas., and General Manager, whose signature insures genuine Winnsboro Granite. A facsimile of this signature is reproduced below. Write for free descriptive literature.

Deaths

MRS. JOSEPH BUFFINGTON.

At Philadelphia, on December 5, 1929, the HONORABLE MARGUERITE FAIRFAX, beloved wife of Joseph Buffington, Senior United States Circuit Judge, Third Circuit.

"None knew thee but to love thee;
None named thee but to praise."

She, too, cvried out against the bitter cup—
But not for long—then, patiently,
She dragged the Cross, hour after weary hour,
Up the hard road to Calvary.

Now she has hung thereon, just as her Lord—
Even as the Christ she loved—The skies
Are clear; the darksome night is past, she stands
Loved of her Lord in Paradise.

MRS. JOHN L. WILLIAMS.

Passed, tranquilly and painlessly from long, happy, and useful life to assurance of ever-lasting happiness, MARIA WARD SKELTON WILLIAMS, the night of December 27, 1929, at her home, 606 West Grace Street, Richmond, Virginia. She was in her eighty-seventh year, the widow of John Langbourne Williams, of Richmond, daughter of Dr. John Gifford Skelton, of Paxton, Powhatan County, Virginia, who in his later years was one of the most widely beloved physicians of Richmond, and his first wife, Charlotte Foushee Randolph, of Richmond.

Mrs. Williams was born at Paxton, February 15, 1843, granddaughter of Peyton Randolph, Governor of Virginia, and his wife, who was Maria Ward, great-granddaughter of Edmund Randolph, Governor of Virginia, and the first Attorney General of the United States under President Washington's administration. She inherited and lived true to the high traditions of her people and from her earliest girlhood to venerable age was Christ's loyal soldier and servant. Through the vicissitudes and changes attending and following the Civil War and the variations of family fortunes, in joys and sorrows alike, her faith was unfaltering, her courage unwavering. Lovely in person and manner, tenderly and generously devoted in her far-reaching affections, gentle, placid, modest, unselfish, she was the gladly and gratefully acknowledged beloved queen of an ever enlarging family circle, ruling by the power of pure and beautiful character and the wisdom born of clear judgment, unfailing allegiance to noble principles and infallible instinct to know and obey the demands of righteousness and honor. It was characteristic that she encouraged and cooperated with her husband through their married life of more than fifty years in maintaining their custom, inherited from ancestry of both, of family prayers each morning and evening, allowing no increase of domestic cares or stress of business to prevent.

When the first great grief befell by the accidental drowning of their second daughter, they sought comfort not only in prayer to the Father in Heaven and patient trust in Him, but in leading their family in the building of the Memorial Hospital, at Richmond, hoping that it might be the means for mitigation and prevention of pain and misery for many others.

Mrs. Williams lived to see all her nine children, but the one daughter, grown to maturity and usefulness and to have them gather about her to testify intense love and reverence. After the departure of her husband, February —, 1915, she was again heavily stricken by the loss of her much loved son-in-law, E. L. Bemiss, and her first born child and son, John Skelton Williams. She met these disasters with the same splendid courage, resignation to God's will and confidence in His goodness and will that guided her thought always.

She leaves seven children, Mrs. E. L. Bemiss and Mrs. Lewis Catlett Williams, both of Richmond; R. Lancaster Williams, of Baltimore; E. Randolph Williams, Langbourne Meade Williams, Dr. Ennion G. Williams, for the last twenty years Virginia State Health Commissioner, and Berkeley Williams, of Richmond. There are also forty-seven grandchildren and fourteen great-grandchildren, all uniting with their parents in calling "blessed" this Virginia woman, who has gone to her reward in the confidence of a certain faith, in the comfort of a reasonable, religious, and holy hope, in favor with God and man, and in perfect charity with the world, and leaving to all her descendants, to her relatives, and to her community the priceless inheritance of the glory of a long and stirring example of the most exalted Christian womanhood.

These verses, written by John Langbourne Williams to and of his wife probably make the finest possible exposition of her attributes and summary of her life and work and character:

In the fullness of my manhood
My sweetheart came out of the air,
And ravished my heart with her loveliness,
For she was wondrous fair.

Her beauty and grace possessed me.
The joy and light of my life;
And the Heavenly Father blessed me,
For she became my wife.

I clave to her with my whole soul.
I shared my heart with no other,
And O, how great was my glory,
When she became a mother.

The lovely matron grew older,
There stole o'er her a silver sheen;
Turns the ray of light from heaven,
The loveliest ever seen.

Her children's children are with her,
She clasps them to her breast,
And father and children together
Arise and call her blest.

O mater beatissima, divinest, sweetest, best.

J. L. W.

Do you mourn when another star
Shines out from the glittering sky?
Do you weep when the noise of war,
And the rage of conflict die?
Then why should your tears roll down
And your heart with grief be riven?
For another gem in the Saviour's crown
And another soul in Heaven?

Life Goes Not Out, But On.

The life of a Loved One does not end It simply goes on. Its work is done here, only to take up its work in the "other room." We lived before and we live after here. We are not summer flies that live but for a day. Nature teaches us this. The rotation of the trees in the woods; the succession of the seasons; the leaf that falls in the autumn turns into nurture for the new leaf of the spring. There is no end. It becomes easier to believe this when the other shore begins to be peopled by our loved ones. We can never feel for others until we have felt ourselves; we know not how to extend sympathy until it has been meted out to us. Life looks differently after the light of a life dear to us has gone on. But on, not out, it has gone; and surely, if sometimes slowly, that truth comes home to us and enters our lives. The physical presence may be denied us, but the spiritual takes its place, strengthening, heartening, reviving and uplifting. Those who leave us are never far off; they are real and near to us. And oft times when the heart is saddest, the load heaviest and the trial greatest, it is they who stretch out their hands to us and give us fresh courage that we wonder whence it came. It is only that with our eyes we can see not and with our ears we can hear not. One only needs to lose a good mother to know and learn the truth; to learn it so deeply and truly that no ism or cult or creed can shake that belief. It is then that clarity of vision comes; when the eye sees clearly and the mind and heart and soul unite in but one fixed truth—that we go on. The western gates close only to let the eastern gates open.

IN MEMORIAM.

Miss Catherine Gifford Skelton.

MISS CATHERINE GIFFORD SKELTON, lovingly known by her friends as Ogie, breathed her last at her home at the residence of Mr. John L. Williams, in Richmond, Va., at half-past twelve o'clock A. M., September 2, 1897, in the seventy-sixth year of her age.

The life of this dear lady was singularly holy and beautiful. Although she early renewed her baptismal vows in the Episcopal Church, the Church of her forefathers, she did not aspire to be known as a saint or philanthropist; nor did she ever betray one selfish or ambitious thought. The lowly murmur of her heart to God was: "Despise not Thou the work of Thine own hands." Her only care was to be found faithful.

And yet, to those who knew her, and loved her, and came under her influence, and within reach of her kind offices, she was made up of all that was good and true and beautiful and lovable in woman.

Graces flourished in her as natural growths; bright and happy thoughts seemed of the very texture of her soul; and good sense and intelligence was her beautiful, easy, everyday clothing. Her name to her friends, near and far, has been and will be forever as precious ointment poured forth, suggestive only of pleasantness and peace; a synonym for gentle and unselfish love, for watchful, ready and intelligent help, for good taste and refinement, and a delicacy that was an assurance and ward against all offence.

To these she added a charity that covered and hid with its folds, or transformed by its own pure and gentle loving light and magic, the faults and failings of others; a love of nature; a tenderness for everything that had life, down to the least animal and the tiniest flower; and withal a grace of person and a natural cheerfulness and kindness that made her everywhere a most timely, acceptable and delightful guest; and a fragrance of character that, with utter unconsciousness, diffused itself irresistibly.

Her life's work was a strange illustration of pure, devoted friendship; and her reward was full of God's approval. The helpless babe of eight months, entrusted to her care by a departing, deeply loved sister-in-law, she saw and enjoyed in all the loveliness of childhood, youth and motherhood.

The evening of her days she passed happily with those for whose life and perfection she had lived and watched and prayed.

In the midst of a flock—children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren—of her rearing—dearly loved and cherished, she spent her waning powers in gentle, loving, constant service, and in devotions—in the very glow of the Celestial City, for which she longed.

At last, after a day of perfectly peaceful rest, the redeemed spirit left its earth tabernacle.

Just after midnight, in the first hour of the new day, she opened her eyes for a moment as if with glad surprise; her pulse ceased; she was gone; the Father had called her home.

To live in hearts we leave behind
Is not to die.

J. L. W.

THE PROVINCE OF WOMAN.

By Mrs. Hannah More.

As some fair violet, loveliest of the glade,
Sheds its mild fragrance on the lonely shade,
Withdraws its modest head from public sight,
Nor courts the sun, nor seeks the glare of light;
Should some rude hand profanely dare intrude,
And bear its beauties from its native wood,
Exposed abroad its languid colors fly.
Its form decays, and all its odors die.

So woman, born to dignify retreat;
Unknown, to flourish; and, unseen, be great;
To give domestic life its sweetest charm,
With softness polish, and with virtue warm;
Fearful of fame, unwilling to be known,
Should seek but Heaven's applauses, and her own;
Should dread no blame, but that which crimes impart,
The censures of a self-condemning heart.

Heaven's ministering angel, she should seek the cell
Where modest want and silent anguish dwell;
Raise the weak head, sustain the feeble knees,
Cheer the cold heart, and chase the dire disease.
The splendid deeds which only seek a name,
Are paid their just reward in present fame;
But know the woeful, all disclosing day,
The long arrear of secret worth shall pay;
Applauding saints shall hear with fond regard,
And He, who witnessed here, shall there reward.

The Rev. J. T. Bovill, of the Church of the Holy Apostles, Elsworth, Kansas, has accepted a call to the rectorate of St. Mark's Church, Hope, Arkansas

The Rev. and Mrs. M. M. Hankins are in Little Lock, Arkansas, to spend the winter. The Rev. Mr. Hankins has charge of the church in Longport, New Jersey during the summer months.

The Rev. Edward W. Mellichampe has been called to the rectorate of St. John's Church, Helena, Arkansas. He is at present living at Sewanee, Tennessee.

The Rev. Charles F. Collins, who has been spending several months in Corpus Christi, Texas, for the benefit of his health, is returning to his home in Arkansas immediately much improved.

ORDINATIONS.

The Rev. Richard P. McClintock and the Rev. Charles A. Clough, Jr., were ordained to the priesthood by Bishop Slattery at ten o'clock on the morning of St. Thomas' Day, Saturday, December 21, in St. Paul's Cathedral, Boston.

The Rev. Ralph M. Harper, rector of St. John's Church, Winthrop, Massachusetts, presented Mr. McClintock, and the Rev. Dr. J. H. Cabot, rector of St. Peter's Church in Weston, Massachusetts, was Mr. Clough's presenter.

Both men graduated from the Episcopal Theological School in Cambridge last June. Since June Mr. McClintock has been in charge of St. Paul's Church in Lancaster, New Hampshire, and after his ordination, will continue his work there. Mr. Clough is to be the assistant minister of Trinity Church, New York City.

The Rev. Frederic W. Fitts, President of the Standing Committee and rector of St. John's Church, Roxbury, preached the sermon.

Mr. George G. Guinnest, of the staff of St. Mark's Church, Washington, D. C., was recently ordained deacon by the Rt. Rev. Philip M. Rhinelander, D. D., at St. Mark's Church.

Mr. Edward Rockne Hardy, Jr., M. A., a tutor in the General Theological Seminary, was ordained deacon by the Rt. Rev. Arthur S. Lloyd, D. D., Suffragan Bishop of New York, on St. Thomas' Day, December 21, 1929, in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine. Bishop Lloyd also preached the sermon and celebrated the Holy Communion.

Mr. Frederick Vernon Holmes was ordained deacon on Wednesday, December 18, 1929, in St. Paul's Church, Bloomsburg, Pennsylvania, by the Rt. Rev. James H. Darlington, Ph. D., D. D., LL. D., D. C. T., Bishop of Harrisburg. The candidate was presented by the rector of the parish, the Rev. Thomas J. Heistand. The Rev. Dr. Lewis G. Morriss, rector of Calvary Parish, Germantown, Pa., preached the ordination sermon. The epistoler was the Rev. A. G. E. Jenner, of Danville, the Gospel being read by the newly-ordained deacon. The Litany was read by the Rev. Robert T. McCutchen, of Shamokin. The Rev. Louis D. Gottshall, of Berwick, acted as master of ceremonies. Other clergy present were the Rev. Hollis W. Colwell, the Rev. Squire Schofield, and the Rev. Father Lubeck, pastor of the Russian Orthodox Church, in Berwick, Pa.

The Rev. Mr. Holmes was formerly a Methodist minister.

Mr. Donald Cecil Means, was ordained to the diaconate in Gethsemane Church, Minneapolis, Minnesota, on December 23, by the Rt. Rev. F. A. McElwain, D. D., Bishop of Minnesota. The candidate was presented by the Rev. D. F. Fenn, rector of Gethsemane Church, who also preached the sermon. The Litany was read by the Rev. George Buzzelle, rector of St. Andrew's Church, Minneapolis, and the Epistle was read by the Rev. Hubert G. Wrinch, assistant rector of Gethsemane Church.

Both men will continue their studies at Nashotah Seminary until the month of May, 1930.

AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY

By REV. EDWIN NOAH HARDY, Ph. D.
Executive Secretary

OBJECT AND ORGANIZATION

The American Tract Society was organized in New York City May 11, 1825. It was a merger for greater efficiency of some fifty local and sectarian societies.

For a century it has followed with undeviating loyalty its two-fold object, to diffuse a knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ as the Redeemer of man and to promote the interest of vital godliness and sound morality by the publication and distribution of Christian literature.

It is inter-denominational in character, evangelical in principle, inter-racial in purpose, and international in scope. It ministers to all classes and conditions of people in many languages just where the need is greatest.

It publishes and distributes the choicest literature upon the leading subjects of Christian thought, from the leaflet tract, the finished book and hymnal in many languages to the best one-volume "Bible With Notes" printed. It specializes in work among the foreign-speaking people of America, counteracting atheistic tendencies. It stresses work among the great segregated classes, soldiers, sailors, miners, lumber-jacks, etc. It ministers to those in prison, in the hospital, in the "Home," to the child, the aged, the tempted and all those who are heavy laden.

For a century it has been the champion of the sympathetic proclamation of the Gospel on the printed page. It has printed and distributed the Gospel message in 179 languages and dialects. Multitudes have been won to Christ, extensive revivals started, Sunday Schools established, churches organized, communities transformed by its literature and colporteurs.

THE EVOLUTION OF THE SOCIETY'S ACTIVITIES

Actual religious needs have always determined the Society's activities. From an exclusive tract issue the Society has developed its activities into nearly every form of publication. From English its publications have become polyglot. From the local and national it has become world-wide in operation, appropriating $805,916.49 for Christian literature in pagan lands. It has met and kept pace with the increase of immigration, establishing a library at Ellis Island and distributing gratuitously over 200,000 pieces of literature there annually.

The Society has systematized the distribution of its literature. First by a home-to-home tract circulation which led to a nation-wide revival. Then a volume campaign to place a worthwhile book in every American home. In 1841 missionary colportage was inaugurated. These colporteurs afoot, horseback, by boat, carriage and automobile have visited 25,000,000 families, conducted 600,000 religious services, and distributed about 18,000,000 volumes and innumerable tracts. For fifty-six years the Society has presented a beautiful Bible to each graduate of West Point. It has published twelve periodicals with an immense circulation. It has issued hymn books in many languages. It has gratuitously distributed $2,873,884.34 worth of literature, the equivalent in value of 5,542,522,722 pages of tracts. The Society has ardently advocated church union while demonstrating its effectiveness. It has been the champion of Sabbath observance, of the Bible, of temperance, of chastity, of good citizenship, and of all our cherished American institutions.

PRESENT OUTLOOK

The Society, one of the oldest religious organizations of the country, has so adapted its work to the changing needs of each generation that to-day it is free from debt, has a substantial endowment, conducts its manifold operations on the best approved business principles and is stronger and more vigorous than it has been for decades, and is rendering to the cause of Christ and good citizenship some of the finest service of its history. It is well located and splendidly equipped to meet the present-day challenge of atheistic organizations and their widespread propaganda against Christian institutions.

The Society depends upon the contributions of churches and individuals for the maintenance and increase of its indispensable services. It issues Annuity Bonds of exceptional value and asks for generous consideration in the making of wills and annual offerings. The increased demand for the Society's literature to meet the urge of the appalling need requires an enlarged revenue.

FOR THE DAY OF THE EPIPHANY

Matthew 2:2
For we have seen His star in the East and are come to worship Him.

TRUTH, THAT LIGHT OF HEAVEN figured by the star which on this day appears to the Magi, is the only thing here below worthy of the cares and the researches of man. IT ALONE IS THE LIGHT OF OUR MIND, THE RULE OF OUR HEART, THE SOURCE OF SOLID JOYS, THE FOUNDATION OF OUR HOPES, THE CONSOLATION OF OUR FEARS, THE ALLEVIATION OF OUR EVILS, THE CURE FOR ALL OUR AFFLICTIONS; IT ALONE IS THE REFUGE OF THE GOOD CONSCIENCE, AND THE TERROR OF THE BAD, THE INWARD PUNISHMENT OF VICE, THE INTERNAL RECOMPENSE OF VIRTUE; IT ALONE IMMORTALIZES THOSE WHO LOVE IT, AND RENDERS ILLUSTRIOUS THE CHAINS OF THOSE WHO SUFFER FOR IT, ATTRACTS PUBLIC HONORS TO THE ASHES OF ITS MARTYRS AND DEFENDERS, AND BESTOWS RESPECTABILITY ON THE ABJECTION AND THE POVERTY OF THOSE WHO HAVE QUITTED ALL TO FOLLOW IT; ALL OUR ZEAL TO DEFEND IT; in men we ought then to look only for truth, to have no wish of pleasing them but by truth, to esteem in them only truth, and to be resolved that they shall never please us but by it; in a word, it would appear that it should have only to show itself, as on this day to the magi, to be loved; and that it shows us to ourselves in order to teach us to know ourselves.

Nevertheless, it is astonishing what different impressions the same truth makes upon men. To some it is a light which directs the steps, and, in pointing out their duty, renders it amiable to them; to others it is a troublesome light, and, as it were, a kind of dazzling, which vexes and fatigues them; lastly, to many it is a thick mist which irritates, inflames them with rage, and completes their blindness. It is the same star which, on this day, appears in the firmament; the magi see it; the priests of Jerusalem know that it is foretold in the prophets; Herod can no longer doubt that it hath appeared, seeing wise men come from the extremities of the east, to seek, guided by its light, the new King of the Jews. Nevertheless, how dissimilar are the dispositions with which they receive the same truth manifested to them.

But, my brethren, "the kingdom of God cometh not with observation." Truth is not the fruit of controversy and dispute, but of tears and groanings; it is by purifying our heart in meditation and in prayer that we alone must expect, like the magic, the light of heaven, and to become worthy of distinguishing and knowing it.

* * * * *

New disposition, sufficiently rare among believers. Alas! we find not the truth, because we never seek it with sincere and upright heart; we diffuse a kind of mist over every attempt to find it, which conceals it from our view; we consult, but we place our passions in so favorable a light, we hold them out in colors so softened, and so similar to the truth, that we procure a reply of it being really so; we wish not to be instructed, we wish to be deceived, and to add, to the passion which enslaves us, an authority which may calm us.

* * * * *

Thus in vain doth the light of heaven, a thousand times intrude upon us, and point out the ways in which we ought to go; the very first glance which we afterwards cast upon the example of others who live like us, revives us, and spreads a fresh mist over our heart. In those fortunate moments when we consult the whole truth of our own conscience, we condemn ourselves; we tremble over a futurity, we promise to ourselves a new life, yet a moment after when returned to the world, and no longer consulting but the general example, we justify ourselves, and regain that false security which we had lost.

* * * * *

WE CANNOT COMPREHEND THAT TO WORK OUT OUR SALVATION IS TO DISTINGUISH OURSELVES FROM THE REST OF MEN, IS TO LIVE SINGLE AMIDST THE MULTITUDE, IS TO BE AN INDIVIDUAL SUPPORTER OF OUR OWN CAUSE, IN THE MIDST OF A WORLD WHICH EITHER CONDEMNS OR DESPISES US; IS, IN A WORD, TO COUNT EXAMPLES AS NOTHING, AND TO BE AFFECTED BY OUR DUTY ALONE.

* * * * *

Where are the souls who, like the magi, after having once known the truth, never afterwards wish to see but it alone, having no longer eyes for the world, for its empty pleasures, or for the vanity of its pompous shows, who feel no delight but in the contemplation of truth, in making it their resource in every affliction, the spur of their indolence; their succor against temptation; and the purest delight of their soul? And how vain, puerile and disgusting doth the world, with all its pleasures, hopes and grandeurs, indeed appear to the soul who hath known thee, O my God! and who hath felt the truth of thine eternal promises; to a soul who feels that whatever is not Thee is unworthy of him, and who considers the earth only as the country of those who must perish forever! Nothing is consolatory to him but what opens the prospect of real and lasting riches; nothing appears worthy of his regard but what is to endure forever; nothing has the power of pleasing him but what shall eternally please him; nothing is longer capable of attracting him but that which he is no more to lose and all the trifling objects of vanity are no longer on his part, but the embarrassments of his piety.—Masillon, the great French Roman Catholic priest.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

If I have strength, I owe the service of the strong.

Life is too short for any vain regretting,
Soon golden noontide fades to evening glow,
Oh, sweeter far will be our sun's last setting
If malice gone, our souls are white as snow.
Then purified, let us go on forgetting,
The injury, the needless anxious fretting,
Forgiving and forgiven, only letting
God's precious love in thought and mercy flow.

—B. M. Swope.

They on the heights are not souls
Who never erred nor went astray;
Who trod unswerving toward their goals
Along a smooth rose-bordered way.
Nay—those who stand, where first comes dawn.
Are those who stumbled, but went on.

Human beings are not made good to order by being pressed and moulded into shape like bricks. To save the world the law of God must become the law of man's inner being, the expression of man's own true life. This is just what the Gospel of Christ declares itself able to effect.—Rev. R. J. Campbell.

It is not the multitude or the earnestness of your words in which prayer has its power, but in the living faith that God Himself is taking you and your prayer into His loving heart. He Himself will give you the assurance that in His time your prayers will be heard. —Andrew Murray.

If this whole world followed you—
Followed to the letter—
Would it be a nobler world,
All deceit and falsehood hurled
From it altogether;
Malice, selfishness, and lust
Banished from beneath the crust
Covering human hearts from view—
Tell me, if it followed you,
Would the world be better?

—Selected.

"Long ages came and went;
And sick, with hope deferred,
Israel's voice grew faint; she seemed
Unnoticed and unheard.
At length to her a child was born,
At length a Son was given;
The dayspring broke on earth,
And love came down from heaven."

SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN

Catholic for every truth of God; Protestant against every error of man.

EDITORIALS

Vol. 95. RICHMOND, VA., JANUARY 11, 1930. No. 2.

PITCH

In The Southern Churchman of January 4, was a letter from the Rev. Thomas F. Opie, of Burlington, North Carolina, accusing The Churchman of unfairness and intolerance in its comments on the refusal of the Bishop of New York to sanction administration of the Holy Communion in St. George's Church, New York City, by the Rev. Henry Sloane Coffin, under auspices of the Christian Unity League.

The question of Christian unity is difficult. Unfortunately, some Christian denominations represent doctrines, opinions and beliefs directly antagonistic to those held by other denominations. Roman Catholics, clinging to faith in transubstantiation and worship of saints, could not consistently invite to conduct services for them Protestants, who regard such faith and worship as superstitions. Protestants have like objection to seeking administrations in one of their churches by a Roman Catholic priest. Baptists would resent attempt to occupy their pulpits by clergymen maintaining that immersion is not requisite for salvation. Episcopalians frequently revere and love clergy of other denominations, but have logical scruples against officiation in their chancels of gentlemen who scoff at apostolic succession and the Thirty-Nine Articles. Presbyterians demand leadership in their most solemn and sacred rites by adherents of the Westminster Confession, the longer and shorter catechisms and the doctrine of election. It is entirely possible some of these organizations of Christians may be led to adjust their differences and unite their forces. Progress to that blessed and most desirable end has been made. Overtures have been presented with appropriate formalities and dignity and received kindly. The old rancours, jealousies and bitterness have gone. The unions, if directed by the mercy of the Almighty to come, will be through prayerful, earnest, deliberate conferences of the trusted and duly constituted authorities, by mutual concessions on non-essentials and very faithful striving and study by devout men. They can not be attained by loose, unauthorized, random gatherings and frothy harangues apparently intended to make startling newspaper headlines.

Whether the Bishop of New York intended his prohibition of administration of the Sacrament to apply to all non-Episcopalians or only to Dr. Coffin, the nominal Presbyterian, is not known here. Dr. Coffin is most prominent member of the faculty of Union Theological Seminary, an institution boastfully and somewhat noisily "liberal". The masses of the people at the North are quiet, well bred, well behaved, modest, industrious and valuable and faithful citizens of the United States. Among them, however, is, and long has been, an element in which Puritan intensity has been filtered and polluted, through generations of increasing ease and indolence and vanity and enervating culture, to attenuation of thought and acidulation of emotion. Also, there are cow pea mentalities cursed with hot house cultivation, so that neither the wholesome nourishment of the sturdy and homely cow pea nor the beauty and fragrance of the delicately pampered flower is developed. The result frequently is the putting forth of pale, puny tendrils of speculation, ready to twine on any poisonous or repulsive weed and struggling always toward the one light they crave—that of publicity. Such elements were expressed in the treasonable Hartford Convention of 1814, in denunciation of the Constitution of the United States as a covenant with death and league with hell, in the Oneida community, free love farms, communism, distorted socialism, atheism, impious perversions and desecrations of Christianity and religion, concerted efforts to protect anarchist murderers from just punishment. These elements incited and fostered the fury that brought the Civil War. In recent years they have been re-enforced and made more virulent and dangerous by importations of foreign and intrinsically and incurably alien foreign philosophies and expounders of them, products of centuries of repression and enforced inferiority making instinctive hate of all established order, authority and law, Divine and secular. Some of the philosophies so born are bestially gross, others, affecting ultra refinement, leading by gossamer threads of fancy to faint wisps of mist.

Here in the South we have had our own follies, vices, fanaticisms, bigotries. We have been blest with adversities, humiliations, tribulations, and with the courage and understanding to learn from them. The masses of us are God fearing, God serving, patriotic, diligently working and building, strenuously hostile to those who, because of distempered minds, inborn viciousness or childish longing to be noticed, endeavor to tear down, destroy, disrupt. We have learned to be guided by common sense, facts and our best traditions and to be in cordial accord with the multitudes of our own kind at the North. The Southern Churchman, knowing and sincerely respecting the fine qualities of the great body of our fellow citizens beyond the Potomac, regrets earnestly any countenance or aid by Southern clergymen to representatives of native decadence and imported blasphemies, heresies and lunacies. The observations of The Churchman on the unhappy, somewhat ridiculous, disorderly and sensational episode of the round robin to the Bishop and attending circumstances were not intended as an attack on Mr. Opie, as that gentleman, to our regret, regards them. They were submitted as kindly warning and advice. Mr. Opie bears, doubtless worthily, a name justly honored in Virginia. The Southern Churchman knows it voices the feeling and sound judgment of the Southern Church people when it disapproves and mourns appearance of our Bible bred, Bible led, clergymen as appendages to the tail of Dr. Coffin's fantastical hot air kite and in association with his fopperies and struttings and theological and sociological meanderings.

Every Southern Episcopalian clergyman has a man size job in his own parish, including preparation of sermons going straight to the point, invariably saying something, appealing to heart and brain, arousing soul and conscience, holding the laity to its duty—work demanding time and thought and patient effort. All of them have plenty to do without invading other dioceses to participate in nebulous enterprises and innovations under strange and more than dubious leadership. The touching of pitch is to be avoided until the adventure is obviously and unavoidably necessary in line of duty.

Since the above was written the daily newspapers bring a new warning to Southern clergy and Church people against association with or countenance of the Rev. Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin, his Union Theological Seminary, or any of his works or activities.

According to the newspapers, the Intercollegiate Winter Conference of the League for Industrial Democracy was in session at the Union Theological Seminary—where Southern Episcopal clergymen received Holy Communion from Dr. Coffin after that all around reformer had been forbidden from St. George's—on December 27. Of 735 listed colleges and universities in the country, but twenty-five were represented at the conference. This is not an impressive or alarming proportion, but the ideas and purposes of the League are indicated by the reported speeches and addresses. Prof. Louis Bader, New York University; Dr. Harry Laidler, director of the League, and A. J. Muste, of the Conference for Progressive Labor Action—observe the names and organizations—united in denouncing the management and conduct of the textile industry at the South. Robert Moore Lovett, Sarah Bernheim and Forrest Bailey, other speakers, joined in the denunciations.

Prof. Bader, the New York philosopher, contended that government regulation of the industry was the one hope for making conditions fit his notions of propriety. The other heavy thinkers and ready orators seem to have agreed with this remedial prescription.

All who respect the Constitution of the United States and approve our republican form of government and the principles on which it is established as the best government the world ever has known must unite in contemptuous resentment against the doctrine put forth by the New York professor and his endorsers and associates, gathered at Dr. Coffin's Union Theological Seminary and, it seems fair to suppose sanctioned, or, at least, tolerated, by that much "advanced" institution. Republicans, Democrats, citizens of North and South, must realize that government control of a great industry would mean inevitably confiscation of property representing savings, generous public spirit and enterprise and hopes of thousands of investors and centralization of power for creation of a self-perpetuating, irresponsible, irresistible despotism. Such suggestion is abhorrent to every tradition and instinct of the real American, especially the Southern American, with inherited reverence for rights of the States and of person and property.

Surely, none of our Southern people respecting themselves and the religious and political ideals they represent can permit themselves to be identified, in any way, with individuals like Dr. Coffin, or the members of the various leagues, associations and combinations with which he is in energetic alliance. The uncleanliness of this religiously and politically unclean thing becomes more and more obvious and the evil and peril of touching or mingling with it more obnoxious as information accumulates.

OBERAMMERGAU TODAY

SO universal is the interest in the unique and great event of the Passion Play at Oberammergau that magazines of both religious and secular nature have been carrying accounts. The first of the two following was written by Lilian T. Mowrer in "Town and Country," published in the United States; the second by the special correspondent for "The Guardian", Church of England weekly, published in London:

"In the village of Oberammergau in the Bavarian Alps, in a setting as picturesque as only centuries of unchanged tradition can make it, the greatest preparations are being made for the Passion Play, which is to be given early in 1930, and more than the usual excitement was shown at the elections of the parts last week, for nearly all the chief roles had to be recast.

For three hundreds years—ever since this tiny village made its vow to recount the story of the Passion each decade if only it were spared the menace of the plague—Oberammergau has dedicated its gifts to its great Passion Play. Only those born in the village can take part in the drama and from January to May, when the first performance takes place, you can hear the villagers—who in sign of their 'vocation' let their hair grow long—learning their words, rehearsing their parts, singing, making music, dedicating the hard-earned leisure of their evenings to the great work. Not only must the drama be prepared—the village itself must be made ready to receive the hundreds and thousands of visitors who flock to the spectacle, so that its two thousand or so inhabitants have plenty to do before spring.

The impersonators of the chief characters are elected by secret vote by a committee of twenty-one. Directly after matins the committee repairs to the Rathaus, where, after the singing of the Te Deum, the votes are taken and counted. One could not be a day in the village without feeling the great undercurrent of suspense; this drama is such a vital part of the life—expression of these peasants that again and again one heard: "If so-and-so is not elected it will be his end." Anton Lang, the wood carver, who played the part of Christ in 1900, 1910, 1922, is now fifty-five years old, and can no longer stand the strain of so exhausting a role; his successor, elected almost unanimously, is Alois Lang, a distant relative, also a wood carver. The new Christ received the announcement of his election with almost ecstatic joy; he is a man of thirty-eight and a great craftsman. A life-size crucifix which he has just finished shows his more than usual artistic ability. For the role of Mary there were three candidates, and perhaps the greatest surprise this year was the election of the twenty-three-year-old Anni Rutz, whose name only came under consideration during the last few days. The girl, since the sudden death of her father two years ago, won a great deal of respect and admiration by the gallant manner in which she went to work and kept the little family going, but it was her younger sister who had been a favorite candidate until the day of the election.

Hansi Preysinger, the red cheeked, dark haired, daughter of a local inkeeper, had been a possible Mary, and so great was her agitation that she fled to Munich on the eventful day and only returned when she heard that she had been assigned the part of Mary Magdalen. She is perhaps the most gifted dramatically, although Anni has a very fine contralto voice and speaks beautiful High German. Guido Mayer is again to play Judas, while Anton Lang is to speak the prologue.

George Lang, a sculptor, will once more be responsible for the whole production and more than a million marks have been spent on enlarging and bettering the stage, which now consists of ten movable platforms; on providing for an orchestra which, in case of rain, can be sheltered and still heard; on extending the seating capacity so that it will accommodate five thousand two hundred visitors."

THE PLAYERS AT HOME.

"Oberammergau, October 28.—If it were not some fresh snow upon the mountains and the signs of time upon the tree, it would be easy to imagine that summer was still prevailing here. Each day sees eight hours of sunshine, and this enables the villagers to go forward with their preparations for next year. In some cases whole families are busy painting walls and doorways, and reviving the furniture which has not been used since 1922.

The great centre of activity is the theatre. It was never, to quote the words of an opponent of the Play, 'a glorified marquee', but it was in the nature of a temporary structure. The whole thing has been strengthened and new seating added.

The outdoor stage is much larger than it was, and the inner stage, upon which the Old Testament tableaux and the Crucifixion take place, is deeper. George Lang, the producer, is working night and day with his brother, who is responsible for the technical changes.

Anton Lang will play the part of Christ no more, but he is still the outstanding personality here. The new Christus is a formidable being, and he may step into his shoes eventually, but at the moment there is only one "Her Lang". He very kindly gave up a whole morning to me. His spare figure and thoughtful face belong to a man who has been through a good deal in his fifty-six years. Yet in spite of the demands of a great part and the annoyance caused by ignorant criticism, Anton Lang preserves his sense of humor and kindly manner.

The new Christus is a giant with a magnificent head and a commanding voice. And there is almost more than a twinkle in his kindly eye. He showed me a large crucifix which he is making for the outside of his own house. He has not been prominent in the Passion Play before, but his talent has been noted in smaller plays and his fine appearance no one could overlook. Beside him stood another giant with a fine head, but no beard. This was Hans Lang, the son of the village doctor, who is to be the new St. John. His two brothers, he told me, have gone into their father's profession, but he has adopted the village industry of carving. There was a calm dignity and manliness about this young man and one imagines that no better choice could have been made.

My host was Guido Mayr, an eminent carver, who is to be Judas for a second time. One evening I took the younger members of the Mayr family to buy some chocolate. A girl of middle height and quiet demeanor served me with what I wanted. Then I suddenly recognized her as the Mary of 1930. She works in the day time as a typist to a saw mill in Unter-Ammergau, but is giving up her post because many people want to see her and it is better to be in her home. And of course in the near future rehearsals will begin in earnest. I asked my companion, Klara Mayr, whether she would be paid during the months which are ahead, but I was given to understand that no payments will be made until the Play is over and the prospects of receiving even a moderate reward then are very small because the new theatre is to be the first charge upon the proceeds. This must bear hardly on some people, and among them Anni Rutz. She has no father and the little sweetshop cannot be a very profitable concern.

Johanna Presinger, who is commonly called Hansi, is somewhat differently placed. She comes from the Alten Post, where her family has carried on a successful business for many years. She has a strong face with good features. She should be a very striking Mary Magdalene. When I saw her standing to be photographed by Alois Lang I realized what a tall man he is. She is of middle height, but she looked a child beside the principal

Any little disappointments have been laid aside already and all the villagers speak kindly of each other. They are an unusual people eminently fitted for the great work God has called upon them to perform."

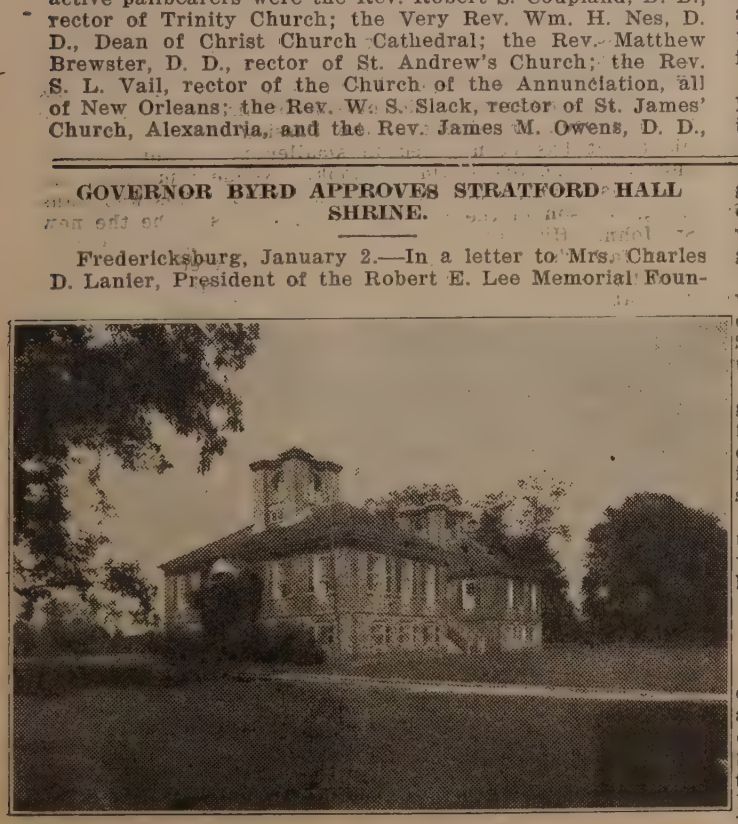
RIGHT REVEREND DAVIS SESSUMS, D. D.

By F. H. G. Fry

OUR deeply beloved Bishop is dead. Seated on his front gallery, at about 4 P. M., on Christmas Eve, looking over some official papers, he was seized with a sudden pain and before medical aid could be obtained he heard the call of his Master and his soul was taken to his Eternal Home. His death was ascribed by the physicians to angina pectoris. His death came as a shock to all who knew him. He had appeared to be enjoying good health and on the night previous to his death he had returned from an official visit to Bastrop in Northern Louisiana, where he had been conducting services. He was to have celebrated the Holy Communion on Christmas morning at Christ Church Cathedral. The body was taken to the Cathedral at 11 A. M., on December 26, where it laid in state until the funeral on the next day. Many hundreds of communicants of the Episcopal Church and friends of the Bishop from all walks of life viewed the body, two ministers keeping a vigil, one at the head and the other at the foot of the bier.

Funeral services were held in the Cathedral on December 27, at 11 A. M. The service proper was preceded by a celebration of the Holy Communion at ten o'clock, in which the Rt. Rev. Thomas F. Gailor, D. D., Bishop of Tennesee, was the celebrant; the Rt. Rev. H. J. Mikell, D. D., Bishop of Atlanta, the Epistolator, and the Rt. Rev. Theodore D. Bratton, D. D., Bishop of Mississippi, reader of the Gospel; the Rt. Rev. Wm. Mercer Green, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of Mississippi, also participating. Before this communion service was concluded every seat in the Cathedral was taken and men and women were standing in the aisles and back of the edifice. At eleven o'clock the organ began to play Chopin's Funeral March and the casket was borne down the aisle. The processional hymn, "The Son of God Goes Forth to War", was sung by a choir of about sixty voices, composed of members of choirs from all the city churches. Bishop Gailor read the beautiful lesson, at the conclusion of which he recited the poem, "Crossing the Bar", with deep feeling and, as he came to the last lines, his voice was scarcely audible. Interment followed at the Metairie Cemetery, where the concluding service was read by Bishop Green. About one hundred and fifty automobiles followed the funeral cortege. The active pallbearers were the Rev. Robert S. Coupland, D. D., rector of Trinity Church; the Very Rev. Wm. H. Nes, D. D., Dean of Christ Church Cathedral; the Rev. Matthew Brewster, D. D., rector of St. Andrew's Church; the Rev. S. L. Vail, rector of the Church of the Annunciation, all of New Orleans; the Rev. W. S. Slack, rector of St. James' Church, Alexandria, and the Rev. James M. Owens, D. D., rector of St. Mark's Church, Shreveport. The honorary pallbearers were composed of the clergy of the diocese, the Hon. J. Zach Spearing, Chancellor of the Diocese; Warren Kearny, W. B. Machado and R. P. Mead, lay members of the Standing Committee of the diocese, and the wardens of all the parishes and missions of the diocese. In the congregation were many clergymen of other denominations, leading citizens of the city and members of the City Commission Council. The chancel of the cathedral was one mass of beautiful floral offerings, one of which was a huge cross made of white flowers, sent by the clergy of the diocese.

Bishop Sessums was born on July 7, 1858, in Houston, Texas, and thus attained the ripe age of seventy-one years. He was a graduate of the University of the South at Sewanee, Tennessee, where he was a classmate of Bishop Gailor, and they remained close friends all during their lives. Bishop Sessums was a member of the first Master of Arts Class to be graduated from the University of the South in 1878. He was ordained to the priesthood at Galveston, Texas, in 1882, by the late Bishop Gregg of Texas, and was made assistant rector of Grace Church, Galveston, the following year. The same year he was called as assistant rector to Calvary Church, Memphis, where he remained until 1887, when he accepted the rectorship of Christ Church, New Orleans, Louisiana. In June, 1891, he was elected assistant Bishop to the Rt. Rev. J. N. Galleher, D. D., Bishop of Louisiana, and, upon the death of the latter in December of the same year, he succeeded to the bishopric.



He is survived by his widow, daughter of the late Bishop Galleher, by a daughter, Mrs. Walter Goldstein, and by a son, Cleveland Sessums, now a Professor of English at Johns Hopkins University.

Not only has the Diocese of Louisiana sustained a great loss in the death of Bishop Sessums, but the entire Church mourns his passing. Endowed by nature with rare oratorical genius, gifted with great personal magnetism and intellect, he was esteemed and revered throughout the length and breadth of the country. No prelate of the Church has enjoyed in a higher degree the affection of its clergy and laity and the respect and admiration of the community at large. Ever considerate of the material, as well as the spiritual welfare of his clergy, always ready to aid them in their difficulties, he was indeed a Father in God to each and every one of them.

While the members of this diocese deeply mourn the loss they have sustained, they thank God for having given them such a noble and wonderful leader for so long.

GOVERNOR BYRD APPROVES STRATFORD HALL SHRINE.

Fredericksburg, January 2.—In a letter to Mrs. Charles D. Lanier, President of the Robert E. Lee Memorial Foundation, Governor Harry Flood Byrd today gave his hearty approval to the campaign in Virginia for funds to preserve Stratford Hall, home of the Lees in Westmoreland County, as a permanent shrine in memory of General Robert E. Lee who was born in the historic mansion.

Stratford Hall, Built 1729.

Governor Byrd said that he spoke both as Governor of Virginia and personally. He expressed the hope that Virginians would not prove slow in contributing to the cause of saving Stratford, and extended the Foundation good wishes on behalf of the people of the Commonwealth of Virginia.

Governor Byrd wrote: "In connection with the campaign which is to open up in Virginia with the New Year to secure funds for the acquisition of the historic Lee estate of Stratford, allow me, as Governor of Virginia and personally, to wish you every success.

"Already donations to this fund have been received in generous measure from points outside of Virginia, and I feel confidence in the prediction that Virginia, the home of the immortal Southern leader, will not prove backward in her contribution to the cause which you so ably represent.

"Permit me to wish you every success in your undertaking and to extend to you, on behalf of the Commonwealth of Virginia, every best wish for a prosperous and a happy year.

"Very respectfully yours, (Signed) "Harry F. Byrd.

Generous contributions have begun to come in and leaders today expressed confidence that this State would lead all others in the sum raised, if the general public will contribute, no matter how small the sum each person gives. Some large donations have already been made. Among those listed so far as giving a thousand dollars are: Eppa Hunton, Richmond, $1,000; Mrs. Granville G. Valentine, Richmond, $1,000; Mr. Granville G. Valentine, Richmond, $1,000; Lady Nancy Astor, formerly of El Mirador, Virginia, $1,000; City of Fredericksburg, through Mrs. Marion Willis, Committee Chairman, $1,000.

Plans of the Memorial Foundation to make Stratford Hall a Shrine in Memory of General Lee have been endorsed by the Confederate Veterans, the Sons of Veterans, the Colonial Dames, the Daughters of the American Revolution, the Association for the Preservation of Virginia Antiquities and other organizations. The D. A. R., the U. D. C., the Colonial Dames, and the Garden Club of Virginia, have pledged large sums for the completion of the project.

Forty Committees, supported by newspapers all over the State, are today making a concerted effort to awaken the interest of the public and to secure some contributions from every possible person so that every Virginian may have a part in creating the most beautiful shrine in America, in memory of Virginia's great son. On January 19, one hundred and twenty-third anniversary of the birth of General Lee, the amount secured will be announced and together with contributions previously made will be used to make another substantial payment of Stratford, for which a $50,000 initial payment was made in July.

A CHURCH WITHOUT VISION

By the Reverend J. J. Clopton

TODAY, and for many months, we have heard of cuts in the "Missionary Budget." In spite of the loyalty of many, both in moderate, poor and rich circumstances, the spectre of cuts in missionary salaries haunts us. Why? Because the Church, as an entity, has lost her vision. Evangelism is the breath of her life. Twice before His Ascension, in the forty days sojourn among His Disciples, Christ commissioned them and their successors, not only to carry His Gospel to those at home, but to those at the ends of the earth. "But ye shall receive power, after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you: and ye shall be witnesses unto me both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the utmost part of the earth." "Again, "Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." And this Great Commission was backed up with Omnipotent Power. "And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth."

We have not to look far within our beloved Church for the reason we have lost the Vision of Evangelism. It is caused by deadly parochialism. The parish is primarily the treasury into which the greater part of our offerings go. The parish must have a new organ, or a new carpet, or cushioned seats, or a magnificent temple, or jeweled crosses, or jeweled candlesticks, or jeweled chalices. But shall not the Church observe the law of Proportion? Shall she not remember that ornaments, less ornate, and lives more sacrificial, are more acceptable to God, than beautiful and expensive adornment of the parish church, and little or no financial interest in the Church's great program? A parish with a full program for self, and crumbs for Evangelism, is totally wanting in spiritual emphasis.

The Protestant Episcopal Church is probably the richest corporation in the United States, potentially and actually. Its program of parochial expansion for last year, 1928, was $25,000,000. Its terms of parochial expansion, measured by single items, ranged from a few hundreds to a few millions. At the same time there were several cuts in the already meagre budget for the Church's work for Domestic and World Evangelism.

We do not grasp the "Why" of Evangelism. Primarily, Christ's parting commands. Then His life as a Great Missionary Adventure. Once His enthusiastic hearers would detain Him, but He answered His mission was also "to the villages beyond." One of His greatest utterances seemed to focus itself on World Evangelism, as He broke through the barriers of narrow Judaism, and proclaims, "Other sheep I have which are not of this fold; them I must bring, and they shall hear my voice, that there may be one fold and one Shepherd.' Again, as He looked out with sympathetic eyes on a great multitude, He proclaimed, "The Harvest is great, but the Laborers are few. Pray ye therefore to the Lord of the harvest that he will send laborers into His harvest." He sent forth two bands of workers, the seventy and the eleven. The name He gave the Master Builders of His Church was Missionaries. The Greek word "Apostle" is the equivalent of the Anglicized form of the Latin word, Missionary, the root of which is To send. So by His life of self-sacrificing doing, by His constant teaching to His Disciples, by His commissioning two bands of workers, He proclaimed His Church's Mission, Evangelism.

What of the "How" of Missions? It is summed up in three terms—Prayer, Information, Self-giving. Suppose each Christian would pray daily, "Thy Kingdom come; Thy will be done on earth as in heaven?" Would there not be answers in our own lives hastening to answer by gifts of self, of service, of money?

Many Christians are not larger in their spiritual vision than a parish, because they will not inform themselves. Many rectors do not instruct their flocks. Many Bishops have a perfunctory, rather than a vital interest, in any program larger than their diocese.

Can any one read the "Spirit of Missions" without being fired with zeal to promote the work of the Kingdom? There we read the current biographies of self-sacrificing men and women of every name, who are making spiritual history and world history. There the helpless, sightless, multitudes cry out for spiritual food, and our rich Church takes no notice commensurate with need. Drop one of your secular papers, and for less than one-third of a cent a day try this thrilling bulletin of the far-flung battle line; at home and abroad. A dollar sent to 281 Fourth Avenue, New York, will bring you twelve issues of thrilling news of what that part of Christ's Army, the Protestant Episcopal Church, is doing. "The Church at Home," you can get for the asking.

Last of all, the final, "How" is giving. Giving what? Not primarily money, but self. The Church must first express its power in self-giving. Out of it will come money and labor, and every other need. Without it, service is spasmodic, answering to some transient appeal, rather than settled self-surrender. Budgets of service mean over-flowing budgets of money. Shame on our lack of zeal, shame on our niggardliness to measure our service first by money. Look again at this budget, $4,224,670 in exact numbers. Over against that 1,200,000 communicants, and at least 2,000,000 baptized members, over 6,000 clergy, and 135 active Bishops.

In 1821, when the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society was organized, its Constitution made every baptized member of the Church a member. That is the Christ idea, he made his whole Church a great missionary society.

Let us for a moment look at the budget. Its annual amount is $4,224,670, for the triennium, 1929-1930-1931. Did adult church members ever think that the National Council counts on the children, in the annual Lenten offering, carrying about one-eighth of this amount?

What we need today is man's red blood vision and not that the women and the children should be counted on and not the whole Church. Let the Bishops of the Church assume their full leadership, and every parish and mission hear from Epihcopal lips, in addition to all other agencies, the Church's Program. Let our metropolitan rectors be "sold" to the idea that Evangelism is the most vital note of their manifold and exacting parochial activities.

Let the whole Church get behind our "General Staff", the National Council, and execute the far-flung strategy of World Evangelism.

Millions are spent on things in the parish that can wait, if deficits are to be thought of. Oh, for the kindling zeal of the great line of missionaries! Christ, the Head of His Church; Paul, Andrew and Peter, John, Polycarp, Iraneus, Columbia, Aiden, Robert Hunt, John Wesley, Robert Carey, Henry Martin, Bishops Hobart, Channing Moore, William Meade, Philander Chase, Henry Whipple, William Hare, Daniel Tuttle and martyred Coleridge Patterson and James Hannington!

The time would fail me to tell of all the others who have a place, equally as honorable, in this great unbroken list.

Let us speak not in terms of deficit, but in terms of advance. Let us rally to the cry:

"Christ for the world we sing,
Christ to the world we bring."

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSE.

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice, eternal treasures, indeed. "Thy word have I hid in my heart, that I might not sin against thee." Ps. 119:11.)

This week the following verse was submitted by

Mrs. Anne R. Finch Frayser, of Fort Harrison, Montana:

"Mine eyes shall be upon the faithful of the land, that they may dwell with me; he that walketh in a perfect way, he shall serve me" (Psalm 101:6).

Who will send one from the far-away places as well as very near us?

LETTER FROM CHINA INLAND MISSION MISSIONARY

Chefoo, N. China, November 12, 1929.

OUR DEAR FRIENDS:

Since the fighting in this neighborhood, reported in my last circular, we have been kept in peace, I am thankful to say, though war, banditry, famine, etc., are still the order of the day in many parts of the country. Civil war has again broken out and there is serious fighting in Honan. Bandits have carried off a number of Chinese Christians, and one of our missionaries, Mr. Pike, has been in their hands for more than a month. A few days ago a business man in Hopei, and a Catholic priest in Hupeh, were also kidnapped. Large areas are still in the grip of famine, and with winter approaching the outlook is terrible to contemplate. One's heart aches to think of the sufferings of the people, and one cries out with the Psalmist: "O Lord, how long?"

In my last circular I mentioned the devastation caused by locusts. At the end of August we had an opportunity of seeing for ourselves what such a plague is like. One day a swarm of locusts flew by. It measured perhaps one hundred yards wide, by a hundred feet thick and took nearly half an hour to pass. To look at an object through this swarm, was like looking through a snow or hail storm, with snowflakes or hailstones of enormous size. The rustling of the wings could also be distinctly heard. It resembled the noise of fire (Joel 2:5). Fortunately they did not settle in our immediate neighborhood in any alarming numbers, but still we saw several fields of corn and millet from which every bit of the softer leafy part had been devoured and only the bare, hard stalks remained standing. It gave one a vivid picture of what locusts can do, and reminded one of the aptness of Joel's word: "The land is as a garden of Eden before them, and behind them a desolate wilderness" (Joel 2:3). Although the main army did not settle here, myriads could be seen in the fields, and for some days many people were busy catching them and putting them into bags. My husband saw some boys with a ten-pound sugar bag pretty well filled. He asked: "What are you going to do with them?" "Eat them." "How do you prepare them?" "Pull off legs and wings, fry them in oil, and eat them with a little salt." "Do you like them?" "Yes, they taste good." It reminded one of John the Baptist's fare (Matt. 3:4).

I want to thank those of you who have been praying for the Gospel work among the men of the Asiatic Division of the U. S. Navy, which summers in this port. The ships, mostly destroyers, numbered up to twenty-five and carried a maximum of 2,222 U. S. service men. They lie at anchor in the harbor and make frequent trips to sea for target practice, when, if there is a sea breeze, you can hear guns booming and occasionally our windows rattle in consequence. The men are allowed liberty to come ashore several times a week, if they so desire. The total number of liberties granted while the fleet was here was about 45,000. A large number of cafes and cabarets, with dancing girls from Siberia, were opened here for the occasion. To meet the spiritual needs of these men a Gospel Hall was opened by a group of voluntary workers and services were held there every evening. In giving out invitations on the street, many tracts were also distributed and considerable personal work was done. The results were not as great as we could have wished, yet we rejoice to know that some fifteen or sixteen definitely accepted Christ as their Saviour. In addition, there were quite a few who were more or less deeply impressed. Some confessed that they were slaves to sin and seemed tired of it, but they would not take a stand for Christ. Several officers' children came out brightly for the Lord, and one evening a Chinese gentleman, who speaks English and is employed in one of the local banks, strayed in. He had attended several Mission Schools in past years but was not a Christian. My husband had the privilege of leading him to the Saviour and he afterwards became one of the most regular attendants. He confessed that though he had sat under Christian teaching for years, he had never properly understood the Gospel. He seems to be going on quite nicely. Pray that those who were saved last summer may live a victorious life; that those who are still hesitating may yet come to a decision; and that the Lord may guide and bless in the plans which are already under way for the work next summer (D. V.). Many of these men are very young and have come from Christian homes, but life in the East has many temptations for them.

We had the joy of having our dauhgter Edith with us this summer. Much of the time she gave about three hours a day to the Chinese Hospital. She also frequently gave the ether for operations at the foreign hospital for missionaries and their children. But most of her time was spent in language study, so that she was able to take her second and third examinations while she was here —three exams in eleven months. A week after she reached her station in Shansi—Pingyang—the Women's Hospital was opened, so it is well that these exams are out of the way, for she is now kept busy in the work. Please keep on praying for her that grace and strength for the daily demands may be abundantly given to her by our Father in Heaven.

In my last circular letter, I mentioned the need of a Chinese Christian scholar to help my husband in his work on the Mandarin Bible Commentary. We are thankful to say that the Lord has given us just the man needed in the person of a Mr. Li, a young man who is a member of the Presbyterian Mission. He is a good scholar, who also has a very fair knowledge of the Bible. He seems thoroughly interested and is showing a fine spirit, anxious to further my husband's work in every way to the best of his ability. A Mr. Kuo, also a Christian, is likewise helping as copyist.

Step by step, the Lord led my husband into this commentary work. When we began the Bible Institute, he found that the students could not take in what he taught and take full notes in the cumbersome Chinese character as well, so after the lesson was over he dictated the notes to a quick writer, who put them on the black board, and the students copied them at their leisure. These notes were so appreciated that my husband kept revising them and making them fuller. By and by the work of copying them became rather burdensome, so we got a mimeograph, the students writing the stencils and doing the duplicating. Then the editors of several Christian magazines, seeing my husband's "Bible Reading and Sermon Outline for the Blackboard", which appeared in the weekly, "Chinese Christian Intelligencer" for more than a decade, asked for articles, so his "Expository Notes" were revised, and those on the Gospel were published in "The Bible Magazine", issued by the South China Alliance Press; while those on the Old Testament were published in "The Morning Star", issued here in Chefoo. Beginning at Genesis 1:1, they continued regularly for years until the end of "Joshua" was reached —when my husband found it impossible to give the time to the preparation of further "copy". In the meantime, the Rev. G. A. Clayton, Secretary of the Religious Tract Society for China, saw them and wrote asking that his Society be permitted to publish them in book form. Being anxious to get them printed for our students, my husband welcomed the suggestion, and after they were carefully revised and greatly supplemented their publication as "The Mandarin Bible Commentary" began.

Up to eight or ten years ago the majority of Chinese scholars despised the colloquial style (called Mandarin). The missionaries had long valued it as the best medium for reaching the multitudes, and had not only translated the Bible into it, but had also published many books and tracts in it. But all books and tracts intended for scholars were written in the classical style (called Wenli), and these could not be understood by the common people. Thus it came to pass that what Bible Commentaries were published, were all in Wenli. About ten years ago the new versions of the Chinese Bible in both Wenli and Mandarin, upon which two committees had been laboring many years, were finally completed. This automatically put out of commission all previous commentaries, because they no longer fitted the Bible text. At that same time the Chinese political leaders, realizing that if China did not discard the difficult Wenli style, which required years of effort for its mastery, she could not hope to have her people secure the practical education necessary for political progress, set on foot a movement to popularize the colloquial. Whereas formerly even the smallest pupils were set to the task of memorizing classic after classic which they could not understand, they were now given suitable lesson books in simple language, which they could understand; and whereas the officials formerly issued their proclamations in a style which only the educated could read, they now used one which even the common people could understand—if able to read at all. In addition, a phonetic script was invented and this was popularized for a time, but has proved a disappointment. Later, strenuous efforts were made to get multitudes to learn one thousand of the most frequently used characters, which would enable the learner to read most of what is written in a simple style. It was just at this juncture, when the Revised Bible appeared and Mandarin was being popularized, that my husband began the publication of the Mandarin Bible Commentary—the first and so far the only comprehensive commentary on the whole Bible which can be used by the rank and file of our Church members. When completed the work will have from thirty-five to forty volumes. Genesis was published in 1921. During our last term of service, in addition to his work at the Bible Institute, besides Torrey's "What the Bible Teaches," my husband published Exodus, Numbers, Joshua and three volumes on the Gospels. The latter are not on Matthew, Mark and Luke, respectively, but the four Gospels are taken as one whole—the chrononological order of the events as given in Stevens and Burton's Harmony being followed. The fullest account, in whatever Gospel it may be found, is used as the text for the commentary, and all differences of importance and any supplementary matter in other Gospels are also noted and explained. Thus each incident in the four Gospels is only dealt with once. A Mr. H. Price, from Central China, has also been enlisted in this work by the Tract Society and he has so far published two volumes on the Psalms and one on Romans.

For some years the Tract Society has felt that these commentaries were meeting a real need and repeatedly the hope has been expressed that my husband might be set free to give his whole time and strength to this work. We felt, however, that the Bible Institute had the first claim upon us. But when, for reasons of health, it became clear that we ought not to return to that work and the Tract Society appealed to the China Inland Mission that we be set free, we became quite convinced that the Lord was shutting one door and opening another. The experiences of the past year have confirmed the conviction that we are in line with God's will. Since our return my husband has been working on "Leviticus". It will be in two volumes of 140 odd pages each, at 600 characters to the page, or roughly about 160,000 words—though exact figures are not available as yet. (To save expenses the Bible text is not printed, as is usual in commentaries at home, but only the words actually commented upon.) The first volume is in the press now and every few days a batch of proofs arrive. We hope it will be out by Christmas. I should perhaps explain that this commentary is not a translation of any one western book, but is an entirely new and independent study and exposition of the Word of God, adapted to Chinese modes of thought and expression, though helpful material has been freely drawn from all available sources. This means much more work than would be involved in translating some foreign book, but it also means that the work is much more adapted to the Chinese, and therefore, more helpful to them. Few of you have any idea of the prodigious amount of work there is in a single volume. In addition to the Introductions and Expositions, Practical Applications, Homiletical Hints, Bible Reading and Sermon Outlines, Helpful Illustrations, General Summaries, together with Discussions of Exegetical Problems, Biblical Difficulties, and Apparent Discrepancies, are also introduced here and there—all written from the standpoint of faith in the whole Bible as the inspired Word of God. In these days when destructive criticism is coming into the Church of China like a flood, we are glad to be privileged to help establish the faith of the Christians, by showing them that the Bible, when accepted for what it professes to be, is not only capable of a reasonable explanation which presents fewer difficulties than the destructive theories proposed, but is also intensely interesting and exceedingly practical for present-day believers. You will thus see that while the language is so simple that any one who can understand the Mandarin Bible will also be able to use this commentary, for the style is the same, yet on the other hand there is also much that challenges the interest of and will prove helpful to Chinese Pastors, Evangelists, Bible Women and other Christian workers. A number of the Bible Institutes and Theological Seminaries use Torrey's "What the Bible Teaches" and the Commentaries as text books or books of reference, and we are constantly receiving tokens of appreciation, written as well as oral, from both Chinese workers and foreign missionaries who find these books helpful. I will quote only two. The first from a lady missionary in the far northwest who writes: "We are all looking forward to the results of Mr. Dreyer's work. What books of his I have used have been such a help to me, with my still rather inadequate vocabulary. So it is not only the Chinese who benefit from them." And the following from a gentleman working among the aborigines in the extreme southwest: "I have often thought of writing to tell you what a blessing and help your books have been in my Bible teaching here, and so today my good intentions are being put into effect. For the past three or four short term Bible Schools I have conducted here, whenever the section was covered by your commentaries I have made liberal use of the same and have gotten more help from them than from my foreign commentaries and other books. I believe you are engaged in one of the most important tasks possible to a missionary, and believe the completed set will be one of the greatest helps ever gotten out for the Chinese workers throughout the land. I am glad you have successfully resisted the temptation to launch out into Wenli, or part Wenli, and that you have kept it down to simple, plain Mandarin, which can be read by the rank and file of the Church in China. May the Lord grant unto you and your wife spiritual and physical strength for the completion of this great task! I trust that when the set is completed, a cross-index of the subjects treated will be included, so as to enable the reader to study topically. The set is full of the most splendid material and its usefulness would, I feel, be greatly augmented by such a cross-index." As the "Expository Notes" were appearing serially in the magazines, one lady missionary living alone in an isolated station, translated them into English for her own benefit, and looked up every reference!

Our former Superintendent, the Rev. A. Lutley, who for physical reasons, is also no longer able to continue in Shansi, has been taking a very deep interest in this work. He has been giving practically all his time and strength to it—carefully reading the MSS. and proofs of "Leviticus" and making many helpful criticisms and suggestions, which my husband greatly appreciates. As soon as Leviticus is finished, my husband hopes to complete the commentary to the place where our Lord takes leave of the Temple with the solemn warning of Matt. 23:37-39, leaving the final discourses of our Lord, His arrest, trial, crucifixion, death, burial, resurrection and ascension to be dealt with in a final volume or two, for which there has been a steady demand. When this is finished "Acts" will, D. V., come next. You would all be surprised if you could see a copy of these books and know the price. They are bound in Chinese style, with paper covers, and are published at cost, and that very cheaply, so as to bring them within the reach of even the poorest Christians. Thus a much larger circulation is obtained and more people are helped. This has been made possible, first, because by the help of kind friends the MSS. are furnished the Tract Society free of all cost, even the proofs are read without costing the Society a cent for postage at this end. It has been made possible also, because friends of the Society have so far contributed gold $150 per volume, to pay the cost of setting up the type, making shells, and printing the first edition—the Society undertaking to print future editions from the proceeds of the sales of the first. Many of you have had a share in supporting this work and us, by your prayers or gifts, for which you have my heartfelt thanks, in which my husband joins. I would earnestly ask a continued interest in your prayers that the Lord may give all needed strength and wisdom, that these expositions may be in line with His will and be made spiritually helpful to many Christians throughout this land. When one thinks of the many thousands of Christians connected with all Societies scattered over this great country, with but few Bible Helps, such as people at home so richly enjoy, one longs to be able to help them to a greater interest in and a deeper understanding of that word of God which alone can make them strong, intelligent Christians, and aggressive witnesses for the Truth.

You have no doubt all heard of the Forward Movement which our Mission is inagurating, in order to reach the still unreached parts of this land. We are asking the Lord to send us two hundred new workers within the next two years. We rejoice that the appeal has met with such a warm-hearted response in all the homelands and that a goodly company of new recruits are reaching China this autumn. Will you not also join us in prayer that the Lord of the harvest may choose and send out men and women well fitted to be His messengers to this needy people? Also for a larger measure of His blessing upon all the work undertaken for Him out here.

I had intended to write something about my work in the factories here, but find that there is no space. Lest any of you may be disappointed in not having had acknowledgments of letters or parcels sent us, I want to explain that we have reason to know that our mail has again been tampered with. For this reason it is advisable to register letters of importance.

Wishing you a happy Christmas and a blessed New Year, I remain, with warmest greetings, in which my husband joins.

Sincerely yours in His glad service,
Gertrude C. Dreyer (Mrs. F. C. H.)

Ephesians 3:14-21.

LET THE WORD OF CHRIST DWELL IN YOU RICHLY.
Col. 3:16.

Let the word of Christ take up its residence, make its home in your heart. We are to treat it not as a stranger, nor as a visitor in our lives. It is to dwell in us. This involves familiarity with the Scriptures and a friendliness to the only infallible rule of faith and practice. Never enter into a quarrel with the Bible. Let nothing take the Book from you. It is the instrument God has given through which He speaks to men. It is a channel in which flows into our lives the enlightening and energizing grace of our Lord. It came by inspiration of God and is profitable for doctrine, reproof, correction and instruction in righteousness that we may become perfect, thoroughly furnished for every good work. It is to spy our lives, control them and make them to be and to become all that they ought.

This calls for faithful ministers of Christ who preach this which is able to make us wise unto salvation and to build up the church in the most holy faith. It demands the type of teaching in the Sunday schools that opens the word. It requires individual studiousness of the Scriptures. This embraces meditation and full appropriation in recognition that its messages are revelations of Christ's personal will to you. We are to desire the sincere milk of the word that we may grow. No soul can prosper as it should who is not all the while being nourished and enriched by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. The more richly you permit the word of Christ to make its home in you the more fully will you experience the blessedness of His fullness.

MORNING ACT OF FAITH.

"I believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of Heaven and Earth. I believe in Jesus Christ, the Son of God. Therefore I am in Him, having redemption through His blood and life by His Holy Spirit. He is in me. All fullness dwells in Him. To Him I belong by creation, by purchase, by conquest and by self surrender. To me He belongs for every moment's need. There is no cloud between my Lord and me. There is no difficulty inward or outward which He is not ready to meet in me today. I believe I have received not the spirit of fear, but of power and of love and of a sound mind. The Lord is my keeper. Amen.

2 Timothy 1:7. Isaiah 26:3, 4.
Philippians 4:4-8. Jude 24, 25.

"O Lord of Souls, Who hast chosen and called me to service in Thy Church, all my trust is in Thee, for in Thee are the springs of my life. Abundantly give me of Thy Blessed Spirit, without Whom nothing is strong, nothing is holy; and use me as it shall please Thee for the glory of Thy Name. Make my will pliant, my conscience pure, my disposition bright. Empty me of self, and fill me with the meekness of wisdom. Increase my faith, mellow my judgment, stir my zeal, enlarge my heart. Let my life enforce what my lips utter. Do Thou choose for me the work I do and the place in which I do it; the success I win and the harvest I reap. Preserve me from jealousy and impatience; from self-will and depression. Make me faithful unto death and then give me the crown of life. All this I ask for Christ's sake. Amen."

"A life of victory and power hinges upon three things—an act, a purpose, and a habit; an initial act; a fixed purpose; a daily habit. The initial act is that of personal surrender to the Lord Jesus Christ as Master, done once for all. The fixed purpose is that of doing what will please Him, and only that, at every turn, in every matter, regardless of consequences. The daily habit is that of spending a quiet time daily alone with the Master over His Word."

The Place.

"There is a place where thou canst touch the eyes
Of blinded men to instant, perfect sight;
There is a place where thou canst say, 'Arise!'
To dying captives, bound in chains of night;
There is a place where thou canst reach the store
Of hoarded gold and free it for the Lord;
There is a place—here or on distant shore—
Where thou canst send the worker and the Word
There is a place where Heaven's resistless power
Responsive moves to thine insistent plea;
There is a place—a silent, trusting hour—
Where God Himself, descends and works for thee.
Where is that blessed place—dost thou ask 'Where?'
O Soul, it is the secret place of prayer."

A VERSE FOR SOME "SCIENTISTS".

A letter addressed to the New York Herald Tribune reads:

The smug egotism of certain "scientists" as regards religion brings to mind a rather apt little verse:

"God breathed His life into
The dull contented sod:
The sod looked up and said,
'There is no God'."

Book Reviews

THE HEALING MINISTRY OF JESUS: By Rev. Frank N. Riale, Ph. D., D. D. Cloth. Pp. 148. Published by The Christian Literature Press, New York City. Price, $1.75.

When a man of Dr. Riale's education and culture pleads for the recognition of the claims of spiritual healing, we are challenged to attention and interest.

This Healing Handbook for Believers, following his widely known "The Divine Antidote to Sin, Sickness and Death" embodies a simple and comprehensive testimony, a plain explanation of the methods of taking divine life for the body and a conclusive vindication of the power of the promises of God. Far too long have we been paralyzed by the warning that if God wills to heal, He will and it were better to leave it to Him. That has virtually proven an opiate to lull faith to inaction, a kind of fatalism which is deadly to the unction which overcomes unbelief and triumphs over physical obstacles. If faith is a fight, then we have ground for repudiating this weak attitude.

If on the other hand, we enter with Dr. Riale into the precincts of conquering faith, we shall have no more than hesitating disposition, but we shall hold companionship with our Lord who bids us, "What things soever ye desire, when ye pray, believe that ye receive them and ye shall have them" (Mark 11:24). If we come into the realm of assured conviction that God would Have His children prosper and be in health even as their souls prosper (3 John 2); that if the Spirit of Him that raised Jesus from the dead dwell in us He shall quicken our mortal bodies (Romans 8:11), there will be no diffidence on our part, but a royal sense that "all the promises of God are yea and Amen in Christ Jesus" (2 Cor. 1:21). Better, by all means this brave "Grasping of almighty power; the hand of man laid on the arm of God: The grand and blessed hour in which the things impossible to me, become the possible, O Lord, through Thee," than the cautious dread of being presumptuous. Bishop Brent sounded the high note of conquest when he declared, "He who waves away the healing power of Christ as belonging only to the early New Testament times, is not preaching the whole Gospel. God was and is the Saviour of the body as well as of the soul, the same yesterday, today and forever."

This volume of Dr. Riale's should be in the hands of all spiritual Christians who would do the whole will of God. In myriads of cases, doubtless, there is weakness of body and consequent uncertainty of confidence in the power of God to sustain the flesh, because there resides in the heart the fear of fanaticism. Only as we venture with Him into the fields of His illimitable provisions, based upon His pledged word, can we prove Him. And we must not forget that by halting, we deprive Him of that place in our lives which He craves to occupy.

Dr. Riale is intelligent, logical, persuasive in his presentation of the discussion. We feel as we follow him that if we indulge in an indifferent mood we may thereby drive into the various avenues of healing, which abound all around us, the precious friends and fellow-Christians who by our example and counsel might be spared to the Church. There is an atmosphere in the book which is inspirational as well as convincing.

In the many phases of the subject therein treated, the author impels us to see that "this same Jesus" wills to heal all who have need of healing. He stresses "child-like faith"; the reasonable relation of the Atonement to the needs of the mortal flesh of the believer; though a Presbyterian, he believes with many Churchmen that there is healing and health in the devout reception of the Holy Communion, and his authorities are strong on that point; he contends that "the mind of Christ" dwelling in surrendered lives will express physical well-being; that the testimonies of dedicated believers cannot be repudiated. He devotes one chapter to the "practicing the healing presence of God," the appropriation of which will be worth more than can be estimated, by human standards, in the lives of such as will to enter into this sacred realm. The hymns of the historic Christian Church are traced in this sphere of Christian experience; and the prospect of the coming Pentecost for which the world is starving will be crystalized and realized by the ready acceptance of the plea of the Lord Jesus, "With God all things are possible." The doctor's own witness in dealing with the sick in the ministry of healing is clear and convincing.

The high test for us all is, Are we willing to lay down our prejudices and come humbly before our God and submissively and devotedly ask, "Lord, What wilt Thou have me to do?" This is not an area of spiritual experience which may be entered rashly. But its appealing doors are open to every one who would be "perfect and complete in all the will of God" (Col. 4:12).

ASSYRIAN BEGGAR.

Mr. Editor:

We received a letter recently from Bishop Graves of Shanghai, that an Assyrian beggar like those so familiar in the United States had appeared and showed as his chief credentials a letter from our Educational Chaplain in Mosul, Iraq, the Rev. John B. Penfil. Of course, I knew that Mr. Penfil of all people would be the last one to give such a letter as he knows best about these beggars, because his mission is to the people of that race and Church, and he is in close touch with the Nestorian bishops and leaders who are bitterly ashamed of the doing of this organized gang of world beggars. I wrote Mr. Penfil and received the following reply:

"Mosul, Iraq, Nov. 28, 1929.
(Mesopotamia)

The Reverend Th. Burgess,
New York, N. Y.

Dear Father Burgess: In regard to the letter, which you have received from Bishop Graves, I am anxious to state, that I did not give any letter of introduction to any Assyrian. I do know, however, that two such letters exist. One is in possession of Kasha Shimmun Gilyana of Gilu, by confession of ———. The second, in the hands of Kasha Sergios Takka Ardishaya of Urmia, by confession of his partner, so-called "Deacon Sheenoo", who, after quarrelling over the division of the money collected in their first pilgrimage around the world, was left in Mosul against his wishes and consequently revealed the whole affair. Both these letters are counterfeited.

Faithfully yours,
(Signed) John B. Penfil."

It is not impossible that one or both of these imposters may soon tour the United States. If they should appear, I urge our clergy to confiscate all their letters, send them to me, also have the men arrested and turned over to the immigration authorities.

Recently a batch of such letters was gathered in and sent us. We have passed them on to the Federal authorities. They were all, except one, authentic letters from Chambers of Commerce of Illinois towns, and one the characteristic "credentials" of the gang.

If people wish to give to the needy Assyrians of Mesopotamia—and the need is very great—the only sure way in addition to the Good Friday Offering, which supports our Educational Chaplain, is through the Assyrian Relief Association of which Bishop Perry is Chairman and Samuel Thorne, Treasurer (44 Wall Street, New York, N. Y.), and the funds are administered by a Committee in Mosul consisting of our Mr. Penfil, and representatives of the Patriarch and the British High Commissioner.

Faithfully yours,
Thomas Burgess.

"THE UNIVERSAL PRAYER."

Mr. Editor:

I have reason to be quite pleased over the complimentary way so thorough a scholar and Christian man as Dr. Kenneth Mackenzie refers to my little book, "The Universal Prayer." As it is as yet only on sale in London, where it has been received more favorably than I expected, any errors it may have can do no harm in America; but I should not like to let the criticism stand before The Southern Churchman readers that I have "no sympathy with the return of our Lord to reign on earth," or that I "utterly reject the New Testament doctrine of the personality of Satan." I admit that I give the latter doctrine only a sentence or two, but I certainly did not reject it. I refer to it as the belief of the great majority of Christians for nineteen centuries, calling attention, mainly on page 114, to the fact that evil is an ugly fact in life, whether it springs from a personal devil or not. The purpose of such a treatment of the question is to give as much room in the Church for the Christian who climbs up to orthodox faith from scientific inferences as for his brother Christian who gets his doctrines more directly by the help of divine revelation.

As to the question of Christ's personal reign on earth, my only reference was to the millennial claims of one thousand years. I said that that is too limited a faith for a lover of the great kingdom idea.

I am afraid that I could not go far with Dr. Mackenzie in accepting an "historic faith of the Church embalmed in its liturgy." An "embalmed faith" does not seem to me very desirable in or out of liturgies. A living faith is better.

I am at work just now by request, of a well-known American publishing house, on a new and "popular" life of Phillips Brooks. I have a desire to give Virginia more credit than it has yet had for that great man's spiritual power, and I would be glad of advice and letters in and of this purpose from Southern people.

I have been wondering what a reference to Phillips Brooks in a Southern Churchman a few weeks ago meant? I have not got a copy of that issue at hand, but the reference was in connection with a quotation from a South Carolina history. It seemed to imply that "the violent sermons of Phillips Brooks in Philadelphia" had done considerable harm. Did Phillips Brooks ever preach "violent sermons?" I honestly want to know. Of course, he was a Northern man, with strong views against slavery, but were they really violent or any stronger than the views of many Southern men. I will be glad of further light as to this.

BROADCASTING.

Mr. Editor:

While it is true that broadcasting religious services keeps some people from church (because they "can hear it over the radio"), it is also true, gloriously true, that radio broadcasting is of untold benefit to very, very many. Instead of thinking only of the comparatively few who stay home from Church because they "can hear it over the radio", let us think of the thousands of people in isolated communities and in places where church services are held infrequently and irregularly. And let us think of the shut-ins, and of those who have to wait on them. All of these, though they can go to church rarely if ever, can and do enjoy and benefit by services that are broadcast. Then, surely no reasonable person will contend that radio has wrought harm, simply because it has a tendency to keep some people (not the most zealous Christians) from God's House.

I am prompted to send you this letter (which has been published in some Canadian newspapers), because I often enjoy listening to the evening service from St. Mark's Church in Richmond over Radio Station WRVA. Of course, sometimes reception is not good; in fact, the last three Sunday nights I have not been able to hear WRVA, but it must be remembered that Richmond is one thousand miles from here.

NEGRO CHURCHMEN.

Mr. Editor:

Many of the most loyal, and true, Negro Churchmen, clergy and laity, among us, are grieved and discouraged by the persistent evasive policy of the Church with respect to the extension of the Kingdom of our Lord among the black people of this country. For more than a third of a century earnest and persistent effort has been made to arouse the Church to the extreme importance of this matter.

While writing this, Mr. Editor, the person of your beloved father looms up before me. In his time, no man, either by active example, or otherwise, outclassed him in this work. The impressions made upon me, as a boy, by John L. Williams, will go with me into eternity. He was a living interpretation of what he ever taught his colored friends. But, then, as now, the many were apathetic and indifferent. This indifference is chronic. As far back as 1824, the rector of St. John's, Washington City, said: "A class of colored people has been formed, amounting to about forty, who manifest an earnest desire to learn to read, and to unite in the forms of worship established by our venerable Church."

That very same year, the rector of Trinity Church, Charles County, Maryland, reporting only one white baptism, against twenty-six blacks, observes: "The black communicants present the most interesting appearance in their great devotion and regular attendance on divine worship."

In 1834, the rector of St. John's Church, Colletin, S. C., writes: "Nothing would be easier than to swell my list of communicants to an almost indefinite extent. If I would but invest men of their own color with something of spiritual power, and send them forth as emissaries in our cause amongst their fellows. . . . The extent of influence possessed by such preachers (Negro) is almost incredible. Every year's experience serves more and more to convince me that anything like the effectual religious training and instruction of this class of people by the regular parochial clergy is not even to be hoped for."

Leaving out of the question the divine side of the matter, simple gratitude ought to compel white Churchmen to do justice in this matter. The black race has made three distinct and indispensable contributions to the ideals of this country, which should energize sincere and aggressive evangelization on their behalf. First, the labor which, particularly concerned the South, which transformed that wilderness into a civilized community. Second, the "black mammy", under God, was the creator of the best white men and women this country has ever produced. In her lap, and at her breast were they brought up to full manhood and womanhood. In the third place, it was neither Abraham Lincoln, or the Northern soldiers that preserved "the Union", for, until the black man entered the ranks victory seemed almost with the Confederates; it was the faithful black man, two hundred thousand strong, that prevented the dismembering of the Union, and, at the same time, the remainder of them, upon the plantations, fed and protected the white women and children, while the white men were in th army fighting.

If this work is neglected much longer somebody's "candlestick" is going to be removed. An all-wise, an all-loving, and an all-powerful God can not permit His black children to be forgotten forever, while the angels of the churches seem absorbed in the discussion of ritual and dogma. The loyalty and devotion of Negro Churchmen ought to count for something.

Church Intelligence

Thirtieth Anniversary of Dr. John W. Wood's Coming to Church Missions House Observed on January 2.

For some weeks past the air of the Church Missions House has been fairly blue with plots to surprise Dr. Wood with a gala celebration on January 2, which was the thirtieth anniversary of his coming to Church Missions House. Bishop Lloyd, who also began work at the Missions House in January, 1900, came for a celebration of the Holy Communion at eleven, when the chapel was filled with the staff and many old friends. After the service, Bishop Lloyd presented Dr. Wood a watch, the gift of the staff. With Dr. Gray as archconspirator, Dr. Wood's mail and cablegrams had been censored, and a great pile that were congratulations were held up until the day arrived. The January Spirit of Missions, with Dr. Wood's picture as frontispiece, was withheld from circulation in the building until after the event.

Writing as the newly elected general secretary of the Board of Managers of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society, the Rev. (now Bishop) Arthur S. Lloyd says, in The Spirit of Missions for January, 1900: "The Board has been fortunate in securing as corresponding secretary Mr. John W. Wood." In 1904 the Board of Managers became the Board of Missions, Mr. Wood continuing as secretary. In January, 1920, at the third meeting of the new Presiding Bishop and Council, he was elected executive secretary of the Council's Department of Missions, which had replaced the former Board.

A Call to Prayer.

"A call to prayer and consecration to all who love our Lord Jesus Christ," has been issued by the officers of the Federal Council of Churches and signed by the Presiding Officers of more than a score of communions, including the Rt. Rev. Charles P. Anderson, D. D., Presiding Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

The call reads in part:

We profoundly believe that God is leading our nation and other nations toward an hour of destiny. Among lovers of righteousness and peace in all lands the hope now abounds that mankind may be delivered from the menace of war and preparations for war. The approaching Conference on Naval Armaments in London on January 21, 1930, may well be regarded as one of the turning points of history. A divine significance is attached to this momentous occasion by those who believe that nations, no less than individuals, are subject to God's immutable moral laws. To all loyal citizens and to all lovers of humanity it is a time of opportunity, and especially to those who have seen in Jesus Christ the way toward a warless world. . . .

The issues of the London Conference are so momentous for all the moral and spiritual interests of mankind that we unite with our fellow Christians in other lands in prayer and renewed consecration to the ideals of our Risen Lord. In accordance with the action taken by the Archbishop of Canterbury and the leaders of the Free Churches of Great Britain, we earnestly recommend that our pastors and the members of our churches and congregations observe Sunday, January 19, 1930, as a Day of Prayer for God's blessing on the Conference. . . .

Let us pray unceasingly that the Spirit of God may guide our leaders assembled at the Conference of the nations, that unselfish motives and wise counsels may prevail. Let us give ourselves to the cultivation of a Christian public opinion so strong that it will make possible the richest results from their deliberations. It is not for us to suggest the specific plans by which the objectives of the Conference may be achieved. It is ours, however, to create the atmosphere which alone will make possible the achievement of high and worthy goals.

Let us seek, as a nation, to know and to do God's will. Let us pray for God's blessing upon our President and our delegates to the Conference and also upon those of all the nations.

Work in Mexico.

Work in Mexico takes time and patience and fair weather. On September 18, Bishop Creighton filed with the federal government the necessary application to permit the Rev. Ellsworth Collier to officiate for the foreign colony at Pachuca, and not until November 4 was the necessary permission received from the governor of the state. Five days later, final word was received from the federal office. Whereupon the Bishop went to the department of migration for official instructions to permit Mr. Collier to enter the country, then to the treasury department for permission to enter his household goods free, then to the communication department to despatch the instruction to officials on the border, and then to his own office to send word to Mr. Collier to start. He and his wife and daughter arrived on December 2.

The Mexican Department of Education has approved the plans, as far as they have proceeded, for the new classroom building for Hooker School.

Hooker has its commencement in November. This year a large Mexican congregation attended the baccalaureate service, which was held in the Cathedral. Four girls were confirmed at that time, and five were admitted to the Girls' Friendly. The entire service, including the Bishop's sermon, was in Spanish.

Two other special services in November, at which Bishop Creighton preached, were on Armistice Day, when the Cathedral was crowded with representatives of many nations, and on Thanksgiving Day in the Union Evangelical Church, where a tremendous congregation included the ambassador, consul general and their staffs. Ambassador Morrow is sorely missed. "Whatever service lies before him," writes the Bishop, "will receive the devoted attention of one of the ablest men I have ever met."

In contrast with the Cathedral services in the city are those of the Indian missions. Bishop Creighton writes of a recent visit:

Humini is one of our most interesting congregations. The little white church on the mountain-side draws people from all directions who travel long distances to attend the services. Humini is not a village; it is only our church with two or three little stone houses clustered around it, but when the bell rings, it sends its call up and down the great valley and the people begin to come over the trails. I like to hear the bell at Humini peal out its cheery welcome as it always does when we approach. Somehow it makes up for the hard ride, and it reminds me of home. The first year I was here I dedicated it and named it Santa Ana for my old parish in Brooklyn. I suppose that somewhere in space it is blending its tone with the chimes of St. Ann, and that is a comforting thought.

This morning as we rode in, it rang more merrily than ever, for a huge congregation was gathering and more than enough to fill the church were already there. We dismounted to receive innumerable abrazos of welcome.

When service finally started there was a congregation which packed the church and overflowed into the little parish house adjoining. Many men patiently stood through the service, which lasted two and a half hours. The Indians like long services, however. They come to spend the day and there is never any hurry. Pbro. Salinas celebrated. There was a baptism and then eleven candidates received an apostolic rite. After that, Pbro. Salinas preached a moving and eloquent sermon in appreciation and loving memory of Bishop Murray. After the service I made an address to the new members and then the Spirit moved Pbro. Salinas to preach again. It was three-thirty when I gave the blessing. Then we all gathered in the parish house where a sweet little Indian lady, representing the women of the congregation, made an address of welcome to Mrs. Creighton.

It was four o'clock when we sat down to lunch. Meanwhile, families had gathered around glowing charcoal braseros preparing the food they had brought. A table was erected under the trees for us and the leaders of the local agrarian committee. We had an abundance of native food, but, in addition, every group sent its contribution to the Bishop's table—beans and tortillas, chicken, chiles, tortas, lettuce, potatoes and turkey, until it became a bit difficult to be polite enough to sample everything that came. We finished at five and prepared to start for Nopala.

There were final conferences, a last word to a group of young people about religious duties, abrazos and burro-packing, and then, to the accompaniment of Santa Ana and adios from every one we started, with eleven horses and two burros.

On the way back the young people sang and made merry as we trotted along. We reached the outskirts of Nopala just at dusk and were at the Salinas home by the time darkness fell.

Trustees.

The tellers appointed to count the votes of the Alumni of the General Theological Seminary, for three Trustees of the Seminary, to fill vacancies caused by expiration of terms on December 31, reported that

The Rt. Rev. Paul Matthews, D. D.,
The Rev. Murray Bartlett, D. D.,
Dr. Ralph Adams Cram

were duly elected as such Trustees to succeed themselves, and to serve from January 1, 1930, to January 1, 1933.

Plows Instead of Wives.

A new solution, applicable in some districts, for the polygamy practiced in so-called heathen lands has been suggested by Mr. G. A. Roberts, agricultural missionary in Southern Rhodesia. Speaking at the annual dinner of the International Agricultural Mission Association, in New York, on December 6, he told of the profound effect of introducing plows to the native farmers. Induce him to get a plow, and he doesn't need so many wives to do his work. Mr. Roberts went to Umtali in 1907. In 1909 one of the natives, coaxed along by all the missionaries, bought the first plow. Mr. Roberts went to see him begin work with it, found it put together wrong in six places, and found the three wives, each with a baby on her back, standing by to watch the mysterious process. Seven more plows were bought in the next seven years. Last year there were between two and three thousand in use. Whether polygamy had declined in proportion, Mr. Roberts did not say.

This was the tenth annual dinner of this friendly informal group of missionaries, government agents and mission board secretaries. Any missionary or rural worker expecting to be in New York on furlough the first week in December might well make a note to beg a ticket and attend. He would acquire a new sense of the greatness and the oneness of his task the world over. Those who have attended in previous years will be glad to know that Dr. Warren H. Wilson, Dr. Thomas Jesse Jones and the others were in their usual good form. The program was brief and well planned. Mr. Roberts described in some detail the actual work of an agricultural missionary. Mr. J. H. Evans, of the Federal Department of Agriculture, emphasized the mutual helpfulness, of many years' standing, between government agents and agricultural missionaries. The Rev. Dr. R. E. Diffendorfer, of the Methodist Board of Foreign Missions, discussed the task of the home office, to find and train the right kind of missionary, and to maintain his work, the world-wide influence of agricultural conditions upon the economic life of every nation, and the perennial question as to whether agriculture may be considered fundamentally missionary work. On the last subject he said that agricultural mission work is primarily satisfying human needs, bringing human life from a level of bare existence up to a standard where the spirit may develop, creating human values.

Christian Social Service.

Following is the report of the Department of Christian Social Service, at the meeting of the National Council, December 11, 1929:

Dean Lathrop presented the following resolution, which his department suggested should be passed by the National Council:

"Resolved, That the National Council of the Episcopal Church has learned with great satisfaction that the President of the United States has authorized the signing of the protocols looking toward the participation of this country in the World Court, and expresses its earnest hope that the United States Senate will confirm this action.

This resolution was immediately presented to the National Council and passed.

Mr. Spencer Miller, Jr., Consultant for the Division of the Church and Industrial Relations, told of his work. He said:

"During the last sixteen months, practically, we have been engaged in a study of the whole background of the Church's responsibility to the problems of developing industrialism in north, east, south and west.

"I am sure that you will all agree that this whole question of industrial ramifications and the challenge which industrialism presents to the Church, leads into a field which is certainly filled with all kinds of difficulties. For that reason it has seemed wise, in our judgment, to proceed with caution and with understanding of the facts involved. Instead of committing ourselves to a program of action, we committed ourselves to a program of study. We have not only made a thorough study in this country but, as most of you know, I spent some five weeks in England seeking answers to inquiries, which I have made on the development of problems of industrial relations as they had developed in relation to the Church of England. We have now in the hands of Longmans, Green, our publishers, a volume on the Church and Industrial Relations, which will attempt not only to cover the general field in the United States, so far as our own Church is concerned, but, as a background, the work and accomplishment on the part of the Church of England in this field. That volume, I trust, will be off the press early in February.

"We have been trying in a small but, we hope, effective way to relate the labor group more definitely to the work of our Church. We are now engaged in not only coming into definite contact with men and women who are active in labor circles, but are trying to relate them in a functional way to the work of this division. We are not prepared to report just exactly the entire details of that relationship, but we do want, as a Division, to report that that work is in progress and I hope by the next meeting of the Council we shall be able to give a more definite account to you.

"It has been my feeling for some time that there is a great opportunity which our Church might perform in bringing together employers and working men in particular industrial conferences set up under Church auspices, where they might study their industrial problems from the standpoint of Christian responsibility, one toward the other. I have been in touch with a number of responsible employers in this country and have secured not only the interest, but the assurance of their very genuine support of this program.

"I was invited to speak at the Synod of the Province of Sewanee at Columbia, South Carolina, on "Deepening Industrialism of the South." The problems raised by the situation in Gastonia and Marion have been matters of deep concern to Churchmen in their communities. I spoke on this subject and, growing out of the meeting, came an urgent request from a Churchman and Senior Warden of an important church in Gastonia, that I go there. I stayed a day in that city, interviewing employers, visiting the mills, coming into close touch with the extremely serious condition which had made the waters of that community very turbulent. As a result of my contact there, the request has come for a further study of Gastonia County, in North Carolina. That request is still before the Division, but I speak of it as at least two of the things which have come satisfactorily out of this.

"Finally, it might be of some interest to this Council to know that not only through the opportunities for addresses before the various seminaries of our Church, but in the summer schools and various conferences which have been held, there have been received at the Department requests for a course on Industrial Relations to be given during next summer at Lake Kanuga, North Carolina, and in other schools.

This Division, which began primarily as a fact-finding study, is developing more and more—very slowly, but I hope with some degree of wisdom—into the kind of advisory service to clergy and laity which, I take it, was certainly in the mind of the Department of Christian Social Service in setting up this Division, and I hope is the kind of service which members of this Council feel is in accordance with the wise procedure, so far as we are concerned, in this particular work."

The Rev. Harold Holt, Assistant Executive Secretary, reported on the new project of Family Relations Institute as follows:

"In the report of the Commission on Marriage and Divorce (p. 58) it was recommended that the Church take an active part in educating Her people for marriage.

The Department of Social Service in going over the matter with groups of clergy from many parts of the country, found that very few of them felt equipped to carry on such education at the present time. To supply this lack and to prepare the clergy for incorporating in their normal educational programs (that is, taking appropriate training into all groups, from the eight-year-old group up through the adult groups of the parish), the Department is recommending the organization of Institutes on Family Relations in every diocese. These Institutes would be in the nature of discussion groups on technique, as well as facts, and would be conducted by such authorities as a physician, mental hygiene expert, domestic economy teacher, and a spritual leader.

Following the report of the Committee on Marriage and Divorce, the topics to be dealt with are:

Domestic Finances (financial tension)
The Biology of the Family (sex tension)
The Parent and Child
The Spiritual Nature of the Family.

These Institutes, we feel, will open the topic, and being conducted as much as possible by local people, will give an opportunity for further study and working out within the diocese of an appropriate program for every parish.

The first such Institute will be held in the Diocese of Erie on January 21; several other dioceses are planning for them after Easter. All of the clergy who have been approached on the subject are very eager for the Institutes.

The Department is working in close cooperation with a committee of the Federal Council on the same subject, and has also the cooperation of the American Social Hygiene Committee, the National Committee on Mental Hygiene, the Committee on Material Health of the Academy of Medicine, and several other groups who have been working for some time in this field.

The Third Sunday after Epiphany has been suggested by the National Council for the remembrance of Social Service.

The aim of the Day: 1. (a) To increase the social vision of the parish. Social Service is much more than ameliorating distress. (b) To give to the people of the parish and community an opportunity to intercede for those oppressed by social conditions, that they may be freed; for those who are working with and for them, that the Kingdom may come on earth. 2. To give to social workers an opportunity for spiritual refreshment, and to impress upon them the Christian's interest in their achievements and endeavors.

Suggested means to secure these results: 1. A Corporate Communion and breakfast for social workers and friends of social work. 2. Some other meeting, as a tea or supper, at which the Church people may meet with all the social workers of the city and hear of their work. 3. A sermon on the Christian attitude in social relations, and such prayers and intercessions as may express the people's aspirations for the coming of the Kingdom of God on earth.

Lessons: Isa. 49:1-23; Matt. 28:1-10; 16 to end; Isa. 52:1-10; John 12:20-32; Zech. 8:7-22; 2 Cor. 9;v.6.

Calls All to Aid Britain's Recovery.

The Archbishop of Canterbury proclaims that each individual must do his bit for country and Church, according to a report from London in the New York Times, which follows:

"Each for all" is the New Year's motto chosen by the Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Cosmo Gordon Lang, and in Canterbury Cathedral, "mother church of English folk," as he described it, the primate declared that Britain's industrial recovery depended upon the determination of each citizen to recapture the spirit of 1914 and "do his bit" for his country.

The same condition, he said, applied to the fortunes of the Christian faith, which "have come to a crucial time" here, and that the answer as to whether Canterbury Cathedral is lost and for the English folk is a shrine of slowly retreating memory or of a still strong and vital faith depends on each individual Christian and "upon whether he or she feels and acts as one personally concerned with that issue."

Political or economic measures might provide some remedy for Britain's industrial sickness, said the Primate, but could not effect its cure.

"The cure can only come through each citizen realizing and fulfilling his own personal responsibility in reinvigorating the strength of the whole body of the country," he said. "We have thought too much of measures and too little of men. We have tended to look to others or to the State for help rather than to ourselves.

"Without doubt there have been injustices to be righted, hardships to be alleviated and opportunities hitherto closed to be opened to all our people. For these things action of the State is needed. It is right that the resources of the whole community should be made available for the good of each of its humblest members."

"'All for each' is one of the maxims of a true commonwealth. But has not the pendulum swung too far in this direction? Must it now swing back again and restore the place of that other maxim, 'Each for all'?"

The high gale foiled the British Broadcasting Corporation's attempt to broadcast the Archbishop's sermon to America. Just before the service the wind dislodged the aerial from the short-wave station at Chelmsford and the damage was not discovered until the service at Canterbury Cathedral was about to commence.

Palestine Issues Blasphemy Law.

Any one uttering a word or a sound calculated to outrage the religious feelings or beliefs of another, is liable to one year in prison under the terms of a blasphemy ordinance, recently made public in Jerusalem, according to a Jewish Telegraphic Agency report in the New York Times.

Church Schools in the Diocese.

When the Chinese Government was invited to an extremely important conference in Washington, upon which the very fate of their nation depended, and were only allowed four delegates, they chose with exacting care. Three out of the four selected for this all-important mission were graduates of the little Episcopal College, St. John's, at Shanghai. The influence of that Christian institution upon China's life is inestimable. Out of it, small as it is, comes China's leaders.

Who are to be the future leaders in our Diocese? Who are to occupy our places when we are gone? Now is the time we should and must be preparing our boys and girls to take our places and carry on. Is there any better place to instill in the hearts of our Episcopal youth the ideals that will make them take their proper places in the life of the Church than in the five splendid Church Schools of our Diocese?

Perhaps no investment that the Church can make for its future is as strategic as that invested in these schools. Increasingly as the years roll by their influence will be felt—leaders in the Woman's Auxiliary, members of the Vestry—interested, devoted, zealos future leaders for His Kingdom are now in their formative years in these schools being prepared to carry forward the great task of His Church.

Our Bishop, when attending the House of Bishops in Washington, was asked more frequently about our system of Church Schools than any other question about our diocese. Other dioceses feel the need of similar schools. They are interested in what we are trying to do.

Every year since their establishment the Church Schools have increased in the number of students, the standards of scholarship, in physical equipment, and in financial stability. They are a real asset and their future is bright with the promise of still better and finer achievements.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., Bishop

Woman's Auxiliary.

The annual meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary was scheduled to be held in St. John's Church, Sixteenth Street, on Tuesday, January 7, beginning with a celebration of the Holy Communion, the Bishop of Washington to be the celebrant and speaker. The business meeting was held in the Parish Hall and, according to custom, luncheon was served to every one present as guests of the Auxiliary of St. John's Church. The President of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese of Washington is Mrs. Spencer Wood, of Christ Church, Georgetown.

Annual Corporate Communion for Brotherhood.

The second annual Corporate Communion of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew in the Diocese of Washington will be held in Bethlehem Chapel of Washington Cathedral on Washington's birthday at 8 P. M., according to announcement by Mr. H. Lawrence Choate, National President of the Brotherhood. This will be in response to the invitation of the Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., Bishop of Washington, and it is expected that at least one hundred men and fifty boys of the Junior Brotherhood will attend. Following the service, the members of the Brotherhood will be guests of Bishop Freeman and Bishop Rhinelander, Warden of the College of Preachers, at breakfast in the refectory of the new College of Preachers' building. At this time, there will be addresses and a general conference on the spiritual ideals for which the Brotherhood of St. Andrew stands. The Rt. Rev. Henry St. George Tucker, Bishop of Virginia, will be one of the speakers.

"Cathedral Age."

The Christmas number of the "Cathedral Age" is out and is, indeed, full of beauty and interest. This particular number, though carrying other interesting articles and pictures, is largely devoted to the College of Preachers, the Cathedral's latest achievement, and one which, unique in its exact status and plan, commends itself to the Church at large, because of its promised far-reaching effect on the evangelistic ministry of the Church. The building was open for inspection to the public on the day of its dedication, but theerafter only for those attending the conferences or members of the faculty. The illustrations, therefore, as presented in the Cathedral

Age, give an excellent idea of the general plan and atmosphere of the building. Gothic in detail, it stands well below the level of the great Cathedral and in perfect keeping with it. Illustrations in the Cathedral Age bring this out strongly and also show very beautifully some of the landscape work done around the buildings by All Hallows Guild under the direction of Mrs. G. C. F. Bratenahl. Indeed, the illustrations in the Cathedral Age, alone make it a storehouse of art gems, and well worth the having. The Magazine may be procured at the Cathedral offices and is sent four times a year to all members of the National Cathedral Association. It is said to be the only publication devoted entirely to Cathedrals and their interests, all over the world.

The Cathedral Choir.

The carols of Christmas, with their ever increasing charm and appeal, were perhaps never more appealing than when sung the Sunday after Christmas at the afternoon service at Washington Cathedral. The exquisite quality of tone possible, but not always found in boy choirs, but developed to a large degree in the Cathedral Choir, seemed well suited to the music of the carol, and made this service, one always largely attended, an outstanding one of all the beautiful services of the year held in Washington Cathedral. Carols of different nations and ages were sung, the entire Cathedral Choir of men and boys participating under the direction of Edgar Priest, Cathedral Organist.

Rev. E. Pinkney Wroth to Leave Diocese.

The Rev. E. Pinkney Wroth has resigned his position as rector of Christ Church, Georgetown, to become rector of Trinity Memorial Parish, Warren, Pa., and expects to leave with his family for his new work about the middle of January.

His last Sunday at Christ Church will be the occasion of the annual visitation of the Bishop of the Diocese for Confirmation, January 12, when Mr. Wroth will present a large class. Mr. Wroth has been rector of Christ Church five years, during which time he has done very constructive work in the parish and in the diocese. Besides the regular work and support of the parish, he has placed it at the head of all parishes in the Diocese of Washington in the matter of subscribing the quota for the Church's Program. This quota has been overpaid every year of his rectorate and he leaves the parish this year with a 125 per cent over-subscription on last year's budget.

The Episcopal Home for Children.

The Episcopal Home for Children had a delightful Christmas celebration, but perhaps the big feature was a playhouse completely furnished and large enough for children to play in. It was the Christmas gift of Edwin Gould, of New York, is 9 x 12 feet in size, containing living room, bedroom, kitchen and bath, and is furnished in minute detail. Fifty-five children enjoyed the celebration, which, of course, included a large Christmas tree. This will probably be the last Christmas in the old home in Anacostia as contracts for the new home in Chevy Chase have been let and work on the new buildings will start in the near future.

Rt. Rev. C. P. Anderson, D. D., Bishop.

Bishop Anderson Confirms Large Class.

The Most Reverend Charles P. Anderson, D. D., D. C. L., Presiding Bishop of the Church, in an address at St. Augustine's, Wilmette, on the Sunday after Christmas, congratulated the rector and congregation on the splendid growth and advance of the parish, stating that he had watched it with the greatest of pleasure and satisfaction.

The church was crowded to the doors and, after the service, the bishop held an informal reception in the parish house for those he had just confirmed and the congregation in general.

Sixty-eight people were confirmed by the bishop, the second or third largest class in the Diocese of Chicago. St. Augustine has added, since last December, one hundred and twenty-five to its communicant list by confirmation alone, more than one-third of the total communicant's membership of the parish. One striking feature is that one-half of the total number of communicants are under twenty-five years of age.

The Rev. Hubert Carleton, M. A., D. C. L., is rector of the church.

MARYLAND.

Rt. Rev. E. T. Helfenstein, D. D., Bishop.

Maryland's Diocesan Convention.

The one hundred and forty-sixth annual convention of the Diocese of Maryland will meet on January 22-23, 1930, instead of the twenty-ninth and thirtieth, as previously announced. This meeting will be held in the Church of the Prince of Peace, Walbrook, the Rev. Christopher P. Sparling, rector.

The evening preceding the convention, Tuesday, the twenty-first, will be given over to the Diocesan Memorial Service for Bishop Murray. This service will be held in St. Paul's Church, Baltimore. The Rev. Dr. Arthur Chilton Powell and Mr. Edward Guest Gibson will be the speakers.

On Wednesday evening, the twenty-third, there will be several short addresses on Missions—General and Diocesan.

Maryland Clericus.

The Clericus of the Diocese of Maryland have elected the following clergy as officers for 1930:

The Rev. William Dallam Morgan—President.

The Rev. William O. Smith, Jr., D. D.—Vice-President.

The Rev. Francis Irving Bloy—Secretary.

The Rev. Charles A. W. Brocklebank—Treasurer.

Dean Chalmers Accepts Rectorship of Grace and St. Peter's Church, Baltimore.

The Rev. Robert Chalmers, Dean of St. Matthew's Cathedral, Dallas, Texas, has accepted the call to the rectorship of Grace and St. Peter's Church, Baltimore. He will succeed the Rt. Rev. H. P. Almon Abbott, D. D., now Bishop of the Diocese of Lexington.

Since Bishop Abbott left Baltimore, the church has been supplied by the Rev. Arthur M. Sherman, of Wuchang, China, and the Rev. Joseph H. Titus, of the Diocese of Connecticut.

Dean Chalmers was born in Dundee, Scotland, and is the son of William Chalmers and Helen Walker Chalmers. He is a graduate of Kenyon College. He was ordained Deacon in 1914 and Priest in 1915 by Bishop Leonard and has served in Trinity Church, Tiffin, Ohio, St. Mark's Church, Toledo, Ohio, beside being Dean of the Cathedral in Dallas.

Grace and St. Peter's Church called Dean Chalmers soon after Bishop Abbott went to Chicago, but he declined. They feel most fortunate in having him reconsider the call and are looking forward to a most successful rectorship.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Rt. Rev. Thomas J. Garland, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. Francis M. Taitt, S. T. D., Coadjutor.

Bishop Garland Granted Leave of Absence.

By action of the Standing Committee of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Pennsylvania, a leave of absence from his episcopal duties has been granted Bishop Garland. It is understood that in granting this leave the Standing Committee recognized that for the past five years, following the resignation of Bishop Rhinelander as Diocesan, and for a year prior to that time, Bishop Garland has carried on the duties of his episcopal office without any aid until the recent election and consecration of Bishop Coadjutor Taitt.

The leave of absence to Bishop Garland is to begin at some date in January, until the summer vacation, when he and Bishop Taitt will attend the 1930 Lambeth Conference of all Bishops of the Anglican Communion. During the period of his leave of absence it is understood the Bishop and Mrs. Garland will visit the Holy Land. Bishop Garland is a Canon of St. George's Cathedral in Jerusalem as the official representative of the Episcopal Church in the United States. The Canons of this Cathedral are all Bishops, each one representing the Church in his own country.

Flowers to the Living.

"To the Glory of God and in loving appreciation of George Otis Meade. Arthur Needles, Donor, A. D., 1929."

Above is the inscription on a beautiful altar cross which, with candelabra and vases, were set apart by the Rt. Rev. Robert Carter Jett, D. D., in a service at Christ Church, Roanoke, Virginia, on the morning of Sunday, December 22. These ornaments, all of brass and gold, were given by Mr. Needles, the President of the Norfolk and Western Railway Company, who took this graceful way of testifying his friendship and esteem for the Rev. Mr. Mead.

In the chancel with the Bishop were Mr. Mead and the Rev. Taylor Willis, present rector of Christ Church. With the exception of announcements, however, the entire service was conducted by the Bishop and Mr. Mead. Mr. Mead, on behalf of the congregation, presented the ornaments to the Bishop, who thereupon accepted and consecrated them. Bishop Jett then preached the sermon, following which he confirmed a class of nine persons.

For fifteen years, from 1913 to 1928, the Rev. Mr. Meade was the greatly be-

CHRISTIAN STEWARDSHIP.

Over against the Treasury
He sits who gave Himself for me.
He sees the coppers that I give
Who gave His life that I might live;
He sees the silver I withhold
Who left for His throne of gold,
Who found a manger for His bed,
Who had not where to lay His head:
He sees the gold I clasp so tight—
Am I a debtor in His sight?

The Master as Servant.

At an eastern meal the washing of the feet of the guests before they began the meal was a very important part of the ceremony. In homes of wealth this menial service was performed by a slave. Among the poorer classes, to which the disciples belonged, it was done by the men themselves, each taking his turn.

Now, it happened that while they were on their way to the upper room where Jesus was to eat the Passover with them they had been quarrelling as to which one of them was the greatest. James and John a little while before had gone with their mother to the Lord and asked for the chief places in the kingdom. Their request had been resented by the others. This and other matters came into the argument as they walked along that afternoon. They became heated and angry and a bitter quarrel was in progress by the time they reached their destination.

Sullen and resentful they filed into the room and seated themselves like a group of sulky boys. Then there was a pause. The time had come for one of them to wash the feet of the rest. There at the door were the pitcher and the basin and the towel. But there was not one of them moved. For one of them to have volunteered for this humble service would have been to have owned that he was the servant of the rest.

More than this they all had their individual prejudices. John had wanted the first place. Was he to wash the feet of Peter? No indeed! And was Peter, who hated Judas like a snake, to get down on his knees before him? Surely not! The worst of this plight was not the unwashed feet. It was their state of mind. They were thinking about themselves and not of the Kingdom of God. In their hearts were hate and envy. In such circumstances Jesus could not speak to them of the things that were so near to His heart. How was He to quench their passion and stir love and humility within them?

This is what He did. He arose from His place, laid aside His outer garment and tied the towel aboht His waist. Then He took the basin and, beginning with Judas, He unbound their sandals and washing their feet wiped them with the towel that girded Him.

In this story John does what we note nowhere else in his writings. He tells us the motives that animated Jesus. First, was His love. He begins the story with the words, "Having loved His own that were in the world He loved them unto the end." You can determine at once the trend of a man's life by the motives that actuate his conduct. There are some characters in history whose lives may be summed up in that one word "revenge". One of the heroes whom we all admired as children was William Wallace of Scotland. You remember the story as it is given in "Scottish Chiefs." He came home from an enforced absence and found that his wife had been killed by a cowardly soldier. There beside that bed he swore that he would never sheath his sword until it had been plunged into the heart of her murderer. From that moment revenge was his motive.

Jesus' motive was love. Back of every word and deed was love. It is the only motive that can bring us permanent peace.

Second, as a motive for this act John tells us that Jesus knowing that He came from the Father and went to the Father, and knowing that the Father had put all things into His hands, arose and took a towel and girded Himself. It was the knowledge that He was supreme in heaven and in earth that made it possible for Him to do this service. Men who are not sure of their dignity and position are always quibbling over questions of precedence. A king can afford to ignore these things.

Some years ago I met a rear admiral in the United States navy. I made the mistake of calling him captain. It was brought to my attention later on and I apologized. He smiled and said that he had not noted it. Only a little while before a first lieutenant had instantly corrected me for presuming to call him an ensign. To the little man it meant much. To the admiral it meant nothing. He could afford to ignore titles.

Jesus, knowing that the Father had put all things in His power, took a towel and girded Himself. Conscious of His dominion over all things, He scorned to notice the petty distinctions of which the disciples made so much. Here is one of the most important suggestions of the incident. If we were more solicitous and surer of our eternal welfare, we would not quibble and contend so much concerning earthly distinctions.

The third fact arose out of the comment of Peter. Jesus began with Judas. Peter was next to the last one, therefore, whom Jesus washed. While He was busy with the other Simon had been busy with his thoughts. It was he doubtless who had been one of the very loudest in the dispute as to which should be greatest. It may have been his turn that very night to wash the feet of the rest. More and more ashamed he became until at last Jesus came to him. Then he said, "Lord, Thou shalt never wash my feet." Jesus softly answered, "If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with me." Then Jesus said, "He that is clean needeth not have to wash his feet, but is clean every whit."

The Lord made plain here to Peter that unless he was washed, unless he by faith took that sacrifice of Calvary and rested on it for his salvation, he had no part with Jesus. He had to be washed, and you and I must be washed also.

But what about those who have been washed from their sins, who have accepted Christ? Jesus says to you, "Ye have need only to wash your feet." That is, you need only each day to be cleansed from he pollution of contact with the earth. No matter how holy and sinless you are, you cannot walk in the mire without being soiled. You cannot come in contact with sinful surroundings, and with sinful men and women; you cannot feel the polluting touch of temptation, even if you do not yield to it, without being contaminated. You need before you come before the Lord each day to be cleansed with confession and penitence.

More than this Jesus taught us here what humility is. Once each year in the sacred precincts of St. Peter's in Rome the Pope washes the feet of twelve men. These are old men, are clad in white wool after being washed and perfumed from head to foot. Then the pope comes along and sprinkles a few drops of water on their perfumed feet and after this kisses them.

Long ago Luther protested against the form of foot-washing as being a travesty on true humility. And it is. Peter pondered for years over this act of Jesus and then before he left us he wrote in his epistle: "Be clothed in humility." I love this sentence. It tells us just what humility is. Peter was thinking of that day when Jesus laid aside His garment and took a towel and girded Himself. The towel was the badge of servitude. The man who wore a towel about his waist was a servant. Peter says, "Be clothed in humility." There are two kinds of clothes, uniforms that men wear. One is the garment of command, the uniform of one who is served, like the officer. The other is the garment of the servant, the man or woman who lives to help others, like the trained nurse. Peter said, "Be clothed in humility." Wear the garb of the soul who is ready to serve.—Rev. S. N. Hutcheson, D. D., in Presbyterian.

"They Gave First Their Own Selves."

Occasional enterprises of a semi-business sort, set on foot by Christian people for the benefit of their churches or other religious causes, ought not to rank in our minds as a permanent and primary form of stewardship. The doctrine of Christian stewardship goes further and deeper. And it goes further and deeper than the giving of money, though it includes that, of course, and inevitably.

While we are pressing, and rightly pressing, upon our people the duty of giving money in some systematic and ordered way for the promotion of the cause of Christ, let us keep steadily in mind the fact that Christian stewardship, Christian trusteeship, neither begins nor stops with the giving of money. The grace of God, which was given to the churches of Macedonia, made their deep poverty abound "unto the riches of their liberality." Paul bears witness that they gave of their own accord, "according to their power" and, for that matter, "beyond their power." But "first they gave their own selves to the Lord." They were exhorted to abound in this grace of giving, but they had already abounded in everything, in faith, and utterance, and knowledge, and in all earnestness."

The great pecuniary necessities of our common Christian enterprises, the great favor which God has bestowed upon these efforts to honor and glorify Him, the great blessings which have come to others through the ministry of these enterprises, the great opportunities which challenge us to do our level best, all these have made it inevitable that we should press hard upon our own hearts and upon the hearts of others, the duty of cheerful and generous giving to these causes. We sometimes wonder, though, if our responses to these pleadings would not be more vital, if our support of these great causes would not be steadier and more dependable, if we could mix our giving, or rather, if there could lie behind our giving as its ultimate motive and spirit, our own prayerful and intelligent sympathy with the institutions and enterprises to which we send our gifts. They first gave their own selves. That is the Scriptural principle and it remains as sound and fruitful and commendable as ever.—Religious Herald.

ANOTHER DAY.

J. Jones.

In glory deck'd, the Eastern sky awaits
The approach of one before whose beams alone,
The darkness sinks into oblivion.
Awaits, if it be meet to measure heaven,
By earth's own little things, like some fair bride,
Arrayed in gogeous raiment bright and warm
In golden tints an ever-changing light—
The dimples playful on a youthful face
They come and go amidst her radiant smiles—
Fair counterpart of him the rising sun,
Whose sterner strength now claims the heavens his own.
And earth, although in humbler aspect shows
As deep a sense of love and gratitude
T'ward him, on him dependent for all source
Of light and heat, his chiefest attributes.
And all which goes to make her beautiful.
As when creation's work was first begun,
When from eternal slumbers 'woke the morn
And peeped into the day the first of all—
As when all substance heaped up in one mass
Of towering height and shapeless bulk obeyed
The Voice Divine which called it into form;
So now before the brightening twilight fades
The stars as one by one they disappear,
And out of gloomy darkness outlines grow
Of hill and vale and rippling stream whose voice
The feathery tribe takes up and answer back,
A tuneful song in which all nature joins.
The mighty oak bends down his sturdy arms,
Before the gently rising morning gale,
And rustling all his leaves thus gladly joins
The little flower whose only voice a smile—
A smile though on a face still wet with dew
The tearful mem'ry of the dark and past.
Ye dark and past, farewell, sad night be gone,
No longer hide this world in dismal gloom
But spread thy darkening pinions, hie thee hence,
And let the glory of the hills come down.
Ah! man still asking for he knows not what,
Forgetful that 'tis mercy's hand that veils
The future from our care with all its ills
To yonder man, with tottering steps and slow,
Descend the valley of the sullen stream;
Supported on his staff, he walks alone.
Approach and ask him of a peaceful life,
Which goes out like a flickering taper spent.
Now pity as he points with palsied hand
To whitened locks and tells, with tears, of grief
More hard to bear than many winter's frosts.
"I once was young, life's morning all aglow,
When love, that strong emotion of the soul,
That strength possessed of which we all are weak,
Enthralled me in its iron but phantom grasp.
But go thy way, let not my lot fore tell;
Rejoice in youth, in strength and still in hope.
This learn of one who 'waits a brighter day,
Beyond the realms of time and memory.
I feel its glories as they dim my sight—
Life's but the night! and death the fretful dream
Which makes with warm eternity the day!
I gladly bid farewell to all that's past,
Nor doubt the love of One above who brings
The eternal radiance of another day."

Mr. Jan.

"Don't send this old gentleman away to the men's hospital, without first having a talk with him," pleaded the caretaker of the women's dispensary in Paoting-fu, China. So the missionary, who had come to talk to the women and children waiting for the lady doctor, went into the dispensary, where a scholarly-looking old gentleman had been asked to have a seat.

After due apologies for having made the mistake of coming to the women's, instead of the men's, dispensary, this old Chinese scholar began to speak of his chief interest in life, namely—his boys' school. This was a few miles outside the city. Naturally, the conversation drifted into the "reason" for missionaries and clinics. Then leaked out the tale of the craving for the true God, which had for many years possessed this man's soul; again proving, as Peter said in the house of Cornelius, "Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons: but in every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him." He told how, whenever he could find a substitute to teach his school, he would go away up into a high mountain on which was a temple, and dwell there. Sitting down behind the idols, he bent his whole energies on concentration, on the "Maker of heaven and earth." Endeavoring to do with as little food, water, even sleep, as possible, his whole being cried out for the Truth. So intent on his object that he tried not even to allow himself to move. "Sometimes," he said, "I could only get a substitute to teach my school for ten days, sometimes for fifteen; but once I got one for three whole months, and all of that time I spent on my quest. Oh! to know the One who made heaven and earth." "Did you ever hear His voice?" asked his listener. "No, I did not, but a friend of mine once did," came the quick response.

Only one who has actually experienced the joy of telling a bright, trained, receptive mind, who has never heard, the story of the One "Who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in times past unto the fathers by the prophets and who hath in these last days spoken unto us by His Son," can appreciate anything of the intense interest and delight of this cultured old scholar.

Gratefully he carried away a Wen Si copy of the New Testament; and as the time was the week of International Prayer, he came day after day to the church where the meetings were being held. On the Lord's Day he was most regular, generally accompanied by friends and relatives, for perhaps two or three months; and then never again did we see him.

The missionary sent a Chinese Evangelist to the address Mr. Jan had given her, but Tsui Hsien Sheng failed to find him. Afterwards she learned that there were two villages of the same name, an east and a west. The lady doctor and the missionary kept praying for Mr. Jan's return, but still he came not. Later, they united in asking for some word of him. A few days later the answer to that petition came through a young woman who came to the dispensary with an ailing child in her arms. The surname she gave was Jan; the village the same as his. "Do you know an old gentleman of your name who has a boys' school in your village?" was eagerly asked. With a startled look the young mother replied, "You know about him, do you not? He was this boy's great-grandfather, and he died praying to your God." "When?" "Just when he stopped going to your gatherings." "Was he ill long?" was the next query. "Not ill at all: he was kneeling on the Kang (brick bed) praying, and suddenly he stopped breathing."

How many are there in heathen lands like Mr. Jan, seeking after the true God? What are we, who have been entrusted with the Bread of Life for others, going to answer when we meet Him who gave His life for us?—Selected.

Discipleship.

Jesus understood the cost of discipleship. "Let him take up his Cross and follow me." As Dr. Stalker points out in his "Ethics of Jesus", the originality and pathos of those words may escape our notice. As a lad Jesus may have witnessed the act of crucifixion—a common punishment in Palestine—following the noisy crowd and shrinking from the horror of it all. One trait of cruelty and scorn seems to have stung His imagination. This was the fact that from the place of detention to the place of execution the condemned man had to carry on his own back the apparatus of his doom. This burned in the memory of Jesus and when He required a name for all that can be imagined of shame and suffering, He said, "Let him take up his Cross and follow me." Christ's audiences knew what He meant and our Lord was telling them that it was worth while.—Presbyterian Banner.

A PLEDGE.

Putnam Kyle.

I made a pledge—a simple thing to keep,
And yet a devil nags me night and day
To break it—A pledge in memory of her.
I must not yield, 'twould break her heart and mine.
I could not hear the night wind's restful sigh,
And skies would never seem so pale a blue.
I love a pale blue sky and winds that sigh,
But greater still, I love her faith in me:
In thankfulness, oh, Lord, I turn to Thee.

BELIEVE.

Believe God is!
That all the heights and breadths and depths are His!
The birds of light
The fears that wake at night,
The psalms of gladness and the silences;
The instinct strong that will not let thee stay
Thy hand from labor though thy sight be dim;
All, all are but the windings of the way
That leads at last to Him.

Believe thou art
Of all the wondrous universe a part
Not small nor slight,
But precious in His sight,
Who planned thee, soul and body, mind and heart;
Who formed thee, tuned thee, set thee, and doth know
If to His touch thou givest answer true.
Then faint not, wondering heart, though thou dost go
Softly, the long days through.

Little Kindnesses and the Apple Tree.

"What an ugly old stump that is by our pretty garden!" said the Larkspur, with a shudder. "Why didn't they dig it up and throw it away when the tree died? We don't want useless old things about."

"Yes, indeed," answered the Phlox. "Did you ever see anything like those great ugly gray arms sticking out in every direction? Why, he quite frightens me on moonlight nights."

But the Lilac bushes cried: "How unkind you are all! None of you were ever half as beautiful as that old Apple Tree when he was alive and well. His great splendid branches sheltered this corner of the garden for years upon years, and every spring he was a whole garden in himself, of lovely sweet pink and white blossoms. We were all so proud of him, and his wisdom and beauty and goodness. He took such care of the birds who built in his branches. We miss him so much, and are glad that his old stump is still with us."

But the silly Phlox and Larspur and Verbenas laughed at the Lilacs, saying, "Oh, you are 'most as old as he was, and your leaves are getting gray. You are no judge! The stump is quite out of place here with its dead bark and ugly limbs."

"They make me quite ill," said the Mimosa. "I must turn my head away."

"He cannot help being old and ugly," said the Convolvulus, gently. But nobody took any notice of her. She had grown from a little seed that had dropped on the ground by the hedge, not far from the old Apple Tree, and didn't belong to any one in particular, for she was outside of the garden bed.

"He looks so lonely," she thought; "perhaps he would be glad of a friend."

So she put out her tender stem with its tiny leaves and buds, and crept along the little space of ground between her and the old trunk. It was really a very small distance, but it seemed quite a walk to her. When she was close beside him, she whispered in a frightened little voice: "I have come to see you, dear Stump."

A deep voice answered, "Glad to see you, little friend; climb up here. I'll give you a hand."

So the convolvulus stretched up her tiny hand, and grasped the rough gray one; and day by day, step by step, she climbed a little higher. Her old friend encouraged her, saying, "That's fine! That's a brave little creeper! Climb a little higher, Comrade!" And she would answer.

"How much further I can see than I did before I tried to climb. I am way above the other flowers, and how near I am to the beautiful blue sky." And she wound her soft arms around the rough gray stump, and helped herself along on the knots and rough places that looked so ugly to the other flowers.

By the time late summer was come she had covered the trunk with garlands of her own fresh leaves and beautiful crimson flowers. They waved in the sweet morning air, and crowned the Apple Tree with such beauty that he said:

"Oh, you make me think of my happy life, when all my sweet pink and white children were babies, and later when they grew into such fine red apples. How everybody admired me! Thank you, dear little Morning Glory, for coming to comfort a poor old thing like me!"

She answered:

"I was so sorry when the flowers said all those things about you" ("I heard them," he murmured) "that I wanted to do something for you; but I was so afraid that I could never get so far, or climb so high; and if you had not helped, I never could have done it."

So they passed a happy summer together. The old tree told her stories about all the birds who had ever built in his branches; how he had sheltered them and what fine families they had raised. He told her all they had told him about the far-off, sunny lands they had visited, and other wonderful tales of people and places, till little Morning Glory thought how lucky she was to learn so much that most flowers do not know.

One day the Lady visited her garden. She had been away for a long time.

"Oh! Adam," she said to the gardener, "I am so glad that you saved so much of the dear old Sheep's-nose Apple Tree. I love it better than anything else here, when I remember its glorious blossoms, and all the good red apples it has given me! I was sorry to lose it, and what a bower the Morning Glories have made about it. Dear old thing! It is quite the most beautiful thing in the garden now, I think."

Some of the flowers hung their heads as their mistress passed by; but the Morning Glories lifted their little trumpets on high, and blew them as loud as they could for joy.

They didn't mind if the old Toad did croak, and say, "How long will this last! You won't look so pretty when the frost comes."

But they never heeded him, and when the time drew near for Morning Glory to go to sleep, the old stump said:

"Lay that dear little Baby Seed of yours right down in this hole in my heart; there is enough good soil there to keep it warm. I will watch over it all winter, and next summer it will cover me with beauty again."

Little Kindness had never dreamed of such a beautiful reward!—The Young Christian Soldier.

A Little Kitten's Puzzle.

Grandma was sorry she ever thought of giving the black kitten to Janey and Carolyn when she learned that they quarreled about its name. Janey wished to name the kitten "Midnight" because it was so black, and because it was so black Carolyn insisted upon calling it "Jetty". The only fact about that kitten upon which the little sisters agreed was its color. It was unquestionably black.

Janey wished the kitten to be fed nothing but milk, and begged to keep its bed in the kitchen. Carolyn tried to teach the kitten to eat everything, even oranges; she was glad mother said it must sleep in the woodshed. It did seem as if the little black kitten made more trouble in the family than anything that had ever happened—even measles. Mother threatened to send the pretty creature back to the farm to live with its mother cat and grandma and grandpa.

While mother, father, grandma and grandpa were feeling so bad, because Janey and Carolyn quarreled about their pet, no one stopped to think that the kitten was much troubled himself. You see, he didn't know whether he was Midnight or Jetty. Sometimes he thought he was Midnight, and liked nothing but milk to drink; again he was sure he was Jetty, who preferred bits of beefsteak for dinner. It was extremely puzzling.

One day something happened that never had happened before.

Said Janey: "It's name is Midnight, I tell you."

Said Carolyn: "And I tell you its name is Jetty."

The kitten had listened to this many times before, but when Janey made a face at Carolyn and Carolyn that very minute made a face at Janey the kitten fled.

One day passed, two days passed, and the kitten failed to return. Janey waited with fresh saucers of milk. Carolyn waited with a feast spread on the woodshed steps.

At last Janey cried. "I am afraid something has happened to our dear kitten," she said. "Oh, if it will only come back we will call it 'Jetty'!"

"Don't speak of it," answered Carolyn. "If the sweet thing ever comes back I shall be too glad to call it 'Midnight'. I am afraid it has been killed by dogs."

"Or run over by an automobile," wailed Janey.

"And it is all our own fault," persisted Carolyn. "If we had even said, 'Come back, kitty, kitty, kitty,' that day, I believe it would have stayed at home."

"Instead of doing that," moaned Janey, "I called, 'Come, Midnight, Midnight, Midnight,' and it mewed and ran fast."

"Yes," added Carolyn, "and when I called, 'Come, Jetty, Jetty, Jetty,' it mewed and ran faster than ever. I believe that kitten knew more'n we supposed."

"Oh, I often saw the little thing wash its face and think at the same time," admitted Janey.

One moonlight evening, when Janey and Carolyn were sitting on the front steps, with their arms around each other, who should come walking up the garden path but one black kitten followed by a second black kitten? Midnight and Jetty had come home, but which is which neither Janey nor Carolyn knows to this day. All they do know is that grandma's kitten from the country came home with a twin so exactly like himself that even grandma can't tell which one is the farm kitten.

The kitten himself knows which one he is, because once in a great while when Janey and Carolyn talk over the past and agree never to quarrel over anything again, one kitten winks at the little girls. Before Janey and Carolyn get over their surprise the kitten quickly has a game of "tag" with his twin, and three seconds after that no one can tell which kitten winked, because they both look so exactly alike and so pleasant.

Perhaps all kittens would do nothing but purr cheerfully and never mew if they lived with such loving little sisters as Janey and Carolyn have been ever since their black kitten left home long enough to think of a way out of his puzzle.—Boys and Girls.

REFLECTED JOYS.

Martha S. Lippincott.

Shall we ever learn to know
Love and happiness are best,
And that life will, sweeter be,
When, with love's delight, 'tis blest;
That, in greed and selfishness,
No real happiness, we'll find,
And we'll only feel real joy
In e'er being good and kind.

Joy we give to other lives
Is reflected in our own,
Bringing greatest happiness
That our souls have ever known.
Smiles upon another's face,
That our loving deeds have brought,
Bring us all the joys of life,
Of which our dear Saviour taught.

Let us then be giving joy
To help brighten others' lives,
And, much happier, we'll be
Than the person who just strives
To be gaining for himself
Selfish pleasures of this life,
Never caring if he stirs
Up greed's selfish, evil strife.

The Pocket Baby.

Mother Kangaroo, whose real name is Mrs. Macropus Rufus, because her hair is red, came leaping home across the tall grass plain. She couldn't get back to her baby fast enough. All day long she had been hunting a new feeding ground, because her sharp teeth and Baby Rufus' sharp teeth and Father Kangaroo's sharp teeth had cut all the grass about their home down to the roots.

Just like shears their teeth went. Snip! Snip! Sniv!

Mother Kangaroo's sturdy tail hit the ground at every bound, making her go up in the air like a jumping jack. Down she came on the whole sole of her long, strong foot. Up she went, ten feet at a bound.

Up, down! up, down! Ever so far.

Down, and not up at all. Crashing, tumbling, clawing, went Mother Kangaroo. No ground under her at all. One moment Mother Kangaroo was under the blue sky and the next she was far down in a dark pit. Some one had dug the pit and put grass over it so the top looked like solid ground. And here she was, no room to jump. No room to move. Here she was, stuck fast.

What was it she heard?

Baby Rufus, leaping about on the plain over her head, calling to her.

"Go away! Go away!" she shrieked in kangaroo language. "You'll fall in, too."

For the first time in his six-months' life Baby Rufus didn't mind his mother's voice.

There he was on the edge of the pit, looking down. There he was on the edge of the pit, digging, digging, digging, with his little five-fingered hands on his short forelegs, clawing and scratching and scraping with his big razor of a toe on his hind foot.

Baby Rufus was trying to dig the mouth of the pit larger so Mother could scramble out.

"Run, dear! Run!" begged Mother Kangaroo. She could smell them, the men who had dug this pit for her. They were coming, a long way off, to see what was in it. What they wanted with her she didn't know. All she knew was that they mustn't get Baby Rufus.

Baby Rufus was deaf to her cries. He dug and dug and dug. Dirt flew. Up came tough grass roots. Paws went like mad. Already she could see his blackish little muzzle nearer. His tail was thumping the ground, calling Father Kangraroo to come and help dig Mother out of a hole in the ground.

Thump! Thump! Thump-thump! Father was on his way. Scramble and scratch went bigger claws. Father was there. Father was digging. Baby Rufus was there still. Baby Rufus was digging.

Mother Kangaroo couldn't do a thing but sit still, waiting for the hole to get large enough for her to move her arms and legs.

Away off, she heard them, men coming to get her. Father heard. So did Baby Rufus. Did they run away? No, indeed. Dirt flew faster. Paws went faster. One more ripping stroke of big big razor toes. Father Kangaroo's gripped Mother Kangaroo's shoulder, pulled and pulled. Up came an arm. More dirt flying. A scramble—up out of the pit came Mother Kangaroo.

Mother's two hands snatched Baby Rufus to her, putting him down, all so safe and warm, in her pocket. What if he was six months old? Just as he did when he was a new-born scrap of a blind baby, naked and weak, Baby Rufus went riding in the pouch his mother wore for him, right on her warm, furry body.

Off over the plain they went leaping, two reddish streaks, Father Kangaroo and Mother Kangaroo.—Gertrude Robinson, in Exchange.

Being Content With Our Gifts.

Sarah Evans was glum and discontented because her parents were poor, while the parents of Delia Harper, one of her schoolmates, were very wealthy. "Mother," she said, rebelliously, "Delia can have everything, while I can have nothing. I say it is not fair!"

To her surprise her dear mother laughed until she cried—Mrs. Evans did have a habit of seeing the amusing side of many girl happenings. Then she said: "Sarah, it is really very amusing to me. Only a few days ago Mrs. Harper said to me, 'Delia is so sour and envious because Sarah has so much musical taste, while she has none'; and she told me Delia used the very words that you have just spoken, 'It is not fair.'

"You girls remind me of a humorous picture of two mules in pastures, separated by a fence. Each mule was stretching his neck under the fence, trying his best to reach the grass in the adjoining pasture instead of being content with his own.

"The Apostle Paul spoke a great truth when he said, 'And be content with such things as ye have; for He hath said, I will never leave thee nor forsake thee.' For my part, I am thankful that girls have different gifts. Delia need not be envious of your musical taste, for her

BUYING MONUMENTS

When buying monuments the important factors are to secure the very best material and workmanship. From a material standpoint you can make no mistake if you require your dealer to use Winnsboro Granite. It should be of even texture and straight grain, free from defects, such as stains, white or black streaks, white or black splotches of size, or waves (varation in the mixture of light and dark crystals) in the grain.

You can yourself test the stone by having a bucket of water thrown over it. Defects which are not apparent when the stone is dry stand out prominently when it is wet. It is important to know, however, that the stone is not some stone similar to Winnsboro Granite, but the real Winnsboro Granite, which means first grade product of the great Anderson quarries of the Winnsboro Granite Corporation, Rion, S. C.

This granite costs more and is strictly graded. You can afford to pay your dealer something more for a monument built of such stone, if you are interested in having a monument which will last, remain beautiful through centuries, and afford high legibility of inscription. The quarry will issue through your dealer a guarantee that the stone which he uses for your purchase of a monument is Winnsboro Granite, which means the very first grade of perfect stone sold by Winnsboro Granite Corporation. Do not accept second grade stock unless you are willing to have the monument carry certain irregularities known to the trade as defects. Since the cost of the stone in the finest Winnsboro Granite monument is only about 20 per cent of the total cost of the erected monument, you can afford to pay the higher price for a real Winnsboro Granite monument, and have the assurance that there is nothing better to be had for permanence, beauty and legibility of inscription.

teacher told me she was the best student in English in her class—you can see that she is not being spoiled by her father's money.

"Do you remember, daughter, my telling you that I had quite a gift as a writer, and sold many stories before I married your dear father, and had a family to care for? Well, one day a young lady came to me and told me she was writing a novel and would like to show me a few pages. The story was worthless, as one could see at a glance. Then she said to me, 'It will be illustrated,' and showed me a few illustrations. Why, her birds almost sang, her leaves almost rustled in the breeze, while I could almost inhale the perfume of her flowers! She had a wonderful talent, and she knew it not. If I could only have opened her eyes to the pasture on her own side of the fence!

"Use what you have, Sarah, for you have a real gift in the musical line. Think of another verse by Paul, whom we might well call the great Apostle of Content, 'For I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content'."—Home Quarterly.

For Another's Sake.

Three-year-old Lois tripped at the family's summer camp, and broke her arm. The doctor came to set the bone, and because that is very painful, he gave little Lois an anesthetic, so she would not feel the pain. Then he told her mother not to give her anything to eat for a while, for food after this anesthetic, might make her sick. "Keep her where she won't see anything to eat," said he.

In the sitting-room where she lay, a box of candy stood on the mantel. When ten-year-old Mary suggested that they bring the box out on the porch, eleven-year-old Arthur shook his head. "Lois would see us," he said, "and it would make her want candy. Supposin' we do without it till she's better." "All right," said Mary, "what's a box of candy, anyway, compared to Lois!" You see, these two were setting aside their own desires, for the sake of a weak, little sister who might be hurt, if they did what they wished.—Exchange.

Deaths

MRS. J. T. FARINHOLT.

Entered into Life Eternal, on Friday, December 20, 1929, ELIZABETH DuVAL, beloved wife of J. T. Farinholt.

She was born October 11, 1871, at Highgate, Gloucester County, Virginia, daughter of John R. and Laura Cordelia (Pagaud) DuVal.

In addition to her husband, she leaves three sons: T. Garland and J. DuVal Farinholt, of this city, and Robert Farinholt, of Philadelphia; and five daughters, Mrs. James Phillips, of Hackensack, N. J., and Mrs. F. C. Wiatt and the Misses Elizabeth, Martha and Alice Farinholt, of Newport News.

Her whole thought was devoted to the upbringing of her family. Her loving care brought all of her children to maturity. We now see that her quiet life was perfected by love. In her Church, St. Paul's, the same quiet service was manifest.

Our richest jewels attract by the light of their own fire and this choice soul gladdened the hearts of those who knew and loved her best.

"She hath done what she could."

"Well done, good and faithful servant, thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things. Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

L.

MRS. SUSAN BROWN CRAWFORD.

MRS. SUSAN BROWN CRAWFORD, widow of the Reverend Angus Crawford, D. D., for many years Dean of the Virginia Theological Seminary, passed into life eternal on Friday, December 13, 1929. Her death came as the result of a distressing automobile accident, sustained near the Virginia Episcopal School at Lynchburg, Va. She is survived by one sister, Mrs. Lucien Lee Kinsolving, and by four children, Mr. Angus McDonald Crawford, Dr. Charles B. Crawford, Mrs. Oscar DeW. Randolph and Mrs. Merritt T. Cooke. Mrs. Cawford was born at Mount Holly, New Jersey, on January 4, 1860, and it was there that she first met Dr. Crawford, who was rector of the parish church. Most of their married life was spent on the Seminary Hill. "The Wilderness," their Seminary home, under Mrs. Crawford's gracious presence, left its influence upon many generations of students of the Seminary and of the Episcopal High School. She brought to the social life of the Seminary a dignity and poise which gave evidence of contact with a larger world outside, and yet withal there was an atmosphere of simple and wholesome religion. It was a home in which culture and radiant joy seemed to mingle quite naturally with theological discussion, family prayers and the singing of hymns. All who had the privilege of sharing in the Sunday evenings at the Wilderness, in those days, will ever cherish the memory of Dr. and Mrs. Crawford as a rare heritage of their Seminary life. Her sudden going was a shock to her friends and loved ones, but for her we have confident faith that it means the more abundant life which the Christ came to give.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

loved rector of Christ Church and one of the most active clergymen in the city and especially prominent in the various community and philanthropic enterprises. On August 6, 1928, he resigned his charge on account of the state of his health and retired to a farm near Altavista, Virginia, where he and Mrs. Mead have since had their residence. The Rev. Mr. Willis took charge of Christ Church on November 1, of the same year as Mr. Mead's successor.

DELAWARE.

Rt. Rev. Philip Cook, D. D., Bishop.

A Testimonial of Appreciation and Regard.

Unusual recognition and appreciation of work well done was given the Rev. Frederick M. Kirkus, rector of Trinity Church, Wilmington, Delaware, on Christmas Day, and was reported by the daily press, both in the front page news columns and in the editorial columns. It took the form of a gift of $15,000 as a testimonial of their appreciation and regard tendered Dr. Kirkus, as a Christmas present from his parishioners, this being the twenty-fifth Christmastide under his rectorship and the last during which he will have charge of the parish. The gift took the form of a draft on the Equitable Trust Company for $15,000, enclosed with a letter from Henry B. Thompson, Senior Warden of the parish, in which he said: "This is an expression in part of our affection, and appreciation of service well done over a period of many years."

Dr. Kirkus tendered his resignation as rector of Trinity Parish some weeks ago, to take effect March 1, 1930, which will be the twenty-fifth anniversary of his assuming the charge. In accepting his resignation, the vestry of Trinity Parish adopted the following minute to be spread on the records and transmitted to the rector:

"The church wardens and vestrymen of Trinity Parish have received the resignation of their beloved rector, the Rev. Frederick M. Kirkus, D. D., to take effect at the expiration of his twenty-five years of service as rector of Trinity Parish, on March 1, 1930, and accepted the same with sincere regret.

"His resignation was accepted with complete understanding and full recognition of the altruistic motives which have prompted him in this action.

"In view of his devoted services of so many years, the vestry felt that there should be noted on the records of the parish an adequate expression of the high esteem in which he has been held as priest and rector, as an official in the affairs of the diocese and as a sincere councilor, and faithful friend to the membership of the parish.

"The accomplishments of Dr. Kirkus have been manifold, both spiritual and temporal. When he came in 1905 to Trinity Parish, he found a debt, an unfinished church edifice, inadequate parochial facilities, no endowment and a general relaxation of parochial activities resulting from an interregnum of rectors.

"Under his aggressive leadership, and primarily through his foresight and initiative, the debt has long since been liquidated and endowments for both the mother and daughter churches have been established, as well as a beautifully adorned church and a well planned and equipped parish building and rector. His business ability has evolved budgets and rational financing and through his leadership the financial obligations of the parish to the diocese and the general Church have been met.

"The welfare of the mother church, Old Swedes, has been faithfully cherished by him, and it is entirely due to his initiative and perseverance that this older branch of the parish has an endowment fund of considerable size.

"As priest and rector he has conscientiously discharged his duties, ministering to the needy and afflicted with rare devotion; preaching with power and elegance of diction; and effectively maintaining the dignity and beauty of the religious services.

"In the diocese he has served on official boards and committees with rare ability and has been notably effective in developing its missionary activities. Throughout his service his counsel has been highly valued as constructive, painstaking and well informed, and in the General Convention and the Provincial Synod as well as his ability and learning have been recognized and utilized.

"His people, whose love and respect he has gained through his useful and unsparing activity, feel that the retirement and relaxation which he seeks is a proper reward for his faithful services, and it is in a spirit and feeling of profound loss and regret that his resignation is accepted."

Personal Notes

The Rev. James Wilson Hunter, formerly rector of Holy Trinity Parish, Sykesville, Maryland, has left Maryland to take up his duties as rector of St. Andrew's Church, Fort Thomas, Kentucky.

The Rt. Rev. Thos. J. Garland, D. D., and Mrs. Garland left Philadelphia January 1, under leave of absence granted by the Standing Committee of the Diocese of Pennsylvania. They will make a world tour, including in their travels San Francisco, Hawaii, the Orient, Egypt Palestine, Europe, and will arrive in London in time to attend the Lambeth Conference, before returning to America.

The Rev. Stanley V. Wilcox, rector of the Memorial Church of St. Paul, Philadelphia, has accepted a call to St. Paul's Church, Chester, Pennsylvania. Mr. Wilcox, who will assume his duties in the parish vacated by Bishop Coadjutor Francis M. Taitt, before his consecration, is a veteran of the World War and was a missionary in Arizona for a number of years.

The Rev. G. Herbert Dennison is in charge of St. Timothy's, Roxborough, Pennsylvania, where his father was long rector.

KINLOCH

A TYPICAL, PICTURESQUE OLD VIRGINIA PLANTATION

Of 3,000 Acres, and Port Micou 1,600 Acres

Newly Restored and Reconditioned to Modern Standards of Comfort

And Now For Sale as a

GENTLEMAN'S ESTATE OR SPORTSMEN'S CLUB

"KINLOCH" is most accessibly situated in the beautiful valley of the Rappahannock midway between Washington and Richmond and less than 2 hours by motor over fine roads from either; 1 hour from historic Fredericksburg. Its acreage lies for 3 miles directly along the "Tidewater Trail," which connects that city with Newport News and the sea. There are 7 additional miles of good road on the plantation.

Superb and lasting construction went into the spacious, hospitable old mansion when built, about 1845. Now, with its thick brick walls, marble pillars, wonderful old plaster-of-paris ceiling ornamentation still unimpaired, and its many mantels and fireplaces of Egyptian and Italian marble, it proves amazingly adaptable to modernization. Its new owner has lately equipped it with electricity, appropriate lighting fixtures, and 8 up-to-date bathrooms, besides 3 showers. Water is supplied by electric pump from springs on the property.

The old-time detached kitchen, still serviceable, has been enlarged to a superintendent's dwelling. There is also a full quota of other buildings, some of brick, some frame, including stabling for 30 horses.

The old-fashioned formal garden with its boxwood hedges and yew trees needs only a little skilled attention to restore its former charm, while the long approach to the house is lined and its broad lawns dotted with unusual specimen trees in unique variety—yew, holly, magnolia, pecan, beech, fir, pine, crepe myrtle, etc.

About 1,000 acres are cleared and tillable, the remainder in young timber abounding in game of many sorts, including deer, turkeys, quail, foxes, etc.

Only a few hundred yards from "Kinloch" is "Port Micou," comprising 1,600 acres, with some 6 miles of river frontage on the Rappahannock, where excellent fishing, duck shooting, boating and bathing are available. The two estates could readily be combined into one, as "Port Micou" contains no valuable dwelling. Thirty passenger trains daily passing Milford station, on Richmond-Washington Railroad, which is railroad station for Kinloch.

Other properties of 576 acres and approximately 300, 200, and 100 acres, respectively, now under the same ownership, are likewise available.

DYSON HAGUE

Rector of the Church of the Epiphany, Toronto:
Doctor of Divinity and Lecturer in Liturgics and Ecclesiastical History, Wycliffe College

The object of this book is to supply the demand for a readable and reliable history of the Prayer Book of the Church of England, and it attempts in a very simple way to bring to the average churchman the information that is stored up in a multitude of inaccessible volumes. The author tells the story of the English Prayer Book from the day of its development in the early British Church to the present day. Special attention is given to the description of the work of the various Compilation and Revision Committees in the reign of Edward VI., and to the story of the Scotch, Irish, American, and Canadian Prayer Books.

THE SHIELD OF FAITH

"Finally, my brethren, be strong in the Lord, and in the power of His might.
Put on the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil.
For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places.
Wherefore take unto you the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having done all, to stand.
Stand therefore, having your loins girt about with truth, and having on the breastplate of righteousness;
And your feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace;
Above all, taking the shield of faith wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked.
And take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God;
Praying always with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit, and watching thereunto with all perseverance and supplication for all saints;
And for me, that utterance may be given unto me, that I may open my mouth boldly, to make known the mystery of the gospel,
For which I am an ambassador in bonds; that therein I may speak boldly, as I ought to speak."

INCENDIARISM

A terrible story comes from the scenes of the raging forest fires of the West, of incendiarism spreading the flames that thousands of brave men have been striving to subdue. Men have been discovered starting fires in the forests, while other men have been trying to put out the conflagrations that have been devouring thousands of acres of timber, destroying homes and menacing towns and settlements. Such proceedings have been like the acts of maniacs, or criminals of the most destructive propensities and purposes.

Those who are opposing the operation of the wholesome laws of our land, withstanding the benevolent and unselfish labors of good people for saving the nation and protecting the homes, the mothers, the children and the weak, remind us of the incendiaries who are spreading the fires in the Western forests. Shame on the men who make incendiary speeches, write incendiary articles in the daily papers, and exert incendiary influences in the social life of the people.

Such are the terrible attempts of infidel and atheistic elements to spread unbelief of God's truth, defiance of God's revelation, and opposition to all that is sacred and holy. It is said that the "Society of Militant Atheists" of Russia is enrolling members from fourteen years of age on up; organizing children from eight to fourteen in "groups of young atheists;" carrying the slogan, "To mobilize the millions against religion;" and that it is conducted by a "Central Council of Godless." Those who hate morality and who would destroy virtue in order that they may feed on the people, are trying to do away with all religion and all belief in God, so as to make men and women and children without conscience, and thus the prey of the dissolute and criminal. There are terrible fires of sin raging to-day, and, while Christian people are trying to subdue the flames, there are incendiary hosts of infidelity and atheism trying to spread the flames and destroy morality from the face of the earth. These influences are raging, too, in our own country, and are largely responsible for the increase in murders, suicides and other crimes against God and humanity.

In Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress" there was presented to the view of Christian a man who was striving with most earnest efforts to extinguish a fire which threatened to destroy a valuable building. It seemed that he should be successful. It seemed as if he were doing enough to extinguish the flames. It seemed as if enough water were being poured to save the building. But as Christian looked on these heroic efforts that were put forth patiently and persistently, he saw another man, on the other side of a wall, pouring oil upon the fire, feeding the flames, and withstanding the efforts that were being put forth to subdue the conflagration. Thus it is to-day in the work of the church of Jesus Christ to save the world. The church and all good people are doing a great and heroic work for the salvation of the world. They are terribly opposed and their efforts are largely thwarted. If it were not for God's promises, they might grow absolutely disheartened. But God says that there shall be the defeat of iniquity and the success of Righteousness, and so we persist, and will persist, till evil is conquered and the victory comes to the cause of Jesus Christ.

In some way or other, there has to be a great deal of fighting done to save this world for God. As the incendiaries who put the torch to spread the flames, so there are many who are spreading the fires of vice and crime. If we permit them to go on unresisted, every good and hopeful thing in this world will shrivel and perish. We must use the gospel, the truth, the knowledge of Jesus Christ, as water is applied to quench the flames. Incendiaries and incendiarism must be resisted and counteracted.

—E. P. Whallon.

DOES JESUS KNOW?

Does Jesus know of a mother's task
With her lively little brood?
Does He care when her strength is overtaxed
By the trials of motherhood?

Is He near when the children's thoughtless pranks
Tear her shattered nerves apart?
Can He see when patience is all worn out
And the unwilling tar drops start?

Does He understand when a cross word falls
From lips that meant to be kind?
Will He judge these faults with the blackest sins
Of faithless womankind?

Yes, He knows, methinks, of a mother's task
And He cares, for when I pray
His forgiving love gives me peace again
And strength for another day.

Multiplying Your Message.

Pastors can have church calendars and special announcements done neatly and in expensively on a duplicating machine. One concern has recently put out a machine for government postcards, which turns out fifteen hundred typewritten cards an hour. A western church said of this machine: "Short, crisp messages on one-cent postal cards enable us to keep in touch with visitors and members and help in the wonderful expansion of this church."

Another valuable asset to churches and Sabbath schools is an addressing machine. Members' names and addresses are stamped on plates or specially constructed cards, and these are used repeatedly in the machine in sending out communications. The plates also serve as a card index. Any Christian organization publishing a paper will find an addressing machine almost a necessity.

Churches and Sabbath schools that would like information on any of these machines may obtain it by writing to Church Equipment Service, The Southern Churchman, Richmond, Va.

What was the song the angels sang
When heav'n and earth with glory rang?
'Twas "Peace on earth, good-will to men".
How may we hear those strains again?
If Christ be born in us as well,
Then shall the chorus rise and swell.
Wise men of old brought gifts most rare;
Our gifts are service, love and prayer.

Men hate their kind, yet speak of peace;
'Tis love alone will make wars cease.
If Christ be born in every heart,
Our love for Him will make our part
So plain that "He who runs may read".
We'll stand together, help men's need.
We'll call him brother, live the name,
With loving service make our fame.

SENSE

In a recent issue of The Southern Churchman a thoughtful clergyman, writing of "The common sense of Jesus," said he feared the expression might seem irreverent. His fear, born of deep and admirable devotion, is baseless. Christianity is common sense, purified, honest, clear, simple, direct thought, unfettered, untainted, uncontaminated by selfishness, greed, passions or vanities. The Saviour in His teachings, precepts, life, parables, spoke to the common sense of normal people, mentally healthy and blessed with capacity for straight thinking, bestowed on all of us, evident in our childhood until, as too often seen, distorted and spoiled by bad examples or pernicious instruction, or both. Therein is the strength and resistless power of the faith He gave us. The Ten Commandments, foundations of civilization and orderly life, approved by many centuries of actual human experience, are common sense, as all of us must see and feel in our daily living. The Gospels contain no suggestion of speculative or exploring philosophy, no display of learning or extension of thought beyond the grasp of the ordinary mind. The sermon on the mount is the spirit of Divinity, the most sublime idealism, put in words so plain that the most sluggish and backward may understand. The parables touch no realm of statesmanship or lofty station, romance, art, poetry, misty scientific investigation or discussion. They tell of work in the field, of the shepherd and his flock, the foolish son and forgiving father—such things as any hearer might have seen and known. The faithful apostles were men of just common sense, earning their living by toil, some of them brought to belief only by honest deduction from what they saw with their own eyes. Common sense accepted Christ. High priests, Pharisees, Sadducees, Scribes, securely self-righteous, assuming intellectual and cultural superiority and vast erudition, rejected Him. Probably the thirty pieces of silver were accompanied by voluble and able argument to convince Iscariot that duty to tradition and society demanded acceptance of the bribe and betrayal of the intrusive Galilean.

Probably Pope wrote more truth than he comprehended when he described common sense as only the gift of Heaven and though no science fairly worth the seven. Plato compared with whom most of the world's self-inflated high thinkers are very pitifully puny pygmies, in his discourses on the existence and immortality of the soul took the path and used the language of common sense. Lord Bacon, ardent admirer of Plato and one of his few equals in depth and width and profundity of thought, did likewise. He accepted as beyond question the limitations of the human mind, insisted on the sure, unavoidable leading of human sense to belief in God, trust in Him and His Mercy and Goodness, dependence for hope in the future life on the Sacrifice and Intercession of God's Son. Before Bacon's time and in his time persons he spoke of as "schoolmen" produced complicated theological theories and philosophical deductions. All these illuminators are forgotten now, with their works, as will happen for many of the massive professors and their pretentious books and essays of the present; but Bacon found pleasure in analyzing and controverting his "schoolmen" and demonstrating their futilities and fallacies.

Common sense guides inevitably to religion and Christianity and Christianity inculcates, develops, cleanses and strengthens common sense, the kind of sense that makes useful citizens, wins and holds for us respect, good will and confidence, enlightens us to go from this world, as our times come, with rejoicing certainty of sweeter and higher and unending life to be known. It is given us with soul and conscience, making the mysterious, invisible trinity within us, the three in one working together to guide us from vices and follies to righteousness and wisdom and the reward of them.

Before the world this month is notable conflict, destined to be memorable for the tremendous good or evil of its results, between plain common sense and the principles of Christ and Christianity on the one side and narrow, petty ambitions, prejudices, hates, cowardice, purblind grasping, on the other. The common sense of the masses of the people of all countries favors and urges mutual concessions, frank, honest agreements, loyal and faithful striving, at the London Conference, to make war impossible and end strife among nations. The promise for peace on earth and good will among all men was proclaimed from the hosts of the Omnipotent and gave to minds scantily stored with knowledge and narrowly restricted in range conception more gloriously and magnificently and majestically beautiful than ever attained by the logic of the most studious philosopher or the imagination of the most brilliant poet. That conception and the hopes and yearnings created by it continue to live and glow. In all history there never has been a time when victory of common sense and Christian principles was needed so urgently, seemed so near, could bestow on humanity such priceless and permanent blessings as now. There never has been a time of more imperative demand for prayer to the Almighty; more inducement to all straight and honest and clear-thinking people to join humbly and fervently in the special services for the conference appointed by the Churches and in their own devotions to pour forth continually, from the depths of their souls the supplication, "Thy kingdom come; Thy will be done on earth as it is in Heaven."

Alfred B. Williams.

WE BELIEVE THAT THOU SHALT COME

By Kenneth Mackenzie

XXI.

WITH Jerusalem as the capital of the earth by divine appointment and in fulfilment of the eternal purpose of God, with the temple restored and the people occupying their own land at last in joyous possession, we are able to appreciate the weight of the predictions which portray world-wide conditions, hitherto unexperienced, the dreamed-of by poets, philosophers and statesmen.

Universal Righteousness

will be the order of that age. The incentive to sin will have passed. A social regime embracing the will of God and the good of the whole world will permeate every part of the human race. What we now witness of defiance of law, the arrogance of selfishness, the cruelty of malevolence will have lost incentive. It were well for us to regard this. Men are not naturally diabolical; though they may be weak under the pressure of temptation. Let the Scriptures be true that Satan and his hosts are imprisoned during this period of time (Rev. 20:1-3), and there is little room for doubt that humanity will be disposed towards regard for law, the consideration of the rights of others and the desire for benevolent motives, methods and manifestations. Consequently, as we read in Numbers 14:21, "But truly, as I live, all the earth shall be and the declaration of Isaiah 11:9, "They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain, for the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea," we have no need to remind ourselves that such a condition has never been experienced in the Christian dispensation; nor that it is farther from possibility of demonstration in our day than it has ever been, sad and humiliating as the confession may be. Therefore, let us the more heartily embrace what the prophets have unfolded and enter with them in the ecstatic outlook which they behold. With Isaiah we apprehend hopefully and expectantly that millennial blessedness which awaits this sin-burdened world, "Judgment shall dwell in the wilderness, and righteousness remain in the fruitful field. And the work of righteousness shall be peace, and the effect of righteousness quietness and assurance forever. And my people shall dwell in a peaceable habitation and in sure dwellings and in quiet resting places" (Isaiah 32:16-18). We have sung numberless times, "God shall bless us and with scant appreciation of the intent behind the familiar phrasing of the Deus misereatur (Psalm 67). But we note that the essential features of this Psalm are embraced in the divine intention to make His way to be known upon earth; His saving health among all nations. It is then that "all the people" shall praise Him.

We may permissibly employ the words in reference to our worship, "The Lord is in His Holy Temple: let all the earth keep silence before Him." But the prophet Habbakuk saw something more than we do. For he forecast the golden era which we are now studying and related this familiar text with the promise of the days when "The earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea" (Hab. 2:20; 2:14).

If we may reopen our contemplation of the Book of Isaiah, we shall there discern the same outlook for the human race, with Israel as the chosen people of God, missionaries of this great day of the Lord "so long anticipated in the Hebrew prophecies: "Thou shalt be called the city of righteousness" (1:26); "All nations shall flow into it" (2:2); "He will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering cast over all peoples, and the veil that is spread over all nations" (25:7); "In that day shall this song be sung in the land of Judah, 'We have a strong city; salvation will God appoint for walls and bulwarks'" (26:1); "Behold and princes shall rule in judgment" (31:1); "I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be my salvation to the end of the earth" (49:6); "Rejoice ye with Jerusalem, and be glad with her, all ye that love her; rejoice with joy for her, all ye that mourn for her; that ye may suck and be satisfied with the breasts of her consolations; that we may milk out and be delighted with the abundance of her glory. For thus saith the Lord, I will extend peace to her like a river, and the glory of the Gentiles like a flowing stream" (66:10-12).

This consolation of Israel, so markedly defined, so enthusiastically anticipated, so interwoven with the destiny of the entire earth, compels our honest consideration. Nothing but rank unbelief in the revealed Word of God can account for any measure of objection to the scheme which the prophets so signally outlined. Continuing the thought emphasized in our last section, let us note the deep affection outpoured by Jehovah in contemplation of this union of His own chosen race and the entire human family. "I will make an everlasting covenant with them. And their seed shall be known among the Gentiles, and their offspring among the people; all that see them shall acknowledge them, that they are the seed which the Lord hath blessed . . . For as the earth bringeth forth her bud, and as the garden causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth"; so

"The Lord God will cause Righteousness and Praise to spring forth before all Nations."

And in the heart of this passage lies the responsive cry of the prophet who impersonalizes the nation in the exultant declaration, "I will greatly rejoice in the Lord, my soul shall be joyful in my God; for he hath clothed me with the garments of salvation, he that covered me with the robe of righteousness, as a bridegroom decketh himself with ornaments and as a bride adorneth herself with her jewels" (Isaiah 61:8, 9, 10, 11).

In that age of universal righteousness, the outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon all flesh will be completely accomplished. While St. Peter allowed that Pentecost did witness to the fulfilment of the promise (Acts 2:16-21), there can be no question of the final accomplishment of the prediction in the glorious era which we are comprehending For not every detail was exhibited at Pentecost. We refresh our minds by recalling that prophecy may have a primary, a secondary or a tertiary fulfilment. There are occasional instances of this in the Scriptures. And here is one. So also the prediction of Jeremiah, linking with the words of Joel in 2:28-32. See Jer. 31:33, 34, "This shall be the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel: After those days, saith the Lord, I will put my law in their inward parts and write it in their hearts; and I will be their God and they shall be my people. And they shall teach no more every man his neighbor and every man his brother, saying, 'Know the Lord'." The writer of the Hebrews (Heb. 10:16) employs this passage to illustrate the new creation in Christ, but the end of the passage proves it to have a future significance.

"They shall all Know me from the Least of them to the Greatest,"

Canon Fawcett has aptly remarked that this will be "the age of worship as the present is the age of teaching." The statement suggests thought for thinking. We really are far from exemplifying the genuine spirit of worship. We "go to church" for other reasons, though we deceive ourselves in thinking otherwise. The attractiveness of some bright preacher, the charm of the musical part of the service, the wish to meet those whom we may expect to see there, to answer the call of conscience and "have it over," these and other considerations move us to church-going And thank the Lord, any motive is better than not going at all. But in the millennial age, the instinct for worship will be universal. Men will crave the elaborate ritual, which will express for them the glory of their inner thought of God, the winsomeness of His praise. All the exuberant outbursts of the Psalms, which are so inadequately expressed by us will then find full fruition.

In summing up this all too fragmentary discussion of that momentous period of the world's history, our thoughts may dwell upon our present relation to that age of universal well-doing. Apart from the fact that integrity and uprightness prove to be the wisest and most salutary motives of life, there is the added emphasis that the teaching lays before us. God, by the very nature with which He is qualified, desires to impart to us these impulses to a life of purity from all evil ways. He longs to be the spring of our inner being, to be the energizing of our outer life. What we have discerned as the pledge universal expression of the will of God on earth, for which we have thoughtlessly prayed all our lives, may ever now become a cosmic experience in our hearts.

And, as the Holy Spirit will then be outpoured upon all flesh affecting society in the beneficent manner we have noted, may not we make a new world in our own lives reverently acknowledging that He longs to dwell within us for the personal quickening which shall then be universal? So, if at that time, the glory of the Lord shall flood the Temple, since our bodies are the temple of the Holy Spirit, let us suffer Him to have His own way with us for filling and spiritual fruitfulness (1 Cor. 6:19, 20; Eph. 5:17; 3:13-21).

THE TRUE STONEWALL JACKSON

By the Reverend J. J. Clopton

THE BOYHOOD OF JACKSON.

TO write the life of a famous man exposes one to the danger of partiality, which prevents a true picture, or to the spirit of exaggeration of the weaknesses which is equally as false a standard. Biographers do well to keep before them the advice of Cromwell to the artist who would leave off a disfiguring mole on the face of the great Commoner. "Paint me as I am," was his rebuke.

It has been the author's desire in preparing his work to avoid the beaten track and contribute new facts to the history of the world-renowned Lieutenant of the great Chief of the peerless soldiers of the Lost Cause. Living in the community in which Jackson was reared—meeting face to face some of the contemporaries of Jackson's boyhood, he set about to gather from these and other sources—facts at first hand—that had escaped the notice or interest of others. Many of the contributions which make this memoir possible are from Jackson's contemporaries in the days of his boyhood and early manhood—long before any one dreamed either of his greatness or unrivalled goodness. The method I have pursued has been Boswellian in its efforts to preserve details. Should the writer in the receding ages of American History add another chapter to the Fame of one of America's greatest soldiers and patriots he will be amply rewarded.

Thomas Jonathan Jackson was born in Clarksburg, Harrison County, Va., January 22, 1824. His father was a lawyer by profession. He died when Jackson was only a few years old. It is interesting as casting light upon the childhood and youth of Jackson, as well as his future political creed, to remember that the American Republic had not reached its jubilee when Jackson came upon the stage. Not a few were living who had taken part in the battles of the American Revolution and in organizing the new Republic. The two great political creeds of States' Rights and Federalism were in active warfare. Jefferson, the great Champion of the Democracy, lived two years after Jackson's birth, and when the illustrious champion of Federalism—John Marshall, third Chief Justice of the United States—laid aside his untarnished ermine, Jackson was a boy eleven years of age. Opportunity, that potent herald of greatness, had not yet knocked at the door of the humble and obscure country lad; unborn were those feats in arms that were to class him with Marlborough and Napoleon; and the hour when his life would be early surrendered for a cause as old and as righteous as the Constitution. Western Virginia at this early date of Jackson's birth, was in many sections and respects almost a frontier, and the hardy virtues and vices of such environments were keenly alive.

When Jackson was not over six years of age, his mother having married a second time, he was taken by two bachelor uncles to their home. They lived near Weston in Lewis County. Here Jackson lived until he entered the United States Military Academy at West Point. One of these uncles, Cummings Jackson, was a man of some marked characteristics. He was over six feet in height, a man of strong natural understanding and of great physical endurance and courage. He organized a company of Argonauts and went overland from the Alleghenies of Lewis County to California, and subsequently he died there. No doubt in some respects he moulded the character of his afterwards distinguished nephew.

The uncles of Jackson were land-owners and slave-owners. Their occupation was farming and milling, and their house and mill still stand, rapidly going to decay, and mill long since disused.

As Jackson was reared on the west fork of the Monongahela River, a few miles below Weston, on a farm and to a life of toil; as his environment was far removed from seats of learning and his means slender, the lack of early advantages of culture are evident.

Authentic traditions still linger in the community in which he was reared illustrative of his manner of life and personal appearance and characteristics. The change from an ignorant farmer's boy to the learned professor and trained soldier—from the boy exposed to ungodly tutelage of his surroundings to the pious Church Elder—are some of the startling and unexpected facts of his life. From various sources of living witnesses I have gathered many facts of his boyhood and youth.

Horse-racing at the time was a popular and demoralizing past-time and business. Jackson's uncle, Cummings Jackson, owned a beautiful imported race horse. This horse was a sorrel named "Kit," and won most or all the races in the community. The boy, "Tom Jackson," was his uncle Cummings' jockey. It sounds stranger than fiction to be told that the afterwards great "Stonewall" won his uncle many local races. I record one of the traditions of his jockey days that reveals a sharp trick of his uncle. The story goes that Cummings Jackson would station himself on the home stretch and when his horse and youthful nephew, Tom, came in sight, by preconcerted agreement he would wave a red bandanna handkerchief as the signal for Tom to let the horse out at full speed, and "Kit" would come in winner.

There is an anecdote current in the community illustrative of Jackson's honesty as a boy. I secured this from a friend, now deceased, who got it from her father, who was one of the chief actors. The story is of one of the first efforts of Jackson to make some money. A well-known citizen of Weston, who knew the boy Tom Jackson, one daw heard him lamenting his desire to make some money. Jackson was then, I think, about twelve years of age. Every one called him Tom. One day Jackson expressed his desire to Mr. Kester to make some money. "Why not go fishing, Tom," said his friend. "I will buy all you catch at fifty cents each." Jackson took his advice and regularly brought Mr. Kester his fish. One day he caught a much larger fish than usual and lugged it for several miles from below town. As he passed the home of another citizen every effort was made to induce him to sell his fish at an advance on his usual rate. But in vain, his reply being, The fish is sold." When he reached Mr. Kester's his friend noticed the size of the fish and endeavored to get him to raise his price, but also in vain. "No, Mr. Kester, you have paid me for the long and short the same, and I can charge no more than my regular price of fifty cents." Nothing could induce him to change. Thus early did he shadow forth that tenacity and honesty of purpose which shone so strongly in his after life.

From the accounts of his boyhood Jackson grew up untrained by the influences, either of culture or refined womanhood, as no female presided in his uncle's house.

What I am about to relate of his boyhood I gathered from an aged lady who was his companion and pupil in their childhood. This lady vividly recalled his personal appearance, personal habits, dress and the surroundings of his home at "Jackson's Mill." His two uncles and himself composed the household. There were three Negro domestics, who were slaves. These three slaves, so my informant related, had their various duties apportioned—in the house, at the mill and on the farm. Mary worked in the field, Melinda carded the wool and wove the cloth, known as "Virginia homespun," which in those days formed the staple article for outer clothing for both owners and slaves in the rural districts. She also assisted in the nearby mill, as did the boy, "Tom Jackson." I know an old gentleman, now ninety years of age if alive, who told me he had often in boyish sport rolled in the grass with the youthful Tom when he went to mill, and often he had seen him covered with meal dust from his work as mill boy. This old gentleman's wife, nearly as old as her venerable husband, recalling her recollections of nearly seventy or quite seventy years ago, said "He was a handsome youth."

Celie was another of the slaves. She was housekeeper, cook and seamstress. Tom Jackson's duties were divided between laboring on the farm and at the mill. Thus Jackson grew up inured to toil and separated from culture by his home and local surroundings. I am enabled to write with vivid details of his boyhood and youth, embodying the accounts of this venerable contemporary, recently deceased. She recalled to me vividly Jackson as a youthful teacher in the rude "old field school," where not only she, but her youthful teacher learned most of his knowledge—until his entrance at West Point. As far as I know what I am about to relate from her and others of this period of his life, has never been in print.

About 1840, a rude schoolhouse was reared near Weston by one, Valentine Butcher. It was built of logs and no nails were used. The huge chimney was built of mud and stones—and not a single brick was used. For windows, instead of glass, greased paper was used. On one side of the rude cabin a log was left out. Over this opening was pasted greased paper, which made the paper somewhat impervious to rain and snow. The light within the building was furnished by this rude window and by the open door. The seats were made by splitting a log, and setting each piece upon pegs as legs. There was only one desk in the school, and it was equally as rude. It was made by splitting a log, dressing one side with the broad axe, and hanging the log on pegs from the wall. This desk was lowered at the time set aside for writing. The sessions of the school were brief, lasting from autumn until March. At that time the school closed, and the larger boys began their farm work for corn planting. Such was the school in which the great "Stonewall" Jackson began and ended his school days. There must, though, have been a great desire to learn, for as a youth he taught school. It was when he was about seventeen years of age that he taught in such a school as I have described. How far, by study and observation, he advanced this meagre stock of knowledge—we know not. The Hon. Andrew Edmiston, of Weston, W. Va., has told me that his father, then a young man, and afterwards an honored Judge of the Supreme Court of West Virginia, taught Tom Jackson the Higher Mathematics for about four months prior to his entering West Point as a Cadet. Also from a venerable member of the Buckhannon, West Virginia, Bar, Mr. W. C. Carper, I have been told that Jackson as a youth spent a year on the Ohio River as a woodchopper. All these details are illustrative of the fact of how limited were his opportunities. In personal appearance he was a large, over-grown boy. He has been described to me as handsome in appearance, and awkward in movement. His hair was dark and wavy. His eyes were blue, and his forehead high. He played with youthful vigor the rude games of his day with his scholars. One of his habits while at play was to shake his long wavy hair. He wore "homespun" clothes made of black sheep's wool. His "round-about jacket," as well as the rest of his attire, was of rude pattern and material. The luxury of even steel pens was then unknown. Lead pencils—certainly in his locality—were equally unknown. Quill pens were the only ones in use. One of Jackson's pastimes as instructor was to sharpen the quills for his pupils. They were requested to bring pewter spoons or pieces of spoons for lead pencils. The beautiful copy plate writing books were unknown and the handwriting was an individual asset. One of the duties of every teacher was to "set copy." I have seen a receipt framed and in the home of Hon. W. G. Bennett, Weston, W. Va., written by Jackson not long after the period he taught school, when he was filling acceptably the position of deputy constable. It is a plain hand-writing, no doubt written with a quill pen and distinct from that uniformity seen in the modern copy book. With such hand-writing Jackson "set copies" for his scholars. I am able to produce two of these copies verbatim, furnished me by one of his scholars.

One runs thus:

"Command you may—
Your mind from play—
Every hour in the day."

Another ran thus:

"A man of words and not of deeds,
Is like a garden full of weeds."

One of the punishments administered at that time to unruly scholars was called "fanning the rule." It was administered by the teacher holding the open palm of the culprit and striking it with the ruler. It was not an uncommon thing for the youthful teacher, Tom Jackson, thus to punish his scholars.

This same venerable lady told me Jackson, while teaching boarded one term with her mother. She vividly pictured to me some of Jackson's characteristics—one was his fondness for children—which never deserted him. During the long winter evenings, as he sat before the cheerful log fire, he would make grotesque faces to amuse the children of his humble hostess. Nor was there lacking kindness of a more practical kind. Jackson devoted two afternoons a week to wood-chopping for his widow hostess and her children. Being strong, he always chopped two big piles of wood and carried the large chips into the house. When he was starting for school each morning, he brought in a huge back log to insure a good fire during his absence. These homely traits of kindness and physical endurance picture to us the after hero in the garb he always wore—simplicity. Such are some of the authentic incidents in the humble boyhood of Jackson. Just before Jackson entered West Point, he was Deputy Constable of Lewis County. A very old resident has told me of seeing him making his rounds mounted, and also of the affection for him by the unfortunate, with whom he deeply sympathized. It is a significant token of his standing in the community, that long before he reached manhood he should have been entrusted with an office which implied courage and judgment.

BIBLE QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

(Our readers are invited to send in their questions from time to time concerning Scriptural subjects in which they are perplexed or desire light. Our limited space necessitates brevity in questions, as well as in the answers which we will endeavor to maintain in strict accord with the Word of the Lord, which, after all, settles all argument. This column is therefore not for controversy, but for a testimony.)

Question No. 15.—In availing myself of the advantage of your "Bible Question" column, will you kindly give the proper interpretation of that sentence in our Lord's Prayer which reads, "Lead us not into temptation."—Mrs. V. A. S., Rome Italy.

Answer.—In seeking light upon any part of God's Holy Word that may seem obscure, it is well to carefully consider the meaning of the expression used. The word "temptation, for example, is used in two different senses; viz.: (1) solicitation and enticement as used by Satan; (2) Affliction and trouble, whereby God may have occasion to try His people and which might properly be termed "testing under trial", as in 1 Peter 1:6, 7.

Recognizing our weakness in the flesh, yet desiring to serve God alone, we as little children, may well cry out to our Heavenly Father to spare us this testing as it were, and to deliver us from evil. A study of the different portions of Scripture where the words "tempt," "tempted," "temptation" are used, will afford much light, especially as to the distinction between the "permission," and the "directive" will of our God.

Also see the temptation and testing of Adam and Eve, Job, Abraham, and even of our Lord Himself. The entire prayer has also a dispensational aspect, but on which our limited space precludes comment.

Question No. 16.—"As your answer to Question No. 6 in the issue of November 16, concerning the many different names of our Saviour was especially interesting, I am lead to ask for any light The Southern Churchman may be able to also give concerning the different names af Satan.—A Student.

Answer.—Satan is referred to in Scripture under many different names, such as "Devil," "Prince of demons," "old serpent," "evil one," "wicked one," "Lucifer," cherub," "prince of the power of the air," "god of this world" (world systems operated by unregenerate humanity), "angel of light," "king of Tyrus," etc., and many others.

This mysterious and terrible personage is of great power, authority, and knowledge, yet how few know anything of the revelations of God concerning him. In power he ranks next to God, and controls vast numbers of demons, fallen angels, and evil spirits, as well as human beings, who do not belong to the family of God. His final doom is recorded in Rev. 20:10.

ORDER OF THE THOUSANDFOLD—1930.

"And he trembling and astonished said,
Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?"

The Call and the Answer.

"Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?"
Cried the great Apostle Paul:
"Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?"
When he heard the Master's call.

And the Master is calling today,
Calling to us each one,
While the whitened harvests unreaped stay,
And the Great Work lies undone.

"He that hath ears to hear"
And a heart that is honest and true,
Let him answer with voice and purpose clear,
"Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?"

Our Lord Jesus Christ, would like to make this world a very different place from what it is, and He wants all of us to do our full part in helping Him to do it. This is His call, and if we will answer it, as St. Paul did, there is no telling what wonderful things may come of it.

CONTROVERSY, COMPROMISE OR CONSENT---WHICH?

By the Reverend James M. Gray, D. D.

A FRIEND in Nebraska writes us a complimentary letter, but adds:

"I would like to see one element of your work changed. I would that the controversy about Fundamentalism and Modernism be abolished. I am for the old-time religion and the new religion, too. I feel that they do not differ materially. Moreover, destructive criticism is not good: constructive suggestions are needed instead."

The writer then instances a "fine young minister from the Moody Institute" who was in her town for two years, "who was often quoting articles and making statements against the modernists. Doubtless most of his people didn't know the difference, and if they did, their daily life work was not concerned in the matter."

What the Commencement Speaker Said.

The writer continues:

"Who are we common people to dare to go against the wisdom of the world as found in our centers of research and learning? Our commencement speaker this year voiced the supreme religious problem of today. He said we need people who effect a compromise between the fundamentalists and the modernists. Let the spirit of love and tolerance rule. It is only the human mind that desires to create controversies. Let each figure out his ideas of the past as best he can from his own study. We can agree on essentials which are plain enough for the wayfarer to see and grasp."

The lady concludes her letter by saying it was written "in love and wonder", and that she would be glad to see it and our answer in print, if we thought best.

We do think best.

It took us some time to reach the decision, but we finally concluded that the correspondent's ideas were typical, and that in trying to help her we might be helping some other people who feel as she does.

We begin at the point where she says: "I am for the old-time religion and the new religion, too. I feel that they do not differ materially."

By the old-time religion we presume she means Fundamentalism and by the new religion, Modernism.

She thinks they do not differ materially. Therefore, we will let her see what Modernism really is according to its leading exponent. She then may be better able to determine whether her judgment is correct, whether it is really true that Modernism does not differ from Fundamentalism.

Modernism Speaks For Itself.

The exponent we speak of is the Christian Century, published in Chicago. In an editorial of January 3, 1924, it says:

> "Christianity according to Fundamentalism is one religion. Christianity according to Modernism is another religion. Which is the true religion is the question that is to be settled in all probability by our generation for future generations.
> "There is a clash here as profound and as grim as between Christianity and Confucianism. Amiable words cannot hide the differences. 'Blest be the tie' may be sung till doomsday but it cannot bind these worlds together.
> "The God of the fundamentalist is one God: the God is of the modernist is another. The Christ of the fundamentalist is one Christ; the Christ of Modernism is another. The Bible of Fundamentalism is one Bible; the Bible of Modernism is another. The Church, the Kingdom, the Salvation, the consummation of all things—these are one thing to fundamentalists and another thing to modernists.
> "Which God is the Christian God, which Christ is the Christian Christ, which Bible is the Christian Bible, which church, which kingdom, which salvation, which consummation are the Christian church, the Christian kingdom, the Christian salvation, the Christian consummation? The future will tell."

In the light of the foregoing does our corerspondent still think that Modernism does not differ materially from Fundamentalism?

Is she still "for the old religion and the new religion, too?"

Is she trying to serve truth and error at the same time?

Which is her God, her Christ, her Bible, her Church?

Is it the God, the Christ, the Bible, the Church of Fundamentalism or Modernism?

Must she not choose between them?

Which shall it be?

And how about that young minister in her town who was making statements against the modernists?

Ought he not to have been making those statements?

Was he not there for the defense of the gospel and is not Modernism a revolt against the gospel?

He may have been over-zealous sometimes, and not as judicious as an older man would be. But it looks as though he were a valiant soldier of the Cross nevertheless, and should we not ask God to bless him whoever he is and wherever he has gone?

What the Holy Spirit Says of the World's Wisdom.

"Who are we," says our correspondent, "who are we to go against the wisdom of the world as found in our centers of research and learning?"

The Holy Ghost answers that question through the Apostle Paul whom He inspired to write to the Church at Corinth thus:

> Hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world?
> For after that in the wisdom of God the world by wisdom knew not God, it pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe. . . .
> For ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called:
> But God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty;
> And base things of the world, and things which are despised, hath God chosen, yea and things which are not, to bring to nought things that are:
> That no flesh should glory in his presence.
> And I, brethren, when I came to you, came not with excellency of speech or of wisdom, declaring unto you the testimony of God.
> For I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified. . . .
> And my speech and my preaching was not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power:
> That your faith should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God.
> Howbeit we speak wisdom among them that are perfect; yet not the wisdom of this world. . . .
> Which none of the princes of this world knew; for had they known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory.—1 Corinthians 1:20-2:8.

Does not the foregoing from Holy Writ furnish a strong reason why the Child of God, the man of faith, should go against the wisdom of the world?

And go against it no matter in what centers of research and learning it is found, when that wisdom itself goes against the teachings of the Bible?

This wisdom of this world "crucified the Lord of glory," and has it ever changed its disposition towards His true followers since?

History says no.

Let our respected correspondent bear the right kind of witness in her own home town in Nebraska, and she will discover just what that disposition is.

The Last People We Need.

She quotes "our commencement speaker this year (who) voiced the supreme religious problem of today."

And what is that problem according to "our commencement speaker?"

It is this, that "we need people who effect a compromise between the fundamentalists and the modernists."

Nothing of the kind, dear friend. They are the very last people we need. The most intelligent modernists know this and proclaim it.

The Christian Century, quoted above said, "There is a clash between those two things, Fundamentalism and Modernism, as profound and grim as between Christianity and Confucianism."

The Christian Century is right.

How can any compromise be effected between those two things?

How can "amiable words" hide their differences?
How can those two worlds be bound together?
Can believers be yoked with unbelievers?
Can righteousness have fellowship with unrighteousness?
Can light have communion with darkness?
Can Christ have concord with Belial?
Can he that believeth have part with the infidel?
What folly!

Wrong Thinking Makes Wrong Living.

Did our correspondent really mean it when she said that most of the audience of that young minister "didn't know" the difference between these things?

How could they be really alive in Christ Jesus and not know the difference?

How could they read their Bibles and not know it?

How could their minds be open to what is going on in the world and in the church and not know it?

There were some of them who knew it we doubt not, and they must have grieved when the young minister departed from them.

If we were to publish the name of our correspondent and the name of her town, she, as well as we, would hear from some of those people before long.

To say that the daily life work of such people was not concerned in this matter is a statement with which they would take issue decidedly.

One's "daily life work" is greatly concerned in this matter, and for the reason that new ethics and a new code of morals accompany the new theology called Modernism.

The ethics of Fundamentalism is based on the Bible whose inspiration and absolute authority Modernism rejects, while the ethics of Modernism is based on human instinct.

Reject the Bible and no absolute standard of right or wrong remains.

Read the newspapers, the magazines, the novels of the day if you would be assured of this.

Consider what the "movies" teach and what our youth are learning in our high schools and colleges.

Hearken to what President Hoover says about the growth of lawlessness.

Look at women's dress, take in the awfulness of companionate marriage, as it is called.

Think of the holdups and the mail robberies and racketeering of these days. Good authority tells us that in fifty years crime has increased forty per cent!

All this is explained by the lowering of the standards of morality and the deadening of the human conscience.

And this in turn has been brought about by the neglect of the Bible with its "Thus saith the Lord."

What then becomes of the theory that there is no difference between Fundamentalism and Modernism, and that one's daily life is not concerned in the matter?

Who Was the First Controversialist?

And to come now to the question of controversy itself.

There is a right kind of controversy and a wrong kind.

To say as this correspondent does, that "it is only the human mind that desires to create controversies," is the greatest possible error.

God Himself was the first to create controversy, to His eternal glory be it said!

When Satan brought sin into the world he thought he had allied the race with himself against God forever. But happily, he was mistaken.

God spoiled his scheme at once by putting "enmity," not friendship, between him and the woman and between his seed and her seed.

Does our correspondent count herself as being of the Seed of the woman?

In other words, does she count herself as belonging to Christ, who Himself is that Seed?

If so, her life must be one long conflict with His enemy and hers. There is no discharge in this warfare.

Let her read again the Old and New Testaments with her eyes open to see the record of controversy spread upon their sacred pages.

Let her consider anew the story of Abel and Cain, Moses and Pharaoh, Joshua and the Canaanites, David and the Philistines, Nehemiah and Sanballar.

Let her consider the Son of man in the days of His public ministry.

Let her read again the sixth, seventh and eighth chapters of the Gospel of John, the Acts of the Apostles, and the warnings and exhortations of the Epistles.

Let her peruse the book of Revelation if she would like a foreview of the controversies that are yet ahead.

How the Church Has Lived and Spread.

It might be well also for our friend, when she has completed her reading of the Bible, to take a kind of post-graduate course in Church history.

She would then appreciate the meaning of the words, "The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church."

Controversy?

It is either controversy with the powers of darkness, or compromise with them, or silence which gives consent that they may have their way.

Which course will our corerspondent adopt?

As for ourselves, we propose to do that which the Holy Spirit through the Apostle Jude has directed us to do, namely:

> "Earnestly contend for the faith which was once for all delivered to the saints.
> "For there are certain men crept in unawares, who were before of old ordained to this condemnation, ungodly men, turning the grace of our God into lasciviousness, and denying the only Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ."

ROBERT EDWARD LEE.
Born January 19, 1807.

I point to the great ROBERT EDWARD LEE as an example of Christian faith and conduct. He was great in counsel, yet he made the Word of God "the man of his counsel." He was a man of uncommon wisdom, yet he continually sought wisdom from the "only wise God," "the Father of Lights." He was a great captain, yet he bowed in humble contrition at the feet of Jesus and owned Him as "captain of his salvation." His name and fame filled the world, yet he "gloried in nought save the Lord Jesus Christ." Few men ever lived a more scrupulously moral and upright life than he, yet (give heed ye who would substitute morality for religion) he did not hesitate to acknowledge himself a sinner before God: he felt that mere morality did not suffice; he owned that Christ's atoning merits constitute his only hope of pardon and eternal life. In harmony with his views on this point was his conduct. Witness the fact that his first project after being called upon to preside over Washington College, was the erection of a chapel where professors and students might daily meet to worship the Almighty. And one of the last public acts of his life was to appeal to the young men of the college to attend daily services in that chapel.

Young men, when you are tempted to listen to the siren song of skepticism, remember Robert Lee. He did not deem it credulity to believe in the inspiration of the Scriptures. He did not deem it weakness to bow to the holy teachings of Jesus Christ and His Apostles. He was not ashamed to confess himself a sinner before God, and to own that all his hopes rested on a crucified Redeemer.

Book Reviews

NEW LIVES FOR OLD: By Amelia S. Reynolds. Cloth. Pp. 96. Published by the Revell Company, New York City. Price, $1.00.

Mrs. Reynolds is a member of the staff at Calvary Church, New York City, which has become a hive of activities in the spiritual realm. We have seen this staid, old-fashioned, conservative parish transformed by the zeal and enthusiasm of the Rev. S. M. Shoemaker, Jr., who will go down into history as "Sam. Shoemaker," thus adopted by his adoring friends. And in the echo of that lovable designation we must not fail to catch the tones of the greatly misunderstood Frank Buchman. For Sam Shoemaker confesses to having been captured by Buchman.

We may be sure that under the constraining influences of the Church and with the rector's well-balanced judgment any objectionable feature of Buchmanism will be eliminated. For all such movements have their exaggerated phases. Mrs. Reynolds relates how Calvary came to enter this spiritual realm, how the marvelous work is accomplished and best of all what has been and is being done to "raise the fallen and to cheer the faint." This is not the first time an Episcopal Church in the Metropolis has been the theatre of such activities. On the corner of Madison Avenue and Forty-second Street, where now stands the great Liggett Building, there was located the Church of the Holy Trinity, presided over by the then popular Stephen H. Tyng, Jr. When venerable old John Vassar put his benediction upon it his words were, "God bless the old soul trap." And such it was. We did not know the new psychology in that day; the sex problem was unfamiliar to us; the intricacies of spiritual mazes were not classified as they are now. But we did see lives transfigured by the grace and power of the Lord Jesus Christ.

And so it seems as though Mrs. Reynolds were relating in her winning way what might have been a chapter out of the glorious record of old Holy Trinity. We cannot too highly commend the book.

TWENTIETH CENTURY LOVE SONGS: Compiled by Caroline Miles Hill. Cloth. Pp. 218. Published by Willett, Clark and Colby, Chicago, Illinois. Price, $2.50

Arranged in six groups: Love Aflame; Love Reveries; Love Victorious; Love Rebellious; Ashes of Love and Mystic Love—we find the realm of that mystic passion well traversed.

The compiler has taken pains to cull from the best sources the joy and the pain, the exaltation and the humiliation, the thrill and the prose, the life and death processes of this unexplainable and yet potent force which moves and moulds the world.

In our coldly mechanistic age, it were well to pay a tribute to the more tender and thoughtful things of our earthly career. Darwin once confessed that he believed his life would have taken another trend, if instead of silencing the musical strains of his nature, he had dedicated time to play his violin. And who knows how much better off the world might have become, had he done so?

A RIBAND ON MY REIN: Poems by Nancy Byrd Turner. Cloth. Pp. 119. Published by Edwin Valentine Mitchell, Hartford, Connecticut. Price, $2.00.

Miss Turner takes us to the land of her birth, where we hear the lullaby of the plantation; then to England rich in poetic suggestiveness; we read her touching tribute to Wordsworth and a similar strain of devotion to John Masefield. Her delineation of Biblical scenes is reverent and thoughtful. Many of us have read her "Twelve Good Men and True" and been touched by its searching appeal.

Altogether, another good book for poetry lovers.

THE BROOKS-BRIGHT PRIZE ESSAYS—1929: With an Introduction by Dr. John H. Finley. Boards. Pp. 143. Published by the Brooks-Bright Foundation, New York City.

Here are six essays on the question of the abolition of war, by an understanding of the psychology of war. Written by students of American schools, they reflect sincere thinking and clear reasoning. The general theme is, "What is the psychological effect on the national mind of great armed forces maintained ostensibly for national defense?"

It is heartening to us that our young people are taking the question so seriously. Surely there will be a strong appeal in these well-stated papers which will mould the opinions of the public at large into a balanced conviction of the waste of the maintenance of standing armies and navies.

Of course, this Brooks-Bright Foundation is a peace movement and the essays run of that trend. Unquestionable is the postulate that the nominally Christian nations might readily disarm, if the multilateral treaty presented by Secretary Kellogg were taken seriously. But keen observers know that such a situation would afford non-Christian nations the very opportunity they cherish.

But assuming the possibility of peace by means of arbitration, these papers are a splendid exposition of the best thought with which the learning and the culture of our young men are qualified. We may be proud of their achievements in this volume.

The name of the publishers should be "The Christian Literature Publishing Company, 246 Fifth Avenue, New York City."

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSE.

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice, eternal treasures, indeed. "Thy word have I hid in my heart, that I might not sin against thee." Ps. 119:11.)

This week the following verse was submitted by

Mr. Sterling Brannen, of Fredericton, N. C. Canada:

> But the Lord said unto Samuel, "Look not on his countenance, or on the height of his stature; because I have refused him: for the Lord seeth not as man seeth; for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart" (1 Samuel 16:7).

Who will send one from the far-away places as well as very near us?

MISSIONARIES UNDER FIRE.

Mr. Editor:

Report was made that a special dispatch dated October 18 was sent to a New York City newspaper from Shanghai, which said: "Japanese and British gunboats furnished a sanctuary for the foreign residents of Wuhu today. The fifteen Americans who reside at Wuhu, all but three of whom are missionaries, sought the safety of the British gunboat, "Crichet," which also took aboard other foreigners."

Letters are arriving from the United States which indicate that this report has been widely circulated through the United States. During a recent visit to the United States, I discovered that there was considerable misunderstanding and a good deal of discussion, pro and con, in regard to the missionaries "leaving their stations and Chinese co-workers in times of danger, especially political and military upheavals" and to the "Gunboat Policy in China in relation to the missionaries."

Since the above report is most inaccurate and unfair, it seems only fair in view of the misunderstanding and discussions of the past few years that a correct statement of the situation in Wuhu, Anhui Province, China, on October 18, 1929, should be given.

The report should have read, "The thirty-eight adult Americans and the seventeen American children of whom all but ten adults and six children are missionaries." On October 18, twelve adults were away attending conferences, etc., and four children were away at school, so that there were thirty-nine Americans in the Community.

Further, no member of the missionary community sought safety on any gunboat, nor did they make any attempt to do so. The battle or mutiny started at three A. M., about nine A. M., after a bomb had landed at the back door of the residence, a lady in the Disciples' Mission, with her two small sons, went to the residence of the missionaries who were not in the direct line of fire as this residence was—the actual fighting was going on less than a quarter of a mile away. About noon, a retreat would have placed the residences of three other missionaries in between two roads by which the soldiers would have retreated—in fact, since the compound had only a wire fence the soldiers might have retreated through the compound. Hence it was deemed wise to have the three ladies and three small children in these residences remove to the residence of another member of the same Mission, which was a short distance away and surrounded by a wall and out of the direct range of fire. All Chinese women and children were removed at the same time.

But in both cases, an American male missionary remained on the property, as did all Chinese servants. In all other cases the missionaries (men, women and children) remained in their own houses and helped to maintain the morale of the Chinese co-workers and their families.

The splendid saneness and calmness of the American missionary women and children and of the British misisonary woman, in the community deserves the highest praise and they did much to calm the fears of the Chinese women and children.

In the face of these facts it hardly seems fair to imply that at the first sign of trouble, the missionaries deserted their residences and co-workers and sought a gunboat. The missionaries do not needlessly risk their lives, but on the other hand they do not run at the least sign of trouble.

I trust that you will make this letter public, so that the situation may be correctly understood.

FOR NEGRO EDUCATION.

Mr. Editor:

May I ask space to call to the attention of men and women and their lawyers, who are drawing wills, to an oversight which I cannot but believe is in very many cases due to a lack of knowledge of actual conditions respecting most worthy and, even more so, most needy subjects for wise consideration in the matter of bequests.

I have noticed for a long time now, in reading the reports of wills probated and the distribution of estates, that very few of the decedents leave anything for Negro education and, alas, the few who do, leave so small sums that it seems evident to me that there has been no realization, on the part of those making the will, of the vital importance to the United States as a whole of the education of the ten per cent of our population sharply assigned by custom and law to the Negro race.

We may recall Booker Washington's notable saying that the "Negroes were the only people who came to the United States with a most urgent invitation that they were not free to decline." Following this, their condition of slavery of both body and mind practically and their being set free in the midst of a devastated land wherein the dominant white race was but slightly better off materially than they. Apart from the ownership of the land and even as to that usually "land poor" and certainly equally poverty-stricken by the deadly incubus, which the ownership of slaves puts upon mind, conscience and heart.

It is the fact that today the vast majority of the white population in our Southern States is poor in worldly goods and, therefore, poor in educational opportunities.

As thirty per cent in round figures of the population resides in these Southern States and of that thirty per cent nearly one-third are of the Negro race, the relation of this Negro citizenship to the future of the country is one of immeasurable importance, because they, in effect, dominate through a white primary all the political activities of these sections and largely eliminate all fundamental political issues from consideration by the voters. Only in the instance of sumptuary legislation is there manifest a definite consideration of issues from election to elections.

I think readers of this will realize that money wisely left for aid to the education of Negroes serves not only the beneficent impulses, but also greatly serves the future welfare of our country. There are, of course, many efforts for educational assistance that are not wise because of the uncertainties of continuance. Therefore, aid that reaches unto the strengthening of the noble and ever more widely spreading efforts of the materially poor Southern people in the education of the Negro is of largest benefit and eliminates the risk of waste most surely.

The Rosenwald Fund, Jeanes Fund, Slater Fund, Phelps-Stokes Fund, American Church Institute for Negroes, the many Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian Colleges and other Church schools that cooperate with the state and local educational officials afford a wide selection for the lover of his country and humanity to provide for this, I believe, most needy and most important subject of beneficence—the education of the Negro ten per cent of the population of the United States.

I assume to ask for the publication of this letter because for sixty years I have had the privilege of active relationship with many education boards, and therefore, have personal knowledge which, I believe, justifies my urging the consideration of this subject by all of those who are making wills and very particularly those who are privileged to draw the wills for their clients.

GREEK HORSE OF THE COUNTER-REFORMATION.

Mr. Editor:

A hearty Amen to the clarion call of Mr. C. B. Lucas (your issue of December 28) to Protestant Episcopalians to do as well as talk—to quit their constant defensive (largely passive)—to "carry the war into Africa."

And to this categorical list of concrete proposals let us add: First and foremost, restore the Honest Table of the Reformers, by abolishing the "altar"—the visible, tangible crux of the whole crisis—the Greek Horse of the "Anglo-Catholic" invaders.

Recently a Papist said, when discussing the Episcopalian Cathedral at Washington, D. C.: "We" (Roman Catholics) "will have that building for our own, after awhile: why an altar, if no mass?"

In the earlier part of his letter, Mr. Lucas seems rather too severe on the Protestants, in the matter of non-Prayer-Book terminology: the Reformers (Restorers of primitive Christianity and Apostolic simplicity) did not inveigh against "evensong" (no special favorite of mine) as against "masses." But, again Amen to his appeal for Protestant aggressiveness and action: let us rally on Judge Marsilliot, like Bee's Carolinians on Stonewall Jackson at First Manassas.

Some forty-five years ago an obscure presbyter drafted a strong Protestant resolution to present to his diocesan council or convention, first submitting it privately to the bishop. The bishop was regarded as one of the most staunch and outspoken Protestants of his time; yet he objected that such a resolution would "stir up feeling." For the third time, Amen, Mr. Lucas: we need more militant crusaders like that presbyter; fewer hold-backs like that bishop. If we Protestant Episcopalians mean business, why longer cry Peace, peace, when there is no peace?

CHURCH OF ENGLAND NEWS.

(S. C. London Correspondent.)

Another Crisis Approaching.

The Bishop of London in a New Year's Letter to the Diocese, says: "With the cessation of the Prayer Book controversy a peaceful spirit has descended upon the Church." The wish is probably father to the thought. It is true that for the moment there is a cessation of the acuteness of the controversy, which is in part due to sheer weariness and in part to a feeling of helplessness which seemed to come over the community when the Bishops adopted their defiant policy of administering the rejected 1928 Revised Prayer Book. Their claim was that they had the authority of Convocation. But if that is admitted, some way must be found to justify their refusal to administer the whole of it, and in certain particulars to deviate from it. However that may be, they have set themselves to administer the discipline of the Church of England within the limits of that Book except for certain reservations. In other words they allow such deviations from the Book of Common Prayer as come within the scope of the 1928 Book with certain exceptions. And it may be quite frankly admitted that some of the Bishops at any rate, honestly and earnestly are seeking to reduce the disorder in the type and ritual of the Services to that extent. The Archbishop of York and the Bishop of Leicester in particular have shewn real fixedness of purpose in the matter, and in so doing have provoked the wrath of those who sympathize with law-breakers. The Bishop of Leicester has received a protest from the Leicester Association of Catholic Laymen informing him that they view with "regret, concern and apprehension the method" with which he is administering the diocese, and particularizing what they describe as his "interference" with the duties of parish priests to reserve the Blessed Sacrament" and "the infliction of unfair and hampering conditions on the clergy" which discourages "the paying of due honor to our Lord Jesus Christ in His Most Holy Sacrament of the Altar." Their protest is backed by a threat to withhold financial support from diocesan work. The Archbishop of York called on an Incumbent in his diocese to discontinue "Adoration" of the Most Holy Sacrament, and was met with a refusal. He has thereupon placed an episcopal ban upon the parish, and decided that he will not himself officially visit the church nor sanction such a visit on the part of the Suffragan Bishops or Archdeacons. But he considerably weakens his position by going on to say that he is not prepared "at present, anyhow, to take any step which may hinder good work, ninety-nine per cent of which one heartily approves." Where Adoration is carried on, it is safe to say that more than one per cent of the teaching is in accord, and therefore disloyal to the doctrine of the Church of England. Now another indication of the state of affairs in England is given by the announcement that a writ has been issued to be served on the Bishop of Birmingham (Dr. Barnes) at the instigation of the trustees of a parish in his diocese. The Bishop demanded of their nominee for the Living that he should give assurance that certain practices regarding Reservation which had prevailed in opposition to the Bishop's orders during the previous incumbency should cease.

This assurance was refused, and the Bishop refused to institute. The trustees (who include the Bishop of Truro, Dr. Frere), have accordingly issued a writ to force the Bishop's hands. Dr. Barnes has made known his decision not to appear in the proceedings, maintaining that the issue is not really a legal one at all, but a moral and spiritual one. This, however, will prevent the trustees going to the court, but whether they will do so or think it wiser to withdraw remains to be seen.

All this and much else would cause some wonder at the statement of the Bishop of London quoted above, but those who know him are aware that he woefully deceives himself or is thoroughly deceived as to the measure of the unity which prevails. This is characteristic of the man, but things are not quite as they seem to appear to him. Mr. Kensit has published a letter he has addressed to the Bishop in which he calls attention to the services held in a certain church in the London diocese, which were announced as "The Immaculate Conception B. V. M., 11; Sung Mass, 6:30. Solemn Vespers of Feast," and adds that there was also the service of Benediction sung in Latin. The Bishop seems quite powerless to do anything in such cases. This is not surprising, considering the policy he has adopted for so long in his administration of the diocese. He seems to think all is well. No one else thinks it. The truth is that far from controversy having ceased, and a peaceful spirit having descended upon the Church, there is every indication of the approach of another crisis. Protestants need not fear it if they will face it in the spirit of prayer and humble confidence in Almighty God, which they shewed in the Prayer Book Controversy, for they are now in a stronger position and there has been a distinct set-back to Anglo-Catholicism since the defeat of the Prayer Book Measure.

The Archbishop's New Year Sermon:

On the last Sunday evening of the old year, the Archbishop of Canterbury preached a New Year Sermon, which was broadcast by the B. B. C. He chose as the title of his sermon, "1930—Each for All." He addressed himself to the question, Are the British folk to be still, nay, become more truly than before a Christian nation? His answer was, Yes; if, but only if, each individual Christian among them accepts his own responsibility and puts his own loyalty, his own witness, his own conviction at the service of the cause. "Remember, our Christian faith is not merely a possession, however prized, not only a profession, however honestly made. It is a vocation. It is a call for personal attachment to a cause. Only in proportion as each Christian answers that call can Christianity become a power in our national life." He, therefore, issued a threefold call: to increase of knowledge. There are many professing Christians who spend less time a year reading and studying the Bible than they spend each week or each day over the newspaper. Difficulties arise and they cannot give a reason for the hope that is in them or justify to others in perplexity the faith they hold. Then he called for a more faithful witness to our Lord and the Gospel before the world. In reference to this he made mention of the habit of some who needlessly stay at home to listen in to a broadcast service and so omit the duty of public worship, which also helps others and is a public witness that we are on the side of Christ, and of His Gospel, and of His kingdom. Finally, he called for more loyalty to the Lord Jesus Christ as Lord and Leader.

Those who have had to oppose the Archbishop in certain matters of controversy, as for instance in regard to the Revised Prayer Book and the present policy of the majority Bishops, may be able to read into his words certain things which would require criticism. The sermon was for a public holding many points of view in things ecclesiastical and otherwise. It was diplomatically expressed, and, generally speaking, free from all offense to any. And it was helpful, and worthy. At the same time one cannot but wish that it contained something more directly fundamental in regard to the Christian Faith. The appeal, for instance, to loyalty to Jesus Christ as Lord and Leader, might well have included some reference to His atoning work through which alone all the rest is possible. It is, however, characteristic of so much of the teaching of the present day that acceptance of the Lord Jesus Christ as Saviour is taken for granted, and it is assumed that all are "the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus," whereas this is by no means always the case, and often is the message for which people are waiting, and which is the best motive to secure the rest.

With regard to the first call of the Archbishop given above, the call to increase of knowledge, it will be recalled that during the summer the two Archbishops issued a Pastoral Letter in which they called both the clergy and the laity to a more diligent study of the faith with a view to strengthening their own hold and the better unfolding of the truth of the Gospel. This has been followed by diocesan action in most places, and to the issue of syllabuses of study. So far it cannot be said that these syllabuses have seemed to meet the need, but it is perhaps rather too early yet to say. Certainly they require study to make them profitable, and that is an essential if they are to accomplish their purpose, but they do not instinctively invite study which, under the circumstances, is also an essential. If there is already sufficient desire to study, it may be all right, but the fear is that the desire needs much fostering. The simple truth is that Bible reading is not the practice it once was. There are obvious reasons for this, the frequent appeals to and assertion of so-called Catholic teaching (that mysterious and nebulous thing which cannot be grasped, and adjusts itself to individual tastes), Modernism (which again is so difficult to define, and ever changes) and that spiritual decline which (whether the effect of the other two or not) we all deplore. Nevertheless the effort to encourage more study of the Written Word is all to the good, and is a sign of the times for which we may well give thanks "To the law and to the testimony: if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them." Most if not all recognized revivals have come with a return to the Bible. It may be in the Providence of God that we are indeed approaching an era of renewal and revival. We need it badly enough.

The College of Preachers Lengthens Its Cords.

During the past year the College of Preachers in connection with the Washington Cathedral, instituted a series of week-end conferences for laymen during Advent and Lent, these being periods at which the clergy conferences could not be held. These conferences for laymen have thus far proved extraordinarily successful in inducing the laymen who come to them to do some careful thinking with regard to the privileges, responsibilities and opportunities involved in Church membership.

During the past sesason these conferences were limited to Washington, but the College of Preachers is now working on the plan of sending the leader of the conferences, Mr. Wm. C. Sturgiss, to various localities outside of Washington, for the purpose of holding similar conferences for laymen in those localities. Such a conference was held at St. Mark's Church, Shreveport, Lousiana, from January 6 through January 17. Picked groups of men and of women met at various hours during each day to consider face to face the values of the Christian life and the true and natural avenues of its expression. The results justify this new departure on the part of the College of Preachers in Washington, and it is to be hoped that this work will prove a vital asset in the Church's life in the years that are ahead.

B. S. A. Junior Leaders' Conference.

The adolescent boy's psychology, the development of his personality, the responsibility of the Church toward growing boys, were discussed by leaders and authorities in boys' work, at a conference of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, especially for leaders in boys' work, meeting at Church Missions House, New York, on January 9 and 10. The methods and resources of the Brotherhood, especially the Junior Brotherhood, filled the latter half of the session.

Prof. Erdman Harris, psychologist on the staff of Union Theological Seminary, Henry Wade Hough, of the Scientific American; Captain Richard H. Ranger, engineer and inventor, now of the Radio Corporation of America; A. J. Gregg, of the National Y. M. C. A., were among speakers, together with Bishop Thomson, a number of clergy, lay workers in religious education, officers of the Brotherhood, diocesan and national, with the national president, H. Lawrence Choate, of Washington, D. C.

Next month in Indianapolis a similar conference is to be held, and a third some time in March, in Los Angeles.

Report of Findings Committee of the Conference on Work With Boys, New York, January 9-10, 1930, Adopted Unanimously by the Conference.

The Committee on Findings submits the following report:

As a result of the deliberations of this conference we have been deeply impressed with the vital importance of youth work and in particular of boys' work in the Church. We are convinced that the importance of such work has not been sufficiently recognized in the Church at large, and we are of the opinion that only through adequate provision for this work can we hope to meet pressing needs of the Church today and develop a leadership commensurate with the opportunities confronting us.

With the fullest recognition of the contributions made by all other organizations and agencies, we are of the opinion that in our work with boys we need an organization which is definitely religious, centered in the Church, specialized for boys, simple in program, and capable of adaptation to varying conditions; and for this reason we commend the Junior Brotherhood of St. Andrew to the careful consideration of our clergy and other parish leaders.

In particular we recommend:

1. That leaders of boys make a special study of the problems of adolescence, both in general and with reference to individual boys.

2. That the development of Christian personality be recognized as the goal of our work with boys and that in this task the pre-eminent importance of competent leadership be continually remembered.

3. That full use be made of the opportunities of character development and leadership training that are afforded by the right kind of camp conferences; that there should be a graded and progressive curriculum for boys of different ages and different degrees of camp experience; and that where suitable Church camps are not available we take advantage of the opportunities afforded by other camps, such as those of the American Youth Foundation, the international Council of Religious Education, and others. We also recommend the holdings of local or regional conferences of leaders in boys' work.

4. That we emphasize the basic Brotherhood principles of prayer and service, and that special attention be given to training Chapter members in real prayer.

5. That larger use be made of the Junior Program units in Brotherhood Chapter meetings.

6. That we urge attendance upon the National Junior Brotherhood Convention to be held at Oberlin College, August 26-29, 1930.

7. That we express to the officials of the National Council of the Church our appreciation for the courtesies extended during our sessions at the Church Missions House.

Archdeacon Couper Dies Suddenly.

The Venerable Everett W. Couper, Archdeacon of Minnesota, died very suddenly at his home in Minneapolis on the morning of January 6, 1930. The funeral services were held at St. Luke's Church, Minneapolis, on January 8, at which the Bishop of Minnesota, the Bishop of Wyoming, and the Rev. F. D. Tyner, rector of St. Luke's Church, officiated. A large number of the clergy of the diocese were present.

Archdeacon Couper was born at Blue Earth, Minnesota, on October 6, 1875. He graduated from the University of Minnesota in 1899, and from Seabury Divinity School in 1902. He was ordained both deacon and priest by Bishop Edsall. He was rector, successively, of parishes at Northfield, Minnesota, Springfield, Missouri, Spokane, Washington, and Alameda, California. In 1918 he became Dean of Trinity Cathedral, Duluth, which position he resigned four years later to take up the task of organizing the rural work of that diocese. He was chosen Archdeacon of Minnesota in 1923, and continued to be so up to the time of his death. He was president for two years of the National Organization of Rural Clergy, and both in that position and in his work as Archdeacon he made a truly notable contribution to the Church's rural work.

Dr. Mansfield Observes Thirty-fourth Year at Seamen's Church Institute.

The Seamen's Church Institute of New York is part of the history of New York, because it has played a definite part in its waterfront life. Reviewing his experiences since he took up the leadership of this wonderful shore home for merchant seamen, Dr. Archibald R. Mansfield, D. D., who celebrated his fifty-ninth birthday on January 3, said that he had witnessed a "complete transformation of the New York waterfront life from the days of the lower East Side 'Sailor Town' to the present. He agreed with the Bishop of London who, when preaching in Trinity Church, New York City, described the New York waterfront of years ago as the "worst in the whole world."

In those early days boarding houses and dives of every description thrived. Seamen were slaves and victims of combinations and conditions over which they had no control. Today, as Dr. Mansfield enters his thirty-fifth year as Superintendent of the Institute, he sees the exploiting of seamen almost at an end. Under his competent direction the work has progressed, from the old Pike Street Mission, thirty-four years ago to the present thirteen-story building, with its new annex almost half a city block in area. Clean living quarters, recreation and reading rooms, a beautiful chapel—successor to the old Floating Church, which plied the New York harbor in its efforts to protect seamen from the "crimps", an employment bureau, marine school, service of every character through the religious and social service department, all under one roof—what a contrast this is to that far-away past!

More than 150 telegrams of congratulations, including many from seamen in every part of the world, one from Bishop William T. Manning of the New York Diocese, one from Sir Harry Armstrong, the British Consul General in the United States, give evidence that people appreciate the splendid endeavors of Dr. Mansfield.

About $1,500,000 still remains to be raised for the Institute's new annex, and it would be a fitting tribute to Dr. Mansfield if the friends of this Institute would join together and crown his long years of effort with success—by liquidating this building debt.

As Dr. Mansfield said in a recent address: "When the sea is called to give up its millions of dead sailors who have lost their lives in the line of duty, and when we, as landsmen, consider that we have done to save them, will it be enough to ask, "Am I my brother's keeper?" or shall we not rather say, "We have done what we could for the sailor, that step-son, that unloved child of our civilization—homeless, friendless, without a vote, without the companionship and associations which landsmen enjoy?"

The Chapel of Our Saviour is the last corner of the Institute's new building still to be completed. In it seamen who have sailed the seven seas come humbly and reverently, and worshipfully. No aspect of a seamen's shore existence is so significant as this beautiful little chapel, waiting for Christian people to complete it, to adorn its walls and to make it a fitting place for sea-faring wanderers to worship. Twenty thousand dollars is still needed to finish this chapel. What will your parish give?

Bishop Maxon Elected Rector of Parish.

The Rt. Rev. James M. Maxon, D. D., Bishop-Coadjutor of the Diocese of Tennessee, on December 29, was elected rector of Christ Church, Chattanooga. He will nevertheless continue his duties as bishop, which will take him out of the city frequently. Therefore, two associate rectors will assist him in the work of the parish.

The Rev. Charles E. Wood, of Monteagle, will conduct the regular services at Christ Church until the arrival of the other minister.

The Rev. William C. Robertson, who has served the parish as rector for the past three months, has left to join his family in Cambridge, Massachusetts.

Dr. Davis to be Consecrated.

The Presiding Bishop has taken Order for the Ordination and Consecration of the Reverend Cameron J. Davis, D. D., as Bishop-Coadjutor-elect of the Diocese of Western New York, on Thursday, January 23, in Trinity Church, Buffalo, New York.

The Rt. Rev. Charles Palmerston Anderson, D. D., Bishop of Chicago and Presiding Bishop, will be the consecrator, assisted by the Rt. Rev. David Lincoln Ferris, D. D., Bishop of Western New York, and the Rt. Rev. Ernest Milmore Stires, D. D., Bishop of Long Island.

Dr. Davis will be presented by Bishop Ward of Erie and Bishop Mann of Pittsburgh.

The Rt. Rev. Charles Fiske, D. D., Bishop of Central New York, will preach the sermon.

Attending presbyters will include the Rev. Walter R. Lord, Buffalo, New York, and the Rev. Murray Bartlett, D. D., Hobart College, Geneva, New York.

The Rev. Henry S. Sizer, Jr., of Buffalo, will be master of ceremonies, and the Rev. Charles L. Pardee, D. D., of New York City, registrar.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. H. St. George Tucker, Bishop.

Bible Conference.

A Bible Conference, under the auspices of the Bible Conference Association of Richmond, Virginia, will be held in All Saints' Church, 316 West Franklin Street, Richmond, February 2-9.

Canon F. E. Howitt, of Hamilton, Canada, and Dr. Howard Kelly, of Baltimore, Maryland, will be the speakers. Canon Howitt is an internationally known Bible teacher and a speaker at the world-famed Keswick Convention in England. Dr. Kelly is one of the world's foremost scientists, and is also well known as a writer on Biblical themes.

The first meeting on Sunday, February 2, will be at 3:30 P. M.

On each of the week days following there will be two meetings at 4:00 P. M. and at 8:00 P. M.

Dr. Kelly will deliver the addresses at the two meetings on Tuesday, February 4.

Preaching Mission.

The Rt. Rev. Robert E. L. Strider, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of West Virginia, is conducting a preaching mission this week in Grace and Holy Trinity Church, Richmond, at the invitation of the rector, the Rev. Charles W. Sheerin. Bishop Strider spoke at the eleven o'clock service on Sunday, January 12, and again at the evening service. Services are being held each evening during the week.

Archdeacon Russell Speaks in Richmond.

The Rev. James Solomon Russell, D. D., LL. D., D. C. L., Archdeacon for Colored Work in Southern Virginia, and founder and President-Emeritus of St. Paul's Normal and Industrial School at Lawrenceville, Virginia, addressed the monthly meeting of the Missionary Society of St. Christopher's School, Richmond, on Sunday evening, January 12. He gave a little of the history of the school, and of the Church's work for Negroes.

The school began as a parochial school forty-eight years ago. Six years later it became the St. Paul's Normal and Industrial School.

In 1893, when Southern Virginia became a diocese, separate from the Diocese of Virginia, Dr. Russell was appointed Archdeacon for Colored Work in the new diocese. In 1879 there was one church for Negroes in the undivided Diocese of Virginia. This was St. Stephen's in Petersburg. Now, in the Diocese of Southern Virginia alone, there are thirty churches and mission stations, two of which are self-supporting parishes. At the last count there were 2,300 Colored communicants of the Episcopal Church in Southern Virginia.

The school was planned to supply teachers for rural districts and also to give the students an industrial education, which would fit them to lead respectable, self-supporting lives.

All the work on the place is done by the students themselves. Every building was erected by the students under the direction of their instructors.

In the normal department the course follows the state requirements and the graduates receive the professional certificates.

The school is so highly esteemed that it receives support both from churches and public schools.

No student of St. Paul's has ever been arrested in Brunswick County, in which is the school. Also the authorities have never heard of any student having been arrested anywhere.

The aim of St. Paul's School is to help the Negro boy and girl to find their way in life, and to lead honorable lives. Archdeacon Russell said that when this is accomplished there will be no Negro problem.

Messiah Presents Nativity Pageant for Fifth Time.

On the Sunday following Christmas, at the evening service, the Church of the Messiah presented its annual Nativity Pageant in the chancel of the church. The event is becoming quite a tradition in the northeast section of Baltimore, this being the fifth presentation of the pageant, with practically the same cast. This year the church was crowded with worshippers, many of them being from other denominations. The church lends itself architecturally very strikingly to a Mediaeval Mystery Play of this sort, for it is an example of pure Gothic. This year the effect was further enhanced by lighting the nave only by candle-light, the candles being in special sconces around the pillars which support the main arches of the church. The pageant closes with a procession in which the "Lights of the World," the Twelve Apostles, the Wise Men and Shepherds, and the choir march through the darkened nave with lights, singing the great Epiphany hymn: "From the Eastern Mountains," with the chorus:

"Light of light that shineth
Ere the worlds began,
Draw thou near, and lighten
Every heart of man."

Eucharistic Lights Dedicated to the Late Howard MacCarthy.

On the occasion of the Ordination of Mr. Lewis O. Heck, the Bishop of Maryland also dedicated Eucharistic lights on the altar of the Church of the Messiah as a memorial to Howard MacCarthy, for many years a devoted layman of that church. The bishop and rector took the opportunity to pay tribute to the memory of Mr. MacCarthy, pointing out the appropriateness of the memorial in view of his long service as Vestryman, Treasurer and Church School Superintendent.

Confirmation Service at St. Matthias.

The last Sunday in December, being the conclusion of the first year of St. Matthias' Chapel under its new mother church, the Church of the Messiah, was marked by the presence of the Bishop of the Diocese to administer the rite of confirmation. A class of fourteen adults was presented, ten from the chapel, and a supplementary class of four from Messiah. The congregation filled the little building to the doors. At this service the Bishop dedicated Memorial Prayer Books and Hymnals, a gift to the chapel from Mr. Alexander MacKloam, a Vestryman of Messiah, in memory of his father and mother.

Memorial Service to Bishop Sessums.

A special memorial service for the late Bishop Sessums has been arranged to be held at Christ Church Cathedral, on Sunday night, January 26, 1930, at which the preacher will be the Rt. Rev. Thos. F. Gailor, Bishop of Tennessee. All parishes will cooperate and the rectors and choirs will participate in the service.

Diocesan Council Postponed.

The annual Diocesan Council was scheduled to convene at Baton Rouge on January 12, 1930, but the death of the Bishop has necessitated changes in the program and the meeting has been postponed to convene at Baton Rouge on March 12, 1930, at which time an election of a successor to the late Rt. Rev. Davis Sessums, D. D., will take place.

Ecclesiastical Authority.

It may not be generally known that upon the death of a Bishop the Standing Committee becomes the Ecclesiastical Authority and performs all the duties devolving upon a Bishop with the exception of administering the rite of confirmation. In Louisiana this authority will be vested (until the consecration of our next Bishop) in our Standing Committee composed of the Rev. Dr. Coupland, President; the Rev. Dr. Brewster, the Rev. Mr. Vail, Mr. Mead, Mr. Machado and Mr. Kearny, Secretary.

Generous Gift.

The Rev. and Mrs. I. M. Ingham recently sent a gift of $500 to help pay for the new St. John's Church, Camden, built in 1926. Mr. Ingham was rector of St. John's for about twelve years. Mr. Ingham and his wife had arranged for this before his death which occurred recently.

There is in Camden the "Ingham Library", which was founded by Mr. Ingham during his rectorship at St. John's. They also sent a gift of $500 for use of the Library.

The Annual Convention of this diocese will convene in Trinity Church, Van Buren, on Wednesday morning, January 15. Bishop Winchester's address will be read by the Secretary of the Convention. Bishop Saphore will preach the sermon, and he will be the celebrant of the Holy Communion. After that the day will be given over to business.

In the evening there will be a missionary service, at which talks will be made by the Rev. S. H. Rainey, of Fayetteville, and Mr. Thomas E. Wood, the Secretary of the Executive Council.

Thursday there will be business in morning and afternoon. There will be a reception in the late afternoon. In the evening there will be the closing service conducted by the Rev. Charles F. Collins, of Hot Springs, and the sermon will be preached by the Rev. Randolph R. Claiborne, of Camden.

Token of Affection.

The congregation of Trinity Church, Pine Bluff, presented their rector, the Rev. Hanson A. Stowell, with a Nash sedan as a token of their affection at Christmas. All financial obligations have been met by the people of Trinity. In seventeen years of ministry there, the rector has not missed a service for any cause, except when on vacation.

Preaching Services.

The Rev. Charles T. Warner has announced a special series of preaching services for St. Alban's Church on Wednesday evenings, at 8 P. M., beginning January 15, to be held under the joint auspices of St. Alban's Church and the College of Preachers of Washington Cathedral. The preachers at these services will be those who are to lead conferences for the College of Preachers during the remainder of January and February and will be provided by Bishop Rhinelander, Warden of the College of Preachers. The first of the series was on "How to Know Church History," by the Very Rev. Henry B. Washburn, dean of the Episcopal Theological School at Cambridge, Massachusetts. The preachers and subjects for the other evenings of the series are as follows: January 22, "How to Read the Bible," by the Rev. G. M. Williams, S. S. J. E., St. Paul's Church, Brooklyn, N. Y.; January 29, "How to Meet Temptation," by the Rev. John R. Oliver, Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, Md.; February 5, "How to Bring Religion to the Home," by the Rt. Rev. John Dallas Bishop of New Hampshire; February 12, "How to Pray," by the Rt. Rev. P. M. Rhinelander, warden of the College of Preachers; February 19, "How to Make Use of Lent," by the Rt. Rev. A. C. A. Hall, Bishop of Vermont; February 26, "How to Use the Sacraments," by Dr. F. S. Fleming, St. Stephen's Church, Providence, R. I.

Vestibule Gates Dedicated.

The handsome vestibule gates which have been erected at the Church of the Epiphany in memory of Mrs. Randolph H. McKim, were recently set apart by the rector of the parish with appropriate services, in the presence of the donors, Mrs. McKim's children and grandchildren, and a few close friends. The service of the consecration of a church was adapted for use and Psalm 24, most appropriate to the gates, was read by Dr. Phillips.

C. P. C.

The annual meeting of the Church Periodical Club of the Diocese of Washington was to be held on Thursday, January 16, at the Diocesan House, 1329 K Street. After the business meeting, informal tea was served from four to six o'clock, to which all members of the Woman's Auxiliary and the Church Periodical Club were invited.

Sunday-School Institute.

The January meeting of the Sunday-School Institute of the Diocese of Washington will be a joint meeting with the Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese, and will be held January 21 at 8 P. M., in Epiphany Church. The principle speaker of the evening will be the Rev. H. S. Donovan, missionary from Liberia. The coaching class under the auspices of the Sunday-School Institute for those using the Christian Nurture Series, will be held in Epiphany Parish Hall on January 19, beginning at 6 P. M., with a light supper. Class instruction will follow and be ended in time for teachers to return to their own churches for evening service.

Golden Wedding.

The Rev. Prof. and Mrs. George C. Foley, West Philadelphia, celebrated their fiftieth wedding anniversary, January 8.

Dr. Foley is affectionately known as "Pop" at the Philadelphia Divinity School, where he is professor of theology.

He and Mrs. Foley received scores of friends during the day and in the evening.

Dr. Foley will be seventy-nine in June. He was born in Philadelphia, and is a graduate of the Seminary, where he now teaches. He was graduated in 1875. His first charge was as assistant rector of St. Matthew's Church, Francesville, Philadelphia.

Bishop's Bricks Fund.

Hundreds of children, representing the Sunday schools of the diocese on Saturday afternoon, January 11, participated in the annual presentation and devotional service of the Bishop's Bricks Fund, at which the children presented to Bishop Taitt their annual offering for some definite piece of missionary work. The offering of the children this year is to equip a primary room in the new parish house that is in course of erection for St. Ambrose Mission, Philadelphia. The children's Bishop's Bricks Fund offering in 1920 helped to build Zion Church, Philadelphia, where Saturday's service was held.

Episcopalians Prominent in Founding America.

According to the secular press, the Rev. Ernest L. Harvey, rector of St. John's Church, Elmira Heights, preached some good Southern history in a recent address before the Trinity Men's Club.

The importance of the settlements made in Jamestown and Williamsburg, Virginia, in pioneer days, was stressed.

The Rev. Mr. Harvey expressed the opinion that the proper significance is not given these two settlements in the history of the founding of America. He was discussing the role played by Episcopalians in settling America and establishing American independence.

The speaker said the beginning of the first permanent parish of the Episcopal Church in this country was at Jamestown in 1607. Popular contention that Virginia settlers were mere adventurers with gold and fame as their goal was denied by the minister.

"It has been claimed that this expedition was a purely commercial and gold-seeking affair," the Rev. Mr. Harvey said. "It might be well to call attention to the fact that its charter as granted by King James not only expressively stipulated that 'the true word and service of God be preached, planted and used according to the rites and doctrines of the Church of England', but that 'all persons should kindly treat the savage and heathen people in these parts and use all proper means to draw them to the true service and knowledge of God.'

"Strange as it may seem," the speaker said, "one of the first laws of these settlers was a liquor law." The minister said fines were meted out on persons found guilty of public intoxication. However, the settlers also had a law which punished liquor distillers who made bad whiskey.

The Rev. Mr. Harvey said that while every one is familiar with the Mayflower, ship of the Pilgrims which sailed to the coast of New England after the Virginia expedition, scarcely any one knows the three ships of the Southern settlers, the "Susan Constant," "Godspeed" and "Discovery."

True religious freedom was first practiced in Virginia, the speaker said. Persecutions which blotted the otherwise honorable history of New England, where persons were burned at the stake for alleged belief in witchcraft, never saw light in Virginia.

The speaker said the first representative body of lawmakers to meet in America, the House of Burgesses, assembled there in July, 1619, and the first laws passed in this country by a legislative body were enacted for the government of both Church and State. The meetings in each case were held in the church, the first building erected by the settlers.

The Rev. Mr. Harvey told of the history of Williamsburg, Va., and also how John D. Rockefeller, Jr., is now engaged in rebuilding a section of the town in order to have it as it appeared in Revolutionary days.

Memorials.

A new altar, erected to the memory of the late Rev. Thomas L. Hines, first rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, East Chicago, Indiana, was blessed by the Bishop of the Diocese on Sunday, December 22, at the time of his annual visitation to East Orange. The altar is of beautiful light oak, matching the rest of the sanctuary furnishings and its beauty is enhanced by the richness of a red velvet dossal, a gift of the Woman's Guild.

The Bishop also blessed the new choir stalls placed in the church as a memorial to the late Mrs. Jennie Meade, who was for years one of the strongest workers in the parish and diocese, her last service to the diocese being the completion and over-subscription of the Corporate Gift, of which she was chairman. The new choir stalls are given by her son, Mr. William Meade, in conjunction with the Vestry, and are a fitting memorial to her. The work on the altar and choir stalls was done by the Wisconsin Lumber and Mill Company.

Bishop Abbott Conducts Preaching Mission.

The Rt. Rev. Almon Abbott, D. D., Bishop of Lexington, conducted a preaching mission in Christ Church, Lexington, January 5-12, inclusive. The program included three services on each of the two Sundays and two services daily during the rest of the week, except on Saturday, which was a "rest day."

There was an Intercession Box inside the front doors of the church, and intercessions were offered at every service.

There was also a Question Box inside the front doors. The questions were answered on Thursday evening at the mission service.

A Beautiful Memorial.

"Christ Blessing the Children" is the subject of the very beautiful memorial window that has been placed in Otey Memorial Church, Sewanee, Tennessee, to Miss Alice V. Claiborne by her parents, the Venerable William S. Claiborne and Mrs. Claiborne.

The window is near the font in which Miss Claiborne was baptized when an infant by her father, who was then rector of Otey Memorial.

The inscription over the window reads, "Suffer the little children to come unto me," and below are the words, "To the glory of God and the blessed memory of Alice V. Claiborne." The window is the artistic work of William Glazeby, of London, England.

The memorial was blessed on Sunday, September 22, by the Rt. Rev. Thomas F. Gailor, Bishop of the Diocese of Tennessee.

Bishop Gailor in his impressive service and address said, "The dedication of this window to the memory of one of our fellow-servants in the Kingdom of God is testimony to our eternal fellowship in Christ. She has passed from our sight; but we and she are still members of His really undivided Family:

'No adamant between us uprears its rocky screen;
A veil before us only; she in the light serene;
That veil 'twixt earth and Heaven a prayer may waft aside;
We breathe one air, Beloved; We follow One Dear Guide;
Passed into the open vision, out of the mist and rain,
She sees how sorrow blossoms, how peace is won through pain.'

Almighty God, Heavenly Father, Who hath set eternity in the heart of the world and hath made everything beautiful in his time; Accept, we beseech Thee, the dedication of this window to Thy honor and glory, and to the dear and sacred memory of Thy servant, Alice V. Claiborne. And grant that her good example of faith and courage and steadfastness in Thy service may inspire and strengthen us by Thy Holy Spirit; Until for us the shad-

Almighty and everlasting God, Who dost govern all things in heaven and earth; Mercifully hear the supplications of Thy people, and grant as Thy peace all the days of our life; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

LET ME BE WITH THEE.

Let me be with Thee where Thou art,
My Saviour, my eternal rest;
Then only shall this longing heart
Be fully and forever blest.

Let me be with Thee where Thou art
Thy unveil'd glory to behold;
Then only shall this wandering heart
Cease to be false to Thee, and cold.

Let me be with Thee where Thou art
Where none can die, where none remove;
There neither death nor life shall part
Me from Thy presence and Thy love."

The Ceaseless Call.

"The Master is come; and calleth for thee."

"There is a secret shrine in each man's heart and in it dwells an eternal witness to Him. When the Voice sings of Him all other voices are heard but as part of its Song; and to hear that Voice is Faith."

This quotation is from a story which appeared in a magazine, and told the tale of a man who longed for a religious belief which he could not gain. He could not arrive at faith. He became very distinguished intellectually; in the height of his fame he lost his sight, and his career was closed. A friend who went to see him found him in great joy and contentment; for a Light had risen in his soul, and, as he said, he "remembered the Land of his Birth." Let us think awhile upon the words of that quotation; and pass thence to consider the Call of the Master as it rings through the world and through the souls of men century after century. I think we might translate the words thus. In every soul howsoever stained with sin and blinded by ignorance, there is a little spiritual spot, a Seed of Holiness, where God dwells by His Spirit to keep the soul in being; for no creature could exist if it were not sustained by the Giver of Life. The Spirit is an eternal Witness to the omnipresence of God and the spiritual nature of man. And man dimly feels this witness; it is a continual pressure from within; and he goes out hither and thither in the world, working, sinning, fighting his brethren, and killing his little fellow creatures, the beasts and birds; and he does great works and is very clever; but peace and rest to his soul he finds not. At last he hears the Witness as a Voice in his soul: "Come unto Me," it says. When he hears this he knows that all the voices which have called him forth to act and struggle are a part of the great Song of Life which he now hears within his soul. Therefore he turns to that Voice, and listens to that Song in his soul; and this is Faith, the knowledge of the awakened soul and spirit which none can take away.

But this is not enough. He must learn to see that Voice embodied in a Human Form which can reveal God He must see the Lord Jesus Christ. Then the outgoing powers of the Soul—symbolized by Martha—go forth to meet the Lord; for she and Mary (the spiritual powers) alike are mourning their brother lying dead. That is to say the wakened soul mourns for those who are asleep in spiritual death Martha, the active power, acts first; that is always so: she goes forth to meet the Master; but she does not quite understand. "Lord, if thou hadst been here my brother had not died." "Thy brother shall rise again." Then comes the puzzled reply: "I know he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last Day." The Voice of God incarnate replies: "Not at the last Day, but now; I am the life. Believest thou this?" Again comes the puzzled but sincere reply; and she calls her sister: "The Master is come and calleth for thee."

The outer powers cannot toil aright in the Master's service without the inner vision; and the inner vision cannot sit at home, but must go forth and meet the Incarnate Voice. Mary arose and went forth quickly and fell at His feet in worship, which Martha had not done for all her zeal. And the Master leads the twain to a grave, and raises the dead before their eyes.

Today the Master's Call rings through the earth; it calls for Martha and for Mary, the friends who know His Love, to go forth to raise the dead; to go forth with Him in His Power. Then shall the graves of the House of Death be opened; and mortality shall be clothed upon with the celestial garment, and drunk down by Life.—Healing Church.

Robert E. Lee's Domestic Life.

General Lee was unusually happy in his domestic life, and it is indeed an inspiration to read of his tender devotion to his wife and children. One of his biographers wrote: "Should we seek through all the annals of time for an illustration of the best that exists in family life, we need not go further to find the perfection and refinement of elegance and of purity than that stately mansion, the home of Lee, which from the wooded heights of Arlington, looks down upon the city of Washington."

One thing alone interrupted the joys of his home life—absence from home, which the service of his country demanded. "Oh, what pleasure I lose in being separated from my children," he exclaims in one letter. "Nothing can compensate me for that; still I must remain here, ready to perform what little service I can, and hope for the best."

It is touching to read that this devoted father was kept from home so long that he did not know his own child when he returned from Mexico—picking up his neighbor's child, he exclaimed, "Here's my little man."

In a letter to Mrs. Lee, written from Mexico, on Christmas Day, 1846, he says: "We have had many happy Christmases together. It is the first time we have been entirely separated at this holy time since our marriage. I hope it does not interfere with your happiness, surrounded as you are by father, mother, children, and dear friends. I therefore trust that you are well and happy, and that this is the last time I shall be absent from you during my life. May God preserve and bless you till then and forever after is my constant prayer."

It is to his credit as a husband and father that a writer has noted "how little of war and how much of Christian feeling and domestic affection his home letters contain."

He wrote such charming letters to his wife and children that we must quote a few extracts from them for therein is revealed the husband and father that he was. These extracts are taken from that interesting volume, "Recollections and Letters of General Lee," by R. E. Lee, Jr.

In a letter to his wife, he writes: "You do not know how much I have missed you and the children, my dear Mary. To be alone in a crowd is very solitary. In the woods, I feel sympathy with the trees and birds, in whose company I take delight, but experience no pleasure in a strange crowd. I hope you are all well and will continue so, and, therefore, must again urge you to be very prudent and careful of those dear children. If I could only get a squeeze at that little fellow, turning up his mouth to 'Keese baba!' You must not let him run wild in my absence, and will have to exercise firm authority over all of them. This will not require severity or even strictness, but constant attention and an unswerving course. Mildness and forbearance will strengthen their affection for you, while it will maintain your control over them."

His concern for the moral and spiritual welfare of his children breathes through all his letters. Writing to his son, W. H. F. Lee, he says: "When I think of your youth, impulsiveness and many temptations, your distance from me, and the ease (and even innocence), with which you might commence an erroneous course, my heart quails within me, and my whole frame and being trembles at the possible result. May Almighty God have you in His Holy keeping.'

Writing again to his son he expresses gratification at hearing of his soldiership, zeal and devotion to duty, and adds: "But I was more pleased at the report of your conduct. That went nearer my heart and was infinite comfort to me. Hold on to your purity and virtue. They will proudly sustain you in all trials and difficulties, and cheer you in every calamity."

He might have been excused for not writing to his children during a pressing military campaign, but somehow he always found time to pen a few lines to those dear to him. Writing to his daughter, Mildred, from Camp Fredericksburg, on Christmas Day, 1862, only a few days after that awful battle, he says: "I can not tell you how I long to see you. When a little quiet occurs, my thoughts revert to you, your sisters, and your mother; my heart aches for our reunion. . . . You must study hard, gain knowledge, and learn your duty to God and your neighbor. That is the great object of life."

Fitzhugh Lee, writing of General Lee's Mexican campaign, says: "It seems on the even of active operations

Captain Lee's thoughts were ever turning to his family and his home. In a letter to his two eldest sons (one thirteen and the other nine years of age), written at Camp Saltillo, December 24, 1846, he says: 'I hope good Santa Claus will fill my Rob's stocking tonight; that Mildred's, Agnes' and Anna's may break down with good things. I do not know what he may have for you and Mary (his daughter), but if he only leaves for you one-half of what I wish, you will want for nothing. I have frequently thought if I had one of you on each side of me riding ponies such as I could get you, I would be comparatively happy'."

Writing again from Mexico, he says: "I thought of you, my dear Custis, on the 18th, and wondered, when the musket balls and grape were whistling over my head in a perfect shower, where I could put you if with me to be safe."

Christmas always brought him fond memories of domestic happiness around the family fireside. Writing from Texas to his family at Arlington, in December, 1856, he says: "The time is approaching when I trust many of you will be assembled around the family hearth at dear Arlington another Christmas. Though absent, my heart will be in the midst of you, and I shall enjoy in imagination and memory all that is going on. May nothing occur to mar or cloud the family fireside, and may each be able to look back with pride and pleasure at their deeds of the past year, and with confidence and hope to that in prospect. I can do nothing but hope and pray for you all."

What parental affection breathes through his letters to his children! To his daughter he wrote, on her sixteenth birthday: "And are you really sweet sixteen? That is charming, and I want to see you more than ever. But when that will be, my darling child, I have no idea. I hope after the war is over we may again all be united, and I may have some pleasant years with my children, that they may cheer the remnant of my days . . . I have grown so old, and become so changed, that you would not know me. But I love you just as much as ever and you know how great a love that is. . . . I pray day and night for you. May Almighty God guide, guard and protect you."

Another letter reads: "My precious Annie: I long to see you through the dilatory nights. At dawn when I rise, and all day, my thoughts revert to you in expressions that you can not hear or I repeat. I hope you will always appear to me as you are now painted on my heart, and that you will endeavor to improve and so conduct yourself as to make you happy and me joyful all our lives," etc.

How sharply he felt the pain of separation from his children is seen in these lines: "My Precious Daughter: I wish I could see you, be with you, and never again part from you. God only can give me that happiness. I pray for it night and day."

The death of his daughter, Annie, was a severe blow. On hearing of her death he wrote Mrs. Lee: "I can not express the anguish I feel at the death of our sweet Annie. To know that I shall never see her again on earth, that her place in our circle, which I always hoped one day to enjoy, is forever vacant, is agonizing in the extreme. But God in this, as in all things, has mingled mercy with the blow in selecting that one best prepared to leave us. May you be able to join me in saying, 'His will be done'!"

Fitzhugh Lee, General Lee's nephew, says: "Children always held the key which would unlock the heart of Lee." Another biographer argues that this is an evidence of character, and puts it thus: "He loved children and children loved him, which is surely the most flattering and conclusive evidence as to character." One of his officers who served with him in Texas, said: "The little children always hailed his approach with glee—his sincerity, kindness of nature, and cordial manners attracting their unreserved confidence."

During the last years of his life at Lexington, many were impressed with his devotion to children. "He knew all of the children in Lexington, and along the roads and by-paths of his daily rides, and it was pleasing to witness their delight when they met him. He could be seen at any time stopping on the street to kiss some bright-eyed little girl or pass a joke with some sprightly boy . . . To the day of his death the entrance of a child was a signal for the dignified soldier to unbend, and among his most cherished companions in his retirement, when he was, perhaps, the most noted captain in the world, were little sunbonneted daughters of the professors of the college of which he was president."—Dr. H. H. Smith, in Christian Index.

An Illustration.

It is reported that during the Titanic disaster a vessel equipped with the Marconi system of wireless telegraphy passed within a few miles of the ill-fated ship. It was near enough to have rescued every passenger aboard but passed on all unmindful of the lives going down within easy reach. We ask, and rightly so, why was it? The answer comes that the passing vessel's instrument for receiving messages was so keyed as to receive only calls from distances of one hundred miles or more. I am not posted on wireless telegraphy, and this may be only a newspaper report, but it is a pathetic illustration of what is taking place with us every day in the Lord's work. How many of us are there who really feel that we are interested in world-wide missions, but whose hearts are so keyed as to receive only calls from afar while hundreds and thousands of our fellow beings within the limits of our own State are pasing through the bitter experience of life-wreck and soul-disaster without response or seeming care from us, though we are so near?"—Selected.

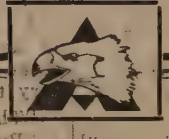
A CHRISTMAS CAROL.

Elizabeth Thompson Reynolds.

Rejoice, rejoice, this happy morn,
Because the Christ our Lord is born!
With lips and hearts let us repeat
The angels' song so glad and sweet.

Rejoice, rejoice, this happy morn,
Because the Christ our Lord is born!
Glory to God! Lift up your voice,
And let the whole wide world rejoice!



The angels' song is sounding still:
"Peace on the earth, to men, good will."
Rejoice, rejoice, this happy morn,
Because the Christ our Lord is born!

His people He has come to save
From sin and death and from the grave.
Our darkness soon will turn to light,
His dawn shall follow earth's dark night.

Earth's tears no longer dim the eyes
Of our loved ones in Paradise:
Their fight is fought, their race is run,
Today, in Christ we all are one.

They, too, rejoice this happy morn
Because the Christ our Lord is born.
A little while, a few more years,
"And God shall wipe away all tears."

Then, fainting hearts, be glad, rejoice,
And with the angels lift your voice!
Rejoice, rejoice, this happy morn,
Because the Christ our Lord is born!

THE BEAUTIFUL WORLD.

Here's a song of praise for a beautiful world,
For the banner of blue that's above it unfurled,
For the streams that sparkle and sing to the sea,
For the bloom in the glade and the leaf on the tree;
Here's a song of praise for a beautiful world.

Here's a song of praise for the mountain peak,
Where the wind and the lightning meet and speak,
For the golden star on the night's soft breast,
And the silvery moonlight's path to rest;
Here's a song of praise for a beautiful world.

Here's a song of praise for the rippling notes
That come from a thousand sweet bird throats,
For the ocean wave and the sunset glow,
And the waving fields where the reapers go;
Here's a song of praise for a beautiful world.

Here's a song of praise for the ones so true,
And the kindly deeds they have done for you,
For the great earth's heart, when it's understood,
Is struggling still toward the pure and good;
Here's a song of praise for a beautiful world.

Here's a song of praise for the One who guides,
For He holds the ships and He holds the tides,
And underneath and around and above
The world is lapped in the light of His love;
Here's a song of praise for a beautiful world.

Wisdom of the Wise Men.

Plodding through the desert, wise-men from afar; not a soul to guide them, nothing but a star; many folk to mock them for their silly care: "What are stars to follow through the empty air?" Plodding through the desert, seeking for a king, fools of comomn legend, fancies all a-wing; there are mighty monarchs in the eastern lands: why pursue another, toiling o'er the sands? Plodding through the desert, scorning gain and ease, what is this you carry in your treasuries? What of royal favor do you hope to gain with your barren presents and your plodding pain? Gold is fi donation for a mighty throne, but the myrrh and incense who would care to own?—myrrh, a stern reminder man is for the sod: incense, for the worship of the holy God? Plodding through the desert with this royal gold, know you not of Herod, jealous, crafty, bold? Herod holds the scepter in a mighty town. His a cruel temper; he will strike you down. Plodding through the desert those sagacious men, glimpsing King and kingdom past our mortal ken—glory, glory, glory hid from common eyes—'mid the mob of mockers they alone were wise!—Amos R. Wells, in Sunday School Times.

Sito and the Little Missionary.

In a far-away country across the waters they travel in rickshas, a sort of light buggy on two wheels with shafts like a buggy has, and a man gets in between the shafts and takes people around. He gets very little pay for this, and it is such hard work that a man cannot stand it more than about ten years; his ankles swell up and his muscles stand out in bad shape like twisted cords.

This story is about a ricksha man, whose name was Sito, and the young missionary wanted him to take his little girl to school. He put his head out of the window and clapped his hands for Sito. Sito drew near with his ricksha and the missionary said, "Ohio, Sito," which means, "Good morning." Sito bowed low two or three times, calling back, "Ohio, Ohio." Then the missionary told him, "Sito, I want you to come tomorrow and every morning at eight o'clock and take my little girl to school on such a street. Do you know where that is?" Sito said he did. "Then at three o'clock you are to go and bring her home. Will you do that?" "Yes, I come."

So the next morning Sito was there with his "buggy" and the little girl took her seat and Sito took up the shafts. It was a light burden for Sito this time, not like some of the big fat men he had to carry, and there was plenty of time, so he did not need to hurry. The little girl was only nine and she wanted to talk, so she asked, "Do you like to play horse like this all the time, Sito?"

Now that hurt Sito; it was hard work and he didn't like her to talk that way, so he said, "Now, little missie, don't make fun of poor Sito like that. I get very tired doing this."

"Then why do you do it?"

"Because I have five stomachs to fill with rice, little missie, and I must work this way."

"But if you get sick or old, what then, Sito?" That made the man very sorrowful. "I don't know, missie. I went to the priest this morning and then to my god to ask him to help me, so I could buy more rice to fill the five stomachs and not get so tired."

"Did it do you any good? What did the priest do?"

"Why, the priest wrote me a little prayer on some paper and I took it to my god."

"How did that help you?"

"Then I chewed it all up in my mouth, but it didn't stick."

"Didn't stick? What do you mean?"

Then Sito told her that when he threw the wet paper-prayer at his god, if it stuck he would get help, but it didn't.

"Oh, Sito, if you'd go to our God I know you'd get help."

But poor Sito answered her, "How could I go away off to your God's shrine? It took me so long this morning to go to my god, and I can't lose so much time, for I must earn the money to buy rice to fill the five stomachs."

Then the happy-hearted little girl smiled. "Oh, Sito, you don't have to go way off to our God; it's the other way. He says, 'Come.' I learned some words that would help you, but I can't think of them just now; maybe when you come to take me home they will come to me."

Sure enough, when Sito came at three o'clock she cried, "Now, I know them; our God Jesus says: 'Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.' Wait till we get home and Daddy will tell you all about it."

When Sito stopped at the gate, the little girl hurried in calling, "Daddy, Daddy, come quick, Sito's ready, Sito's ready." It took some time for her daddy to understand what it was all about, then he took Sito into his room and told him about the real, true God who would help all of us if we would only trust His love and care. He told him how God's own Son, Jesus, died for our sins to save us, and that He knows all about our sorrows and burdens. Then they knelt to pray to this dear Jesus. When Sito rose from his knees his face was all shining. He said, "I know now. He's here with me," putting his hand on his heart. "I go no more and give priest my money. I'll tell your God and Jesus, they will help poor Sito."

The years went by. The mission work grew, and a neat little church was built, and an old man was hired as sexton, He took great pains in keeping it clean and tidy. But he would often grow very tired, when he would sit down in one of the pews to rest a bit. While he rested he would take a little red book out of his pocket (he always carried it) and open at a certain place and look at it so lovingly. He couldn't read, but his little girl who went to the mission read it to him, and she had marked the place so he could find it, and he said the words over and over to himself: "Come unto me, . . . I will give you rest." They meant so much to him, for this is Sito, and he still loves to come in thought and prayer to this true God, who pitied him in his hard labor, and gave him heart rest. This is a really true story, and wasn't the little girl a real missionary?—Dorrice Pressly, in Sunday School Times.

When John Had to Decide.

"Mother," said John Roberts one Friday morning as he started off to school, "I've never asked Billy Dobson out here to spend a Saturday, and he wants to come so bad. May I ask him?"

"What sort of a boy is he?" asked the mother.

"Well, he seems to be a good-hearted chap," answered John a little nervously, remembering some of the things he didn't like about Billy; "but he looks kind of neglected, and I know he wants to come the worst kind."

John's mother smiled. She knew he was to be trusted, so she said: "Certainly, dear; bring him out, if his mother is willing."

"His mother is dead," said John, choking over the words as he thought of their meaning.

And then John's mother stooped and kissed his hair as she said: "Be sure and bring Billy with you tonight, if they will let him come."

That was how Billy came to be at Oak Ridge, for that was the name of John's home. Friday night John's father played games with them, and then his mother read them a story. When she went up to show Billy his room, she had made everything ready for him as carefully as if he had been her own boy.

Saturday morning the boys were raking the leaves in the yard, when they broke the rake, and John's mother said they could go to the store and get another one.

John telephoned to the store, and the man told them that the rake would cost thirty-five cents; but his mother didn't have the change, so she gave him a dollar to get the rake.

When they got to the store the man found that he had made a mistake and the price of the rake was twenty-five cents instead of thirty-five cents.

"What are you going to do with that other ten cents?" Billy asked eagerly, and John replied shortly:

"Take it home. What do you think?"

"I wouldn't," said Billy; "you bet I wouldn't. Your mother thinks the rake costs thirty-five cents, and she wouldn't care, and besides, she won't ask anything about it."

For answer John laughed good-naturedly in order to keep from saying anything rude to Billy and then turned to go home.

"Aw, come on, kid; I want some candy," said Billy, beginning to whine.

But John kept on his way.

Then Billy tried a new game. He went up to the storekeeper and said:

"Give me ten cents worth of stick candy."

The storekeeper gave it to him, and when Billy got the bag he stuck a piece of the candy into his mouth at once and said:

"John's got the money to pay for it."

John looked up and heard what Billy had said and saw what he had done. He knew that if he asked his mother for ten cents she would gladly give it to him, and he also knew that she would not ask about it, anyway; but John was honorable to the very core of his being. He knew that Billy was his guest and that he was partly responsible for Billy's doings on that account, and he didn't want the storekeeper to take the candy back and so lose what Billy had eaten. Just for a minute he didn't know what was right to do, and then he remembered that, no matter how kind his mother might be about the matter, the money he carried was not his own, so he said to the merchant:

"I am sorry that Billy ordered the candy, Mr. White, for I have no money of my own with me; but if you will charge it to me I will pay you out of my next week's allowance."

"Certainly, John," said the merchant; "I am very glad to do it for you."

Billy was listening and thinking all of this time, and when they were safely outside of the store, he said:

"John, I'm ashamed of myself, and I'll bring you that money to school on Monday," and he did.

Billy wanted to be as trustworthy as John was, and that is one way that a friend can help a friend.—Boys and Girls.

The Fairy Child.

Ella Marie was a pretty little girl and everybody loved her. She had pretty clothes, lovely toys and a dear little house to live in.

Her parents were very good to her, but she was not happy.

One day as she was walking in the garden she noticed a queer little man strolling beside her. Somehow or other she felt as though she did not want to know him. He seemed out of place among the flowers.

"What are you doing in my garden?" she asked at last.

"You ought to know," the little man answered. "You brought me here yourself."

"No, I didn't," declared Ella Marie.

"You did," said he, stoutly. "If you do not want me here why do you let me in?"

"I did not," she said. "I noticed that when you were walking beside me the flowers do not look nearly so bright and lovely. Even the sun seems to grow dim."

The little man sighed.

"That is always the way," he said sadly. "Folks encourage my presence and yet they claim not to like me."

Suddenly Ella Marie stopped and clapped her hands.

"Oh! look," she cried, pointing to the foot of the garden, where the sun was shining very brightly, "there is a little girl I should love to play with."

"That," said the little man, "is a Fairy Child."

The little girl was shaking her bright head in the sunlight and laughing with glee as she tried to catch the glittering sunbeams.

Ella Marie started to run toward her.

"O little girl," she called, "I want to play with you."

The Fairy Child paused.

"I want to play with you, too, and I have tried hard to do so," she said. "But you haven't seemed to want me around lately. You much prefer your present condition."

Ella Marie looked back at the strange little man, who still stood in the shadow of a tree.

"Oh! I am so unhappy," she almost sobbed.

As she spoke she tried to grasp the hand of the Fairy Child. But she slipped away and ran out of the garden.

Ella Marie sped after her.

Down the road they went until finally the Fairy Child slipped through a broken fence.

Ella Marie squeezed through also. There was a very small house on the other side of the fence. The garden consisted of only a few plants which had been carefully tended.

On the lawn in front of the house the Fairy Child was playing and romping happily with a little girl in a very clean gingham dress.

Ella Marie looked down at her own dainty dress with its lace-edged ruffles, at her shiny shoes and silk socks, and wondered why the Fairy Child had run away from her to play with the little girl in the old dress and shabby shoes. They were having a good time together.

As Ella Marie stood watching them, she suddenly began to feel differently.

"How happy I am," she said, "to think I have such a lovely house to live in and such a beautiful garden in which to play. I wonder if they will both come back with me to my garden."

As Ella Marie spoke the little gingham girl rose to her feet.

"I have often wanted to play in your garden," she said. "Haven't you ever seen me standing before your gate, watching you?"

So they started down the road. The Fairy Child skipped along by their side.

When they reached the garden the strange little man was no longer there.

"Discontent has gone," laughed the Fairy Child, "and now all is well among the flowers."

"And who are you?" asked Ella Marie.

"I am Happiness," the Fairy Child answered. "Whenever you want me, I will come to you. But I cannot remain when Discontent is here also."

"But," said Ella Marie in wonder, "I do not understand why you ran away from my beautiful home to play in such a poor little garden."

The gingham girl was a bit ahead of them, so she did not hear their conversation.

"Happiness," replied the Fairy Child, slowly, "is everywhere, among the rich and among the poor. All over the world I go, nor do I care whether one wears a gingham dress or one of finest silk. It is what is in the heart that matters."

As she spoke the sunbeams danced merrily in the garden, the birds sang gaily, the flowers bloomed more gloriously. For Happiness was there.—The Christian Index.

Clinging to Christ.

U. Bor. Sing, heir of the Rajah of Cherry, India, was converted by the Welsh missionaries. He was warned that in joining the Christians he would forfeit his right to the throne of Cherry after the then ruling Prince. After the death of Rham Sing, the chiefs of the tribes met and unanimously decided that Bor. Sing was entitled to succeed him, but that his Christian profession stood in the way. Messenger after messenger was sent, urging him to recant, and they would all acknowledge him as king. His answer was: "Put aside my Christian profession? I can put aside my head-dress or my cloak, but as for the covenant I have made with my God, I cannot for any consideration put that aside." Since then he has been impoverished, but is a Christian still.—The Wesleyan.

"Not Too Much."

It is said that an American Indian once came to Bishop Whipple and asked him to give him two one dollar bills for a two dollar note.

"Why do you want the two bills?" asked the Bishop.

The Indian replied, "One dollar for me to give to Jesus, and one dollar for my wife to give."

The Bishop asked him if it was the only money he had. He said, "Yes."

The Bishop was about to tell him, "It is too much," when an Indian pastor standing nearby whispered, "It might be too much for the white man to give, but not too much for an Indian who has this year heard, for the first time, of the love of Christ."—Exchange.

Living in harmony with one's fellows is a most difficult art. The human being who has learned to feel and express quick sorrow at another's hurt without regard to whose was the actual fault, has solved one of the most difficult problems of social adjustment.—H. W. M.

Dear Friend:

If you could have looked in on the 104 children at our Richmond or Roanoke Receiving Homes on Christmas morning and seen their Christmas party—a Christmas tree, gifts for every child—oh! such joy—and a kind of happiness that results from love of fellow man that many of them had never before known—

If you could have gone into one of the homes made bright and happy and brimming over with Christmas cheer by childish voices and gleeful shouts as the presents were distributed and the lights were turned on the tree—one of those homes where last year there was no child—but this year there is a child, who last year had no Christmas—There are 1161 wards of our Society placed in free foster homes—

And if you could have gone into some of the places our workers went in the days before Christmas and seen the conditions under which some children are trying to grow up—If you could go with our social workers during the days of the coming months and watch them so gently and carefully transplant little homeless children from conditions of want, neglect and worse—through the juvenile court into a receiving or a boarding home with its special diet, medical care, love and sympathetic understanding, and then into a home where—next year there will be a Christmas—

You would then know how we are using the gift you so generously sent in response to our Christmas letter for which we are enclosing our official numbered receipt in the form prescribed by the auditors. We want to thank you, again and on behalf of the Society and the children in our care, to wish you a healthy and prosperous New Year.

Sincerely yours,

FRANK D. PRESTON,

General Secretary.

Hand this to some friend and ask him to share in this work.

"Hello! Hello! How Much Does Happiness Cost?"

Only the price of learning a simple health rule, this smiling youngster finds!

"Happiness is on the other end of your phone too," says little Barbara

"HAPPINESS just radiates from our baby since we began giving her—"

What was it that Mrs. Fred E. Schmitt of 2023 Stone Street, Falls City, Nebraska, discovered, which she could give to her baby that made her happy, well, strong and buoyant?

Not a medicine; not a drug of any kind; just harmless bodily lubrication. Only that, and nothing more. Mrs. Schmitt's discovery that little Barbara kept well when she was made regular as clock work is the same discovery as has been made by millions of other people, who are enjoying the happiness of health because they use Nujol.

Babies, old folks, people in the prime of life—all alike need to have the bodily poisons (we all have them) regularly cleaned out. Nujol just gently, naturally, normally lubricates the action of your body which needs lubrication as much as any other machine.

Please remember that Nujol contains no drugs; is non-fattening; is not absorbed in any way by the body; can form no habit; cannot hurt you, no matter how much you take. All it can do is keep you internally clean, and make you continually feel better. Colorless, tasteless as pure water, Nujol will make you see the bright side of life; it will help you to get the most out of your life; it will make you wake up in the morning feeling fit, and help you to do a good day's work with a smile.

Millions of people have discovered this fact—why don't you? You can buy Nujol in sealed packages at all drug stores. It costs but a few cents, and makes you feel like a million dollars. Get a bottle today and see how brimming zestful health will boost your day's happiness.

Deaths

PRINCE: Entered into rest, January 6, 1930, ROBERT WATSON PRINCE and his wife, ALICE WAYLES, daughter of the Rev. William H. Meade.

They were lovely and pleasant in their lives, and in their death they were not divided.

LOUISE FOSTER CUTTER McCLURE.

LOUISE FOSTER CUTTER, McCLURE, wife of the Rev. Alfred J. P. McClure, died January 2, 1930, at her residence in Ventnor, N. J. The interment was in the family plot in the cemetery at Princeton, N. J.

Mrs. McClure was a sufferer for a great many years with a very agonizing facial ailment, but she lived to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of her wedding.

She was a woman of great sweetness of character and beloved by many friends who admired her courage and fortitude in the midst of much pain.

She was born in Calais, Maine, in 1850, and, therefore, was eighty years of age when she died.

She left two sons, a daughter, six grandchildren and her husband, who was formerly well known and beloved throughout the Church for his work as Secretary and Treasurer of the old General Clergy Relief Fund.

MRS. PHILLIPS LEE GOLDSBOROUGH.

A letter and flowers from President Herbert Hoover were among those received as the funeral services for MRS. PHILLIPS LEE GOLDSBOROUGH, wife of United States Senator Goldsborough, were held from the home at 839 West University Parkway.

Following the services conducted by the Rev. Dr. Arthur B. Kinsolving, rector of Old St. Paul's Church, the body was taken to Cambridge for burial in the Christ Protestant Episcopal Church yard. City police escorted the funeral cortege to the city line, where States police took their place for the trip to the Eastern Shore.

The final rites were held in Cambridge. Dr. Kinsolving was assisted at this service by the Rev. Dunbar Gould, of Christ's Church.

A letter of condolence also was received from a Senate delegation and a number of Senators sent flowers. Several were present at the services.

The pallbearers were: Dr. Thomas S. Cullin, Albert G. Towers, John P. Baer, C. L. T. Gould, Jr., of Baltimore; Eugene DeReves, of Washington; S. Wilson Heaten, of Philadelphia; Col. Albanus Phillips and Judge W. Laird Henry, of Cambridge, Md., and Capt. Charles F. Macklin, of Annapolis.

New House, Father and Mother.

On December 10, 1929, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel J. Davis were installed as the House-Father and Mother of the Church Home for Children in the diocese. The Davises have a long experience in this the George Junior Republic at Freeville, N. Y. They founded a similar institution at Litchfield, Conn. They come to the diocese very highly recommended, and have already shown their ability to do this kind of work in a remarkable way.

The Church Home lost its herd of good pedigreed cows last autumn, having been infected with an incurable disease. The children of our Church Schools have decided to make the purchasing of cows for the Home their diocesan work in the Five Fields. Epiphany is the chosen time and the diocese hopes they will succeed, for cows are badly needed.

Christmas in the Diocese.

New gifts to Trinity Church, Marshall, the Rev. M. B. Williams, Ph. D., Vicar, were presented and dedicated on Christmas Eve, namely, a processional cross, silver offertory plates and a ciborium. The interior of this church recently has been redecorated. In Christmas week the pageant, "The Nativity of Christ", was performed by the young people of the parish under the direction of Miss Mary Fisher.

A Christmas Eve service was held in the chapel and corridors of St. Luke's Hospital, Kansas City, by the Rev. Robert Nelson Spencer and the vested boy choir of Grace and Holy Trinity Church. A new altar dossal and new sanctuary chair were dedicated. The choir sang Christmas carols in procession on each of the six floors of the hospitals.

The choir of St. Paul's Church, Kansas City, sang at Christmas Eve observance in the Hotel Muehlebach and the Baltimore Hotel. Lights were dimmed and the choristers carried candles.

Midnight celebrations of the Holy Communion were held in all the Kansas City parish churches and were attended by large and devout congregations. The new rector-elect, the Rev. Richard M. Trelease, celebrated at St. Paul's Church, assisted by the Rev. Guy D. Christian, and administered to three hundred communicants.

The New Year in the Chapels of the New York Protestant Episcopal City Mission Society were ushered in with Watch Night Services on New Year's Day.

On Monday evening, December 30, holiday parties and distribution of gifts for the Church Schools were held at St. Cyprian's Chapel, and at St. Martin's. The Christmas tree festival and pageant at the Church of San Salvatore occurred on December 27 at 8 P. M.

At St. Cyprian's Church, on January 8, at 3:30 P. M., under the auspices of the Churchwomen's League for Patriotic Service, there occurred a New Year's party for the Young Married Women's Society.

Lectures in Trinity Chapel.

The Book of Genesis is the subject of six lectures to be given by the Rev. Henry Scott Miller of Trinity Chapel, New York City, on Sunday afternoons, beginning January 19, in Trinity Chapel. The lectures follow Evening Prayer and begin at quarter to five. Subjects of the individual lectures are the origin and nature of the Book of Genesis, Creation and the Fall, the folk-lore of the Hebrews, the Father of a People, Isaac and Jacob, the Story of Joseph.

The Rev. Dennis Whittle Leaves the Diocese.

The Rev. Dennis Whittle, who, since September, 1927, has served as rector of Emmanuel Church at Covington, Virginia, has resigned to accept a call to the rectorship of St. Peter's Church at Delaware, in the Diocese of Southern Ohio, and expects to take up his new work early in January.

Mr. Whittle came to Covington from the Diocese of Virginia, where he had charge of some very interesting mountain mission work. At Covington he had the usual, normal parish activities. A feature that especially appeals to him in going to Delaware, Ohio, is the location there of Ohio Wesleyan University, and the possibility of doing effective work among the Episcopal students attending that institution.

Mr. and Mrs. Whittle will take with them to their new home the good wishes of many friends in the Diocese of Southwestern Virginia.

Rt. Rev. Edward Fawcett, D. D., Bishop.

Grace Church, Galesburg, Illinois.

At the Christmas Eve midnight service of the Holy Communion in Grace Church, of which the Rev. R. Y. Barber is rector, a very beautiful Missal was blessed and used for the first time. It was the gift of seven men, who were a choir class in the Church School in 1896, and who had given the previous Missal. On the Sunday night after Christmas a Guild, the St. Barnabas for Nurses, was organized in connection with the Cottage Hospital—every student nurse and graduate member of the staff joined the Guild, and all the rest of the staff have applied for membership as associates. It is the hope of the Guild that they may be able to organize other branches in nearby hospitals. The parish has been saddened by the sudden death of its faithful treasurer, H. M. Chase, who was a descendant of the great missionary bishop, Philander Chase.

A naval officer, who was not an avowed Christian man, determined to try to pray the "Lord's Prayer," the prayer of his childhood, in absolute sincerity. He knelt down in his cabin and uttered the petitions, one by one, to God, carefully pondering over the meaning of each. For two hours that man was on his knees before God. He found Christ as his Saviour, God as his Father, and rose from his knees a new man, having dedicated his life to God. Today he is a missionary overseas.—Exchange.

Personal Notes

The Rev. C. Leslie Glenn, Secretary for College Work, was elected rector of St. John's Church, New Haven, Connecticut, on December 29, 1929, but he has not yet reached any decision.

The Rev. James T. Bovill has accepted the rectorship of St. Mark's Church, Hope, and St. Barnabas, Foreman, Arkansas, and took up the work on January 1, with residence at 305 South Elm Street, Hope, Arkansas.

The Rev. Arthur Chilton Powell, D. D., resigned as rector of St. Mary's Church, Hampden, Maryland, on January 1, 1930, and will retire from active duty. Dr. Powell came to Maryland from York, Pennsylvania, in 1888 to become rector of Grace Church, Baltimore, which later on became part of Grace and St. Peter's Church. He is still rector-emeritus of that church. He has been very active in the life of this diocese—a member of the Standing Committee, Committee on Canons and Other Business, Trustee of the Cathedral Foundation and Trustee of the Church Home and Infirmary.

The Rev. S. Atmore Caine has resigned St. Timothy's, Roxborough, Pennsylvania, where he has been rector ten years, to take effect February 1. Being on leave of absence from December 1, he has become assistant to the Rev. Julian D. Hamlin, the new rector of the Advent, Boston.

The Rev. George B. Krantz, on December 1, became minister-in-charge of All Saints, Darby, Pennsylvania, succeeding to the vacancy caused by the death of the Rev. Charles A. Ricksecker.

The Rev. Frederick M. Barton, on December 1, became rector of St. Stephen's Church, Wissahickon, Pennsylvania, succeeding the Rev. George S. McKinley, who resigned to take charge of St. Mark's, Honeybrook, Pennsylvania.

The Rev. Arthur F. Gibson on November 10, accepted the rectorship of Christ Church, Eddington, Pennsylvania, succeeding the late Rev. Joseph A. Stewart. He was formerly curate of St. James' Church, Drifton, and in charge of St. James' Chapel, Freeland, Pennsylvania.

The Rev. Geoffrey M. Horsfield resigned as curate at St. Mark's, Philadelphia, to accept appointment as curate of Nativity Chapel of St. Luke's, Germantown, Pennsylvania, succeeding at Nativity Chapel the Rev. Loren M. Gavitt, who goes to Canada.

The Rev. Wallace F. Thompson, for five years past rector of St. John's Church, Mt. Morris, New York, has resigned to take effect January 1.

The Rev. James C. Gairdner, formerly rector of St. James' Church, Rochester, New York, now retired, has removed with his family to Hamilton, Ontario, where for the present they will make their residence.

The Rev. Norman B. Godfrey, of the Staff of the Genesee-Wyoming Co. Associate Mission, who has been located at Attica, New York, and serving points adjacent, has accepted a call to succeed the Rev. Alfred Brittain as rector of St. James, Batavia, New York. He began his ministry there Christmas Eve.

The Rev. G. Napier Smith was formally welcomed as rector of Grace Church, Buffalo, New York, by Bishop Ferris on the second Sunday in Advent. He succeeds the Rev. John N. Barton, now rector of St. Mark's Church, Newark, New Jersey.

ORDINATIONS.

The Rev. Albert M. Holloway and the Rev. Edward G. McCance on St. Thomas' Day, 1929, in the Pro-Cathedral Church of the Nativity, Bethlehem, Pa., were advanced to the Priesthood by the Bishop of the Diocese, the Rt. Rev. Frank W. Sterrett, D. D.

Dean E. G. N. Holmes, of Leonard Hall, read Morning Prayer and the Litany. The Rev. Royden K. Yerkes, D. D., a member of the faculty of the Philadelphia Divinity School, preached the sermon.

Mr. Holloway was presented by his father, the Rev. W. R. Holloway, rector of St. Andrew's Church, Alden, Pa. Mr. McCance was presented by Dean Gateson, of the Pro-Cathedral, the candidate having been a life-long member of this church.

Both men entered Leonard Hall in the same year, were graduated from Lehigh University four years later, entered the Philadelphia Divinity School together and were graduated from this institution in the same year.

Mr. Holloway is curate at St. Mark's Church, Frankfort, Diocese of Pennsylvania.

Mr. McCance is the missionary at St. Paul's Church, Minersville, and St. Stephen's Church, Forestville.

The Rev. Orrin Francis Judd, B. A., was ordained priest on Friday, December 20, 1929, in St. Paul's Church, Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, by the Rt. Rev. James Henry Darlington, Ph. D., D. D., LL. D., D. C. T., Bishop of Harrisburg. The candidate was presented by his father, the Rev. Archibald M. Judd. The Rev. Harry D. Viets, of Carlisle, preached the ordination sermon. The Epistle was read by the Ven. A. A. Hughes, and the Gospel by the Rev. Hollis W. Colwell. The Rev. Alan H. Tongue read the Litany. Other priests joining in the laying on of hands were the Rev. Oscar F. R. Treder, D. D., the Rev. E. W. Foulkes, the Rev. Herbert Cannon, the Rev. Charles S. Sedgewick, and the Rev. Squire Schofield. The newly-ordained priest will continue as curate at the Chapel of the Mediator, Fifty-first and Spruce Streets, Philadelphia.

Mr. Elliott D. Marston was ordained deacon on December 21, St. Thomas' Day, at St. Paul's Church, St. Paul, Minnesota, by the Rt. Rev. F. A. McElwain, D. D., Bishop of Minnesota. The candidate was presented by the Rev. E. H. Eckel, Jr., rector of St. Paul's, who also preached the sermon.

John Craig Roak, of Texas, was ordained deacon by Bishop Coadjutor Taitt, acting for the Bishop of Pennsylvania, at the request of the Bishop of Texas, on December 30, in Old Christ Church, Philadelphia.

The Rev. Floyd W. Tomkins, rector of the Church of the Holy Trinity, Philadelphia, preached the sermon.

Mr. Roak is a student at the Philadelphia Divinity School, and has been serving as Lay Reader at Resurrection Mission, Mayfair.

TWELVE REASONS WHY STRATFORD SHOULD BECOME A NATIONAL SHRINE

BECAUSE

It is a rare and surprising example in America of Seventeenth century English architecture, noble and impressive.

It is the only American home built in part with funds given by a British sovereign and thus forms an everlasting bond of friendship between the United States and England.

It was the home of the first native-born governor of the Colony of Virginia, Thomas Lee, through whose efforts the territory west of the Ohio was opened up for English settlement.

It was the birthplace of Richard Henry Lee, Francis Lightfoot Lee, signers of the Declaration of Independence, and their patriot brothers and sisters.

It exemplified the highest pinnacle of cultural, social and plantation life of the Colonial and Revolutionary periods in Virginia.

Its gardens, grounds and orchards were renowned throughout the thirteen Colonies, and its ancient groves of English beechnut and English hickory trees are to-day worth traveling a thousand miles to see.

It was the site of a skirmish during the Revolution between the Minute Men of old Westmoreland and the crew of a British man-o'-war.

It was for thirty-six years the home of Washington's favorite general, Lighthorse Harry Lee, during the period when he gave his greatest services to Virginia and to the Nation.

It was the birthplace of Robert E. Lee, his childhood home and the place of recreation of his entire youth until his entrance to West Point.

It was the one spot in the world he desired for the home of his closing years, and towards which his heart yearned in the bitter days of war.

It has been preserved in all its fine simplicity and robust character by the Stuart family in their century's holding of it, has not been marred by any changes, additions or so-called "restorations" inside or out.

It will be recreated in the hands of The Robert E. Lee Memorial Foundation, Incorporated, into a place of beauty and delight, a blessing for heart and mind and eye as it was in the old days and thus will become for America and all the world a living shrine—a source of inspiration for those living to-day and for all the generations to come.

THE HEALING MINISTRY OF JESUS

A Healing Handbook for Believers.

By REV. FRANK N. RIALE, Ph.D., D. D.

Author of "The Divine Antidote to Sin, Sickness and Death."

There are few things that we know less about, yet sincerely desire to know more about, than the place of "the gift of healing" in the full Evangel of Jesus. All down the Christian centuries there have been various ways of approach to God for His healing help. But the Holy Spirit is ever saying to men, "and yet I show you a more excellent way". It is this "more excellent", more rational and more universal way, that this little volume aims to set forth.

REV. JOHN GAYNER BANKS, D. D.
Director of the Society of the Nazerene, the international healing guild in the Episcopal Church, writes: "Thousands of souls pursued by 'The Hound of Heaven' will welcome your message as the very word of God speaking to them, coming as a veritable 'Sword of the Spirit', with power and conviction."

REV. L. O. HARTMAN,
Editor of Zion's Herald, Boston, says: "Your own experiences are remarkable. Your message is bound to make men and women think more seriously than ever before, about divine healing.

"It is certainly one of the very best discussions on divine healing in print."

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

"Not 'Do for me what I want,' but 'Do with me what You want'."—Archbishop Temple.

The root virtue from which all other virtues spring is sincerity.

Saints and heroes are never made in easy places.

"God will put up with a great many things in the human heart, but there is one thing He will not put up with in it—a second place."

It is only by labor that thought can be made healthy, and only by thought that labor can be made happy; and the two cannot be separated with impunity.—Ruskin.

There is no outward sign of true courtesy that does not rest on a deep moral foundation.—Goethe.

Trust men and they will be true to you; treat them gently and they will show themselves great.—Emerson.

Bow down Thine ear and hear,
Open Thine eyes and see—
Our very love is shame
And we must come to Thee
To make it of Thy grace
What Thou wouldst have it be.

"One Day!" None of us is equal to it. "One hour!" The pendulum of suffering swings slowly, and an hour's pain tarries. "One minute!" Nay, our God strengthens us "moment by moment."

Every true and living minister of Christ knows that he can only carry on his work in the power of the Holy Ghost and that he actually does so; and this is not in any way confined to the ordained ministry—though we are sure that this power is pledged to these—it is equally available for every true-hearted follower of the Lord in his or her sphere of service, in telling the Old Story of Jesus and His Love and seeking souls for the Kingdom.

A Mohammedan bought a Gospel for four eggs because, as he said, he had no money. The next day he returned with the money, making the remark, "Your book is very good, but the eggs I gave you were not fresh; I should like to pay the price of the Book." That is how the Gospel works—it touches the conscience.

GET THE GREEK HORSES OUT OF TROY AND THE JESUITS OUT OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH OF AMERICA

Langbourne Meade Williams

"MAKE US ETERNAL TRUTHS RECEIVE, AND PRACTICE ALL THAT WE BELIEVE."

I am indebted to an anonymous friend for sending me a pamphlet written by the Rev. Frederick Lynch, D. D., and reprinted from the "Living Church" and entitled, "Is the Episcopal Church Protestant?"

Evidently this is part of a definite campaign to remove the word "Protestant" from the name which has designated the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America continuously from its very beginning one hundred and forty years ago.

Mr. Lynch's argument makes me think of the oft-quoted man who failed to see the woods because he had concentrated his vision upon a small number of the trees composing it. Nevertheless the woods persisted. And so will the word "Protestant" be continued in the title of our Church, unless its character, derived from its English Mother which sprung from the Protestantism of Wycliffe and his followers some six hundred years ago shall be destroyed by those who have vowed to uphold it. Wycliffe and his followers felt constrained to oppose certain doctrines of the Great Roman Catholic Church. The Roman Catholic Church believed and believes, for example, in transubstantiation, purgatory, the worshipping and adoration of images and relics and invoking of saints; and auricular confession; and that there are more sacraments than those of baptism and the Supper of the Lord. But the Church of England in its Articles of Religion and the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America in its similar Articles of Religion, set forth, respectively, the basis of Orthodoxy in each of those two Churches, and each has constantly protested against the above stated beliefs of the Roman Catholic Church. The Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America have solemnly sworn to maintain its constitution of which the Articles of Religion are a delimiting part, our Presbyters and Deacons have also vowed to follow the constitutional administration of that Church, and every baptized member of that Church, including, of course, the Bishops, Presbyters and Deacons have in person or by proxy undertaken in virtue of such membership to maintain its principles.

The name "Protestant" is instinct with those principles. It was in the year 1526 that there was granted by the Diet of Speyer the right to Worship God through Church forms which set forth the same basic principles that I have indicated by the English and by the American Articles of Religion, notably Articles 22, 25, 28, 31, 34 and 35. Power to permit such form of worship was granted to the rulers of those sections of Germany in which the Reformation movement had been brought vigorously to the front by Martin Luther. But at a second Diet of Speyer, held in 1529, that right was set aside by Charles V. Emperor of Germany, who dreaded the freedom implied and also wished to have restored to the Roman Catholic Church the widespread possessions which had been taken from that Church and made into hereditary Lutheran lands in which "Protestant" Church worship was vouchsafed to the people as I have indicated. Then and therefore it was that the leaders of the vast preponderance of the population which inhabited the large portion of Germany involved protested in April, 1529, against this unwarranted attack upon the individual rights granted in 1526. There and then began the technical adoption of the word, "Protestant" which has since been used continuously to indicate opposition to the various doctrines of the Great Roman Catholic Church which are opposed in our Articles of Religion 22, 25, 28, 31, 34 and 35, etc., and likewise to the similar English Articles of Religion. Surely it cannot be that the majority of the 1,877,813 members of our Church desire to destroy its basic character as defined by its Thirty-nine Articles of Religion.

It seems to me that Mr. Lynch's pamphlet concerns itself with the comparatively small number of that membership which is trying to change the very character of the "Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America" by substituting the belief and practices which were rejected when the "Protestant" movement began six hundred years ago, was definitely named "Protestant" four hundred years ago, and persists today in the form of a constitution which must be binding upon every one of its members until that constitution is openly and technically changed. Let me say to Dr. Lynch, in all good spirit, that it seems to me that he has concentrated his attention upon the comparatively small proportion of members of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America who are in mutiny against its established laws, and has thus lost vision of the total great membership just as did the man to whom I referred in the beginning of this Article; he who was so intent upon viewing a small number of trees that he lost sight of the extensive woods of which they constituted only a small part.

I hope and pray that every individual Church member will belong to whatever denomination best enables him to bring into his life the truths that Christ came to teach on Earth. But what is the justification for any member of any organization who has pledged to maintain the principles of such organization and yet persists in violating them and in retaining his membership? I do protest that there is no such justification.

DeCourcy W. Thom.

A SHINING SON OF VIRGINIA

John Stewart Bryan

THE death of the Rt. Rev. Beverley Dandridge Tucker, Bishop of Southern Virginia, ends a life of amazing interest and vitality. Rooted in Virginia from the foundations of the commonwealth, Bishop Tucker summed up in his own personality that largeness of view and that generosity of approach which Virginians like to think were a uniform mark of all their great men. These attributes were a rare combination of inheritance and environment. It would be difficult to imagine any one who could have had a richer life than that of Bishop Tucker. Born in 1846, in the early part of his life he was educated in England and later went to Switzerland to Vevey, where he and his brothers formed associations which were of the utmost interest and value to them in after life. It was here that Bishop Tucker acquired a complete mastery of the French language, which he used with signal effect for the benefit of the Confederacy, when he was fighting under the banner of Lee.

Returning from Switzerland to America, he stopped in Paris and saw Napoleon III. hold a great review of the military forces of the French empire, and with that picture still fresh in his mind he came home and took up arms for the Confederacy, and saw the tragic surrender at Appomattox. His great-grandfather, St. George Tucker, who served at Yorktown some three generations before, witnessed a like spectacle, when the British troops laid down their arms in 1781.

But it was not the pomp and panoply of glorious war that colored Bishop Tucker's life. His whole spirit was the working out of a life that had been dedicated without reserve to the service of God and the preaching of the Gospel. Here was a man with astounding social gifts; of remarkable intellect, with a personal charm that could and would have gained him almost any position he desired in the financial world, and yet he laid them all aside to take up the simple routine of a country preacher. To the day of his death he affirmed, and all who saw him knew that his statement was true, that if he had his life to live over again, he would not change the decision he had made for any other decision he could imagine. And this must have been because he was aware of the sense of peace and well-being which his whole life manifested, without perhaps understanding how that supremely desirable end had been attained. He went about his daily work with wisdom and affection, and there grew up in him a character which all who came within the radiant scope of his personality felt and admired.

In 1925, when the General Convention met in New Orleans, Bishop Tucker received an ovation that was as overwhelming as it was spontaneous. At his appearance to speak the entire convention rose, cheered and applauded as it had not done in the memory of man for any other person. It was not because Bishop Tucker had raised a great sum; it was not because he had carried through any great plan of ecclesiastical statesmanship; it was not for any financial or intellectual debt which the convention owed him. Rather it was because the convention was trying by outward and visible sign to convey to the bishop that sense of obligation which all felt who saw in him the realization of that ideal of lovable, benign, peaceful, courageous, Christian manhood completed and glorified which his life showed forth.

In this day of divorce and marital unhappiness the life of Bishop Tucker and his wife, Maria Washington, was a standing and unanswerable proof of the truth of that ideal of perfect marriage which animates the heart of every true lover. The community of purpose, the mutual love and confidence between those two, the oneness of background and the unity of aim gave to their joint lives a stability from which many weak and distraught souls drew strength and hope, and to the bishop and his wife this union gave in large part that depth and sweetness of character for which they both were beloved.

Here, at the end of a life of eighty-three years, the father of thirteen children lays down his earthly vesture. The head of a diocese transmits the rule and obligation to his successor. The head of two great schools for the Negroes puts aside the responsibility of that office, and gives into other hands the direction of that activity. But the one fact is of transcending importance is that out of this change and decay here emerges something over which time and death have no control; that is, the imperishable spirit of sweet reasonableness, the undying interest and enthusiasm for all that was best and worthiest, the culture of age and experience blended with the abounding hopefulness of youth. This is the rare and unbelievable miracle which the life of such a personality as Bishop Tucker has made evident. It did not need the summons of death for him to hear those words he had so often read at the funerals of others, "Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord," for Bishop Tucker had heard and accepted that invitation in his early manhood; his whole life had been one unfolding pilgrimage to that great goal and his entrance into that joy was long since seen and known of all.

ADMIRAL BYRD'S RETURN.

Admiral Byrd to Start for Home January 29, 1930.

The sailing of the City of New York from New Zealand on Sunday will be welcome news to Admiral Byrd and his companions at Little America. Professor Gould and his geological party may arrive there in another fortnight, or in less time if storms do not keep them in camp. January is the best traveling month in the Antarctic, though thick and sometimes bitter cold weather may have to be reckoned with. Professor Gould need be in no hurry to get in from his half-way camp. No one can be sure when the City of New York and the steam freighter, Eleanor Bolling, will reach the Barrier, or in what condition they will find the ice in the Bay of Whales.

The Byrd expedition has necessarily made its comparisons with the Amundsen expedition of 1911-1912. On January 8, 1912, the Fram returned from Buenos Aires to the Barrier. At the time Amundsen and his party were still on the trail back from King Haakon VII Plateau, and did not gain their base until near the end of the month. It was not until January 27 that the Fram could break into the Bay of Whales. Only three days were spent in getting everybody, together with the camp material and the specimens collected, on board. "At 9:30 A. M., on January 30, 1912, in a thick fog," wrote Amundsen, "we took our moorings up and waved a last farewell to the mighty Barrier."

On her voyage from Dunedin in December, 1928, the time of the City of New York was a little over three weeks. She was at Discovery Inlet by Christmas Day. On December 11, the Eleanor Bolling had parted company with her, after tying up to the sister ship and unloading coal. Shackleton's Nimrod was twenty-two days in making the voyage from Lyttleton to Barrier Inlet. He stayed there only long enough to name the Bay of Whales, into which he could not get because miles of the Barrier "had calved away." Later he made his base in McMurdo Sound. Admiral Byrd's ships should put in an appearance about January 26. Something like two months and a half should be allowed for his home-coming to the United States.—New York Times.

BIBLE QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

(Our readers are invited to send in their questions from time to time concerning Scriptural subjects in which they are perplexed or desire light. Our limited space necessitates brevity in questions, as well as in the answers which we will endeavor to maintain in strict accord with the Word of the Lord, which, after all, settles all argument. This column is therefore not for controversy, but for a testimony.)

Question No. 17.—"Who is the Antichrist referred to in Scripture and when is he to appear?"—E. C. T.

Answer.—There are already many antichrists (see 1 John 2:18). Only recently we read of an airship in Russia which bears the name "Antichrist," while throughout the world generally are manifestations which appear to be in preparation for the leading world character to finally assume this role and who will be a man whom Satan will fill to such an extent that he will be Satan incarnate, and in whom all the forces of evil shall head up.

The date of the appearance of the antichrist, who is to be Satan incarnate, is unknown, but he will just precede the return of our Lord Jesus Christ to set up His Kingdom of righteousness and peace and who will destroy the Antichrist with the brightness of His coming (see 2 Thess. 2: 3-10; Rev. 13:11-17).

Question No. 18.—"Are all parts of the Bible equally inspired of God?"—A. B. J.

Answer.—Yes, "All scripture is given by inspiration of God" (see 2 Tim. 3:16). This is proved to the satisfaction of every true believer who follows the instruction given in 2 Timothy 2:15 to "rightly divide the word of truth," etc. (1 Cor. 2:13; Heb. 1:1; 2 Peter 1:21).

THE SILVER SPLINTER

By John Wallace Suter, Jr.

AN imaginary conversation between a Missionary Enthusiast and a Member of the National Council. (Note: By reason of his membership in the National Council, the latter is one of the co-authors of the General Church Budget.)

M. E.: I'm tired of all this overhead over-development at "281." Let's get rid of a lot of those Secretaries and get back to an organization that will devote itself exclusively to Missions.

M. N. C.: Missions?

M. E.: Yes, what we always used to mean by the word: building hospitals in Japan or schools in Liberia; sending out missionaries; winning converts to Christendom.

M. N. C.: Would getting rid of Secretaries help?

M. E.: Why not? Isn't every dollar spent on a Secretary's salary a dollar that might have been spent on a missionary's? Besides, why should we pay fat stipends to wealthy childless bachelors who never leave their swivel-chairs at "281", except to go to their homes on Park Avenue for dinner, and then to the theatre?

M. N. C.: What a picture! It should be hung beside the portrait representing the foreign missionary as a thin married man in a long black coat who lives on caraway seed and is finally eaten by cannibals who spit out his bones on the beach. But let's be serious. Let's get down to cases.

M. E.: Good! Here is a case: the National Department of Religious Education.

M. N. C.: Well, what about it?

M. E.: It's a waste of money. Abolish it. Then we'll have $112,000 more to spend on missionary work every year.

M. N. C.: All right. Let's see. I have that Department's budget in my hand. Here's an item called Adult Missionary Education.

M. E.: In that budget?

M. N. C.: In the budget of the Department of Religious Education.

M. E.: What is it for?

M. N. C.: To provide a study-course each year for some particular missionary project of the Church; to issue, and recommend, mission-study helps, materials, etc., for men and women; to collect, organize, and distribute missionary facts for adult readers; to promote mission-study classes for vestrymen, men's clubs, parish societies, and all sorts of adult groups of both sexes.

M. E.: Does anybody ever read or study these things?

M. N. C.: In 1929 over thirty thousand pieces were distributed on order.

M. E.: So this expenditure really helps to uphold the Church's missionary endeavor?

M. N. C.: The Department of Missions thinks so. It would not willingly forego this help.

M. E.: Well, then, that's an exception. I suggest that you leave in the Budget that one item under the Department of Religious Education.

M. N. C.: All right, I'll mark it "To be retained."

M. E.: Thanks. Good-bye!

M. N. C.: Wait a minute. I just happened to notice in the budget of the Department of Religious Education an item for work with the Isolated.

M. E.: Who are they?

M. N. C.: People who live too far away from churches or schools to go to services or meetings; the shut-ins; the aged; the sick. Any one, old or young, who for any reason has to do all his studying and all his worshipping alone.

M. E.: What is done for them?

M. N. C.: Letters, correspondence courses, printed prayers and readings keep them in touch with the Church and enable them to enjoy normal religious growth.

M. E.: Sounds like Church Extension to me.

M. N. C.: It is: individual by individual instead of congregation by congregation.

M. E.: Better mark it "To be retained."

M. N. C.: And here's an item for College Work. Do you want that abolished?

M. E.: Naturally. What have universities to do with missions?

M. N. C.: But the work supported by the National Council is that of paying temporary subsidies to clergymen in order to make it possible for them to minister to college students who are away from home.

M. E.: How do you mean, minister to them? Have Sunday-school classes for them?

M. N. C.: No. I mean much the same things that are done for the unchurched in China: giving them a Church Home, pastoral care, the sacraments, personal interviews, friendship, spiritual help. Most of all, I mean representing Christianity; for the college campus, you know, is perhaps the hottest battle-ground in the world where the forces of Christendom and the forces of unbelief come to grips.

M. E.: I have a son and a daughter at college, and I must say that I am thankful that our Church is ably represented at those colleges. By the way, who pays the salaries of those two rectors?

M. N. C.: The local parish pays part, and the National Council pays the other part temporarily.

M. E.: Why?

M. N. C.: To make sure that there will be strong men in crucial places.

M. E.: Well, leave that item in. And, by the way, how much does the National Council spend per year on this work?

M. N. C.: $23,000.

M. E.: And how many Episcopalians are there at college?

M. N. C.: 28,000.

M. E.: I see. Not a very extravagant enterprise when you come to think of it.

M. N. C.: Especially when you consider that we look to the colleges for our future priests, including those who will serve as missionaries; not to mention teachers, doctors and nurses.

M. E.: Of course. Well, good-bye!

M. N. C.: Just a minute! Here are a few items that I want to ask you about. They are grouped together because each of them represents a piece of work which earns money for the National Council: the Bookstore, Lantern Slides, Daily Bible Readings, and Findings in Religious Education. Some of them break even, and some of them almost do.

M. E.: Yes; but doesn't that show on the income side of the Budget? What we are talking about are the expenditures.

M. N. C.: No, the income is never shown. Every department lists its expenditures, and the sum of all these expenditures is the National Council's Budget. The fact that certain of the expenditures "wipe themselves out," so to speak, is not shown.

M. E.: So the total budget of the Department of Religious Education and the net cost of that Department to the National Council are two different figures?

M. N. C.: Always.

M. E.: And of these two, the second is the smaller?

M. N. C.: Always.

M. E.: Well, good-bye!

M. N. C.: What's your hurry?

M. E.: I've got to catch a train. I am going to give a missionary talk to the Sunday School of St. John's Church. I have a good story to tell them—one I got at the Church Missions House in New York.

M. N. C.: Have you it with you?

M. E.: Yes, here!

M. N. C.: I see. (Reads.) Friends Around the World; Friends on Far Trails, published by the Department of Religious Education, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

M. E.: Well, good-bye!

M. N. C.: Wait a minute. About this budget which we are abolishing. I see another item here called "Administration of National Offerings." Shall I cut it out?

M. E.: What does it mean?

M. N. C.: The Lenten Offering, the Birthday Thank Offering, and the Little Helpers Offering. Also the Christmas Boxes which are sent every year to mission stations by half the Church Schools in the country.

M. E.: What is the result of these Offerings in money?

M. N. C.: Something over half a million dollars annually added to the treasury of the General Church.

M. E.: Spent on missionary work?

M. N. C.: Spent on the work administered by the National Council, of which seventy-six per cent is spent by the Department of Missions, and the rest by the other Departments. Shall I eliminate the item that maintains these Offerings?

M. E.: And cut off all that income? Don't be absurd! That would be cutting off your nose to spite your face. Or killing the goose . . . Well, good-bye! What are you doing now?

M. N. C.: Just drawing a line through another item in the budget of the Department of Religious Education, since you haven't asked me to retain it.

M. E.: Which one?

M. N. C.: The Field Secretary.

M. E.: What does she do?

M. N. C.: Goes to missionary districts and trains teachers, addresses parents and clergy, holds conferences, preaches sometimes, and in general brings encouragement and inspiration to weak and lonely places.

M. E.: Does she travel far?

M. N. C.: To every Missionary District on the Continent, and also to Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Virgin Islands, Cuba.

M. E.: There seems to be sort of a missionary flavor about it. Better leave that item in.

M. N. C.: And abolish all the rest?

M. E.: Yes; except, of course, those that we have agreed to retain.

M. N. C.: Exactly. That means wiping out the items that might be called Religious Education per se; those that have no particular reference to Missions.

M. E.: Yes. (Pauses.) What are they, anyway?

M. N. C.: Child Study; Curriculum-guidance; Help given in Church School Administration; Advice on Church School Architecture, Music, Drama and Art; Help given on Week-day and Vacation Schools; Contacts with Professional Directors of Religious Education; Advice given to Young People's Groups; the National Conference of Diocesan Educational leaders.

M. E.: In other words, helping the home parish to do its regular daily business?

M. N. C.: Yes.

M. E.: Well, that's the stuff I have always wanted abolished. What are you doing with that pencil and paper?

M. N. C.: Drawing a circle.

M. E.: What for?

M. N. C.: It's a picture of a silver dollar.

M. E.: Well?

M. N. C.: The Budget Dollar of the National Council. Watch while I divide it into two sectors. The first sector will be the proportion of the National Council's Budget which you want retained, and what is left will be the part that you want to abolish. (He draws two lines like the two spokes of a wheel: lines which nearly touch each other all the way from the centre to the circumference.)

M. E.: (Pointing to the slim area between the two spokes.) Is that what I want to abolish?

M. N. C.: So you said.

M. E.: It looks more like a splinter than anything else.

M. N. C.: Yes. A Silver Splinter.

M. E.: What proportion of the National Council's whole Budget is it?

M. N. C.: Four-tenths of one per cent. That is to say, it is a piece of work which the average parish in the diocese of Massachusetts pays $4.55 per year to support, and the average Montana parish thirty-eight cents.

M. E.: And what did you say it was for?

M. N. C.: To help the home parish do its educational job better.

M. E.: But if the home parish did its educational job better, the home parish would become more alive to its missionary obligations, wouldn't it?

M. N. C.: Naturally, since a mission-training streak runs through the religious educational parish program promoted by the National Department of Religious Education.

M. E.: Let me look at that Splinter again. It looks like a pin, or a very thin wire nail.

M. N. C.: What's that wooden object sticking out of your coat pocket?

M. E.: That? Oh, that's my hammer. I brought it along to do some knocking with.

M. N. C.: Better hurry up and use it, or you'll miss your train.

M. E.: (Drawing the hammer from his pocket.) I've decided to use it for a different purpose.

M. N. C.: Yes?

M. E.: Give me that nail. I want to drive it home.

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSE.

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice, eternal treasures, indeed. "Thy word have I hid in my heart, that I might not sin against thee." Ps. 119:11.)

This week the following verse was submitted by

Mrs. Donald McKinnon, of Buffalo, New York:

"My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me:

And I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand.

My Father, which gave them me, is greater than all; and no man is able to pluck them out of my Father's hand.

I and my Father are one" (St. John 10:27-30).

Who will send one from the far-away places as well as very near us?

Nothing New Under the Sun

Popery in the Church.

(The following is reprinted from the Southern Churchman of Friday, January 8, 1847.)

To the Editor of the Record:

Sir:

Allow me to call your attention to a reprint, in the form of a pamphlet, of three letters addressed to the Editor of the English Churchman by the curate of St. Martin's, Liverpool, in pretended reply to Mr. Marshall's strictures on Mr. Cecil Wray's late attack on the Protestant clergy of our Church.

This traitor has signed the Thirty-nine Articles—belongs to what is notoriously the Protestant Church of England as by law established, and yet dares to use the following language, which really, but for its overdone plainness, would induce one to believe that its author was a Jesuit wolf in our pale.

First, in the prefatory advertisement, he says, that "the true position of our beloved Church, is that of actual schism, though not of ex-communication from the Holy Catholic Church." In page 8 we read, "Mr. Marshall is not only incorrect, but unfair in taking for granted, that the writings or even the intentions of the Reformers, are the standard of belief in the British Church. Still more unfair is he, when he writes as if British Catholics dated the commencement of their Church from the Reformation. He knows, as well as any one, that they regard the Reformation as a great and miserable schism on one side, whichever were the guilty parties," etc.

Again, on the subject of the Reformation, at page 9:

"As in all great convulsions, so in this, the scum rose to the surface—strong statements were made, the canon of Scripture was attempted to be distributed, monstrous doctrines were broached, vile practices tolerated, and even encouraged. A breach had been made in the Church's unity; some one was guilty, and it was to be expected that the enemy would make the most of his opportunity. Bishops Cranmer, Latimer, Jewel, Hooper, Ridley, have just as much weight, as authorities in the British Church, as their agreement with Catholic antiquity gives them, and no more. And, as individuals, they have not as much weight as Archbishop Laud, as Bishops Barrow, Beveridge, Wilson, Ken, Hammond, Andrewes, etc. By the undivided consent of the Church—the one voice of the Spirit—those divines of the Reformation, as well as the Reformation itself, that idol of heretics, are sternly judged by the British Church, and all her true Catholic sons. Far from appropriating all the errors, blasphemies, and rubbish which that terrible convulsion urged up from the depths of stagnant Catholicism, she preferred to run the risk of conceding too wide a latitude to the private judgment of her children," etc.

Again, p. 11:

"What if the actual state of the British Church has been most lamentable? What if the waters, at one time, to all human appearance, had gone over her head, and the antichrist of the Reformation had overcome her? What if her connection with the State has vitiated her inner life, obstructed her discipline, restrained her maternal powers, and interfered even with her dogmatic teaching What if—she still have to shed bitter tears over churches in ruins, sacraments profaned, privileges scorned, spiritual dignities erastianized, an episcopate not free from heretical intrusion, and a priesthood overrun with heresy?"

On the same page:

"Her essence is Catholic. For the last three centuries the course of events in which she has had a part, has disfigured that essence with anti-Catholic accidents" (Thirty-nine Articles, to-wit, which I have declared my full belief in). "A Puritanical dress has been forced upon her. It is inappropriate, repugnant, odious to her—disfiguring anomalous, injurious—a disguise and a hindrance—a livery of antichrist, and a badge of unbelief. She has ever sought to cast it aside: her efforts seem now to bid fair to be successful. God grant they speedily may be! We shall never think of deserting her in her present distress; rather shall we seek to recover her out of the hands of false friends, and clothe her once more in her beautiful garments."

The last sentence is a quotation from Mr. Wray's address, above alluded to, on the occasion of his late curate's apostacy to Rome. Sir, the Christian is to be mild and gentle like his Master; but as his Master spared not wrath where it was due, viz., in the case of the Pharisees, hypocrites, so indignation becomes a virtue in such cases as the one here alluded to.

One hardly knows which to be most amazed at, the black treason in the heart of this man, or the daring impudence of its expression. He, forsooth, and those who think with him, are the true sons of the Church of England, that congeries "of errors, blasphemies, and rubbish," whose separation from Rome was "a great and miserable schism," which clothed her with "the livery of antichrist and the badge of unbelief": and who never can be loved until the scarlet abominations of idolatry be restored to her again—"her beautiful garments"!

We, on the other hand, are the heretics and "scum which has risen to the surface," against whom anathemas are issued, authorities excited, and every machination preparing.

This pamphlet speaks for itself and needs no further comment. I send a copy by this day's post to the "Heretical and Puritanical" Bishop of Chester, in whose diocese this atrocious man is located. The language of Ward and Oakeley is far surpassed by what I have now quoted; and it remains to be seen whether the force of public opinion cannot accomplish in the case of this Mr. Harper (for that I understand is his name) what, by God's mercy, it did in theirs, Meanwhile

I remain, faithfully yours,

Nov. 2, 1846. Presbyter.

THE TRUE STONEWALL JACKSON

By the Reverend J. J. Clopton

JACKSON AT WEST POINT.

THERE was nothing personally in Jackson, nor in his antecedents, as regards heredity or training, that led him to West Point. As far as I have been able to learn from local accounts, it was a mere accident. The earliest step toward his receiving his appointment may possibly be classed an opportune suggestion. I have been informed another youth who at that time had the appointment from the Congressional District in which Jackson lived, for some reason resigned. Mr. Kester, before mentioned as a friend of the youthful Jackson, meeting Cummings Jackson, Tom's uncle, said: "Now is Tom's chance by securing this appointment to West Point." His uncle, I am told, had a familiar expression—"by hevins." He replied to Mr. Kester: "By hevins, we'll look into it." This account I got from two of Mr. Kester's children—one of whom was an honored soldier in the Army of the Confederacy. The Hon. Jonathan M. Bennett secured the appointment from Congressman Hays. I have mentioned the fact that the afterward Judge Matthew Edminston coached him in Higher Mathematics for a few months.

What a measure of energy, perseverance, and courage, must have marked the four years he spent at West Point! His indomitable will and splendid physique must have been great assets. It was the testimony of one of his professors at West Point that four more years, and he would have graduated at the head of his class. It is splendid testimony to his great powers to have evoked such praise. From what I have been able to learn when Jackson left Lewis county for West Point, he may have walked from Jackson's Mill, in Lewis county, his home, to Cumberland. And the same account describes him as unburdened with a large wardrobe, possibly carrying his clothes in a small bundle.

There was a distinguished jurist in Lewis county at the time Jackson entered West Point—Judge Edmund S. Duncan. He lived some distance from Jackson's home, and before Jackson went to West Point he called upon Judge Duncan. In the course of the conversation, Judge Duncan said: "Young man, how are you off for money? Do you think you have enough?" Jackson told him he thought he had, and passed him his money. Judge Duncan examined it, and every dollar of it was counterfeit. In the place of what Jackson gave Judge Duncan, he returned Jackson $50 in good money, with the remark, before passing it, and after his examination of Jackson's money: "This will not pass where you are going." The venerable William C. Carper, for years a member of the Buckhannon, West Virginia, Bar, told me this incident and said he was told by Judge Duncan.

Counterfeit money was in circulation in Lewis county at this time and Jackson by some one had been imposed on.

Jackson at Lexington.

In the early fifties Jackson was elected Professor of Mathematics at the State Military School at Lexington, Va., known as the V. M. I.

The purpose of this chapter is to narrate facts hitherto unrecorded of his uneventful life at the time as a quiet professor. The narrative seeks to give some insight into his life and to mention characteristics which cannot fail to be of interest for their novelty. The source from which I have drawn my information is an honored gentleman, now nearing four score years. In the early fifties he was a law student in Judge Brockenborough's Law Class at Lexington. He boarded in the same house with Major Jackson. From the description he gives of Jackson's personal appearance at this time, less than ten years before the Civil War, Jackson was the picture of physical health and manly beauty. To quote his very words, "His face was ruddy, like an overgrown boy's." His homely, temperate habits and his promptness made a deep impression on my narrator. One characteristic of his physical appearance I have never heard mentioned in any biography of the distinguished soldiers. It was the habit of the quiet professor to rarely sit down, even while visiting. This habit of standing abnormally developed his lower limbs, from knee to ankle. When Jackson was calling on ladies, he sat only for a few moments, then rising, he stood during the rest of the visit. The gentleman from whom I obtained these particulars knew Major Jackson intimately, boarding in the same house with him. Major Jackson lodged at the Institute, but ate outside. His habit of promptness was accentuated even then. Great brevity of speech and plainness of diet were also marked characteristics. Daily a few minutes before meals were served Jackson was in easy hearing of the bell. He promptly took his seat when the meal was announced. One of his characteristics was a fondness for red pepper. At breakfast rye bread and molasses were served. It was Major Jackson's habit to break his bread into pieces, pour a most liberal supply of molasses on the bread, and then, reaching for a common tin pepper box, containing red pepper, to sprinkle thickly his bread. Noting this habit, my friend one day asked him: "Major, did you learn to eat red pepper during the Mexican War?" His prompt reply was in the briefest terms: "In Mexico."

Continuing his reminiscences, my friend said: "I introduced Stonewall Jackson to and helped him to get his first wife."

"How was that?" I inquired.

"Well," he said, "we were in the habit of visiting together. One of our visiting places was the refined and hospitable home of Dr. Junkens. He was a Presbyterian minister and President of Washington College. Major Jackson would call at my room. We would then decide whether we would go out and where. In calling at Dr. Junken's we usually found the family together, composed of the Doctor and his wife and three daughters. When we entered, generally the good Doctor was busy with his paper. I claim the distinction of introducing Stonewall Jackson to his first wife, who was the eldest of the three Misses Junkens. When we called, Major Jackson would seat himself for a few moments. Then he and the eldest Miss Junkens would retire to the piano, and between his occupations of turning the sheets of music and conversation the evening passed. In this manner the great soldier did his wooing. During the whole visit Major Jackson remained standing. Promptly at ten minutes to ten he would say good-bye, giving himself ten minutes to reach the Institute." The above narrative I have no reason to doubt.

The military history of Jackson illustrates the value he placed upon promptness, it being oftentimes one of the facts in his many successes as a soldier.

It was during Jackson's residence at Lexington that he united with the Presbyterian Church. From the start he made his religion a most real thing. He was a regular and devout attendant at Divine Service and an active worker. Because of his habit of abstraction, while in church, the impression has been created that he slept during services. This on the authority of the friend before quoted is a mistake. He is a competent witness, for he told me he sat several months in the same pew with Major Jackson. Jackson would march to his seat and had a peculiar habit, when he took his seat, of dropping his open hands upon his knees, closing his eyes, and keeping them closed during the services. My venerable friend who sat next to him in his pew positively affirms the above. He goes on to say: "It is a great mistake to say that Stonewall Jackson ever went to sleep in church. With eyes closed, he was a most attentive listener. So deep was his attention that you could almost feel him listening." He gave me further information of Jackson's life at Lexington.

When Jackson was elected Professor at Lexington, he came fresh from the army. I am told he was deeply impressed with the lack of discipline. He remarked to the noble General Francis Smith, Superintendent: "There must be discipline." There was violent opposition from the Corps of Cadets at the new order. Jackson carried his point, though it involved the severe punishment of an upper classman, and strenuous efforts on the part of the Trustees to force Jackson to resign.

It is difficult to recognize the Southern Boanerges in the quiet Professor of those peaceful and uneventful days. The hour had not struck when the latent potentialities for war, slumbering in the great master of arms, should be unchained.

VITAL

Missionary Work of the Church at home and abroad in 1930 is threatened with reductions amounting to $250,000 because estimated revenues, based on promises from the Dioceses, failed to meet actual maintenance needs by that amount. This is the situation which will confront the National Council when it convenes on February twelfth next, unless aggressive measures, now being directed by the Presiding Bishop, succeed in their purpose, secure additional pledges and thus prevent the sacrifice of vital work.

A formal statement, issued by the Presiding Bishop, in the name of the National Council, appears as a full page advertisement in this issue of the Southern Churchman. The statement suggests that this real crisis can be avoided only by generous gifts from individuals over and above their usual contributions to the parish quota and ask that these gifts be sent to the Bishops of the dioceses, and be reported by them to the Council before February twelfth. The Council itself is helpless in the matter because of the action of the General Convention of 1925. ordering the National Council not to spend any more money than its expected income in any one year. To prevent reductions amounting as indicated in the statement to a quarter of a million dollars, the Diocese must give definite assurance within the period named of payments in excess of their present estimates of missionary giving by them for work to be done in 1930.

In an official statement Bishop Anderson says:

"The general missionary work of the Church is splendidly successful. The prayers and offerings of our people and the devoted labors of the missionary Bishops and all their workers have resulted in more candidates for the Ministry in the Mission fields, more children coming to our schools for Christian education, and more encouragement in every direction. But unless we can secure for 1930 about $250,000 more than is at present in sight, we must reduce appropriations made necesary by the success of the work.

"I have just had a talk with Bishop Creighton, of Mexico, who is almost panic-stricken at the very thought of cutting and chilling the work. What it would mean to him, it would mean to thirty-four other Missionary Bishops. I cannot believe that if the devoted, intelligent laymen of the Church knew the situation they would approve of the fatal policy of dealing such a blow to the work."

Dr. Lewis B. Franklin, Treasurer of the National Council, in a statement, stresses the significant fact that the people of the Church are not giving less now than heretofore to the missionary cause, and finds an explanation of current difficulties in the penalty of increased expenditures imposed by our success.

Dr. Franklin says: "The income of our National Council for the last four years, when compared with expected income for 1930, shows little variation. Some loss in payments on General Church quotas from the high record reached in 1926 is made up by increases in other income. The difficulty is that our work has succeeded and therefore has grown. The 1930 Budget, as approved by General Convention, is actually less than that approved for 1923, and yet during this interval there has been constant growth in almost every mission field. As an example the number of native clergy in China has increased from eighty-four to 114, and the native workers in Brazil, clergy and lay, from twenty-one to thirty-four. During this period a Bishop has been consecrated for Haiti, and he now has the assistance of five American missionaries in addition to some twenty native workers. Seven years ago there was only one American missionary in Haiti, an increase which necessarily affects the missionary Budget.

"In school work, including the training of candidates for the Ministry, the record shows the same steady growth here, that is to say success in this field of missionary activity has brought about an increase in the annual appropriations from $19.360 to $31,945. The work of the American Church Institute for Negroes in its nine schools has shown steady enlargement, necessitating an increase in its appropriation from $130,000. allowed by the National Council in 1923, to $195,000 in 1930.

These increased needs have been cared for by a reduction in appropriations for work outside the mission field but there is today no room for further reduction without sacrifice of vital work."

LINES FROM AN OLD MORAVIAN HYMN-BOOK.

"But art Thou come, dear Saviour? Hath Thy love
Thus made Thee stoop, and leave Thy throne above
The lofty heavens, and thus Thyself to dress
In dust, to visit mortals? Could no less
A condescension serve? And after all
The mean reception of a cratch and stall?
Dear Lord, I'll fetch Thee hence! I have a room
('Tis poor, but 'tis my best), if Thou wilt come
Within so small a cell, where I would fain
Mine and the world's Redeemer entertain;
I mean, my heart; 'tis sluttish, I confess,
And will not mend Thy lodging, Lord, unless Thou send before Thy harbinger; I mean
Thy pure and purging Grace, to make it clean
And sweep its nasty corners; then I'll try
To wash it also with a weeping eye.
And when 'tis swept and wash'd, I then will go
And with Thy leave, I'll fetch some flowers that grow
In Thine own garden, Faith and Love to Thee:
With these I'll dress it up, and these shall be
With rosemary and bays. But when my best
Is done, the room's not fit for such a Guest.
But here's the cure; Thy Presence, Lord, alone
Will make a stall a Court, a cratch a Throne."

"Take my life and let it be Consecrated Lord to Thee.
"Take my heart, it is Thine own,
It shall be Thy royal throne.
"Take my will and make it Thine,
It shall be no longer mine."

When this is done we can respond to the Church Program and say, in her words:

"Take my silver and my gold,
Not a mite would I withhold."

JESUS AND THE CHILDREN. By Ethel L. Smither. Price $1.00.

FIRST BIBLE STORIES. By Jessie Eleanor Moore. Price $1.00. Thomas Nelson and Sons. New York.

These two books are in a series called the American Standard Bible Readers Series. The are written by members of the Editorial Staff of Children's Publications of the Methodist Episcopal Church. They help to give one an insight into the reason for the dearth of real Bible knowledge among the young at the present time. They are the old favorites taken from the Bible arranged for children with plentiful illustrations. The illustrations will prove valuable but the stories have been so clothed with a mass of inconsequential details that the chaste beauty of the originals has been entirely obliterated. It is as if one were to stop in the middle of the combat between David and Goliath to discuss the twist of David's curls. The elder Apocryphal Gospels catered to the hankering for the marvelous of the time by adding puerile miracles, these go to the opposite extreme, but neither add anything of value to the simple dignity of the Bible.

EXPLORING THE BIBLE: A Study of Background and Principles: By Frank E. Gaebelein, Headmaster of the Stony Brook School. Cloth. Pp. 195, with Appendix of Questions on the Text and Index. Published by Harper & Brothers, New York. Price, $1.50.

The author of this splendid book, as the Headmaster of one of the outstanding college preparatory schools of the country, has had long experience with the problem of making the Bible and its great message really appeal to the mind and heart of the adolescent and become the foundation of character and life work. He seems to us to have come more nearly solving this difficult problem for our generation than any other writer on the subject we have seen. He has just that open-minded, frank appreciation of the assured results of modern scientific knowledge, together with an undogmatic, reverent conservation of the Scriptures as they have been the inspiration and guide of the ages, that will best fortify the faith of youth against the obscurantist and the rationalist as well.

We appeal to the Headmasters of all our Church Schools to get the book and examine it with a view to its introduction, under the most competent instructor available, into the class room of say the fourth or fifth forms of college preparatory work. We appeal to them to digest personally the Preface, in which the author gives an impressive survey of the present neglect and compelling need of reclaiming the Bible as the foundation of our educational system. We wish that certain passages in his "Confessio fidei" as to the challenge of the educational situation and what can and should be done to meet it, should be, as it were like Luther's Theses, nailed to the doors of every educational institution in the land, and most particularly to those of our own Church Schools:

"The chief sin of American education is a sin of omission. . . . The Bible is practically excluded from our national education. . . . Public educators look askance at a book that is liable to raise the taboo issue of religion within the halls of public education. Independent educators—the heads of private schools and colleges—either fear to offend the various creeds represented by their students or are bound by the even greater terror of being thought old-fashioned and illiberal as still to believe in the Bible. Indeed, modern liberalism is just as stringent in its demands as the old orthodoxy. And what thoughtful observer of our educational and social life can deny that "renaissance paganism" is today a force in school and society. . . . The Bible is the one indispensable study which the individual Christian must by the command of his Lord pursue. Consequently no system of education, more specifically no school or college, that does not accord the Bible adequate representation, can rightly claim the designation of Christian. . . . The Stony Brook School has courageously given to the study of the English Bible an honored place as a subject required for three recitations a week throughout the entire secondary course. (Emphasis ours.) Would to God that all of our own Church Schools would rise to the same courage, where now they halt at one recitation, or at two, a week, and the student body often realize that the real stress of education is being devoted to other subjects—required for college entrance. Ed.) . . . Academic standards have not suffered. The School has met the tests of regional accrediting agencies. Graduates have entered college and have proved, by the quality of their work, the calibre of their preparation. So much for the fear, often expressed by cautious schoolmasters, that college requirements will not permit expenditure of time for Bible study! That the Stony Brook School has done much and more and has maintained a Christian atmosphere functioning vitally and reciprocally through faculty and student body is beyond the province of these pages."

DIFFICULTIES IN THE WAY OF AN INCREASE OF THE MINISTRY.

Mr. Editor:

At page 14 of your issue of September 21, 1929, there is an interesting account of a resolution adopted by the Commission of the Ministry. Its purpose was to call attention to the pressing necessity that more young men of promise should offer themselves for the ministry of our Church. A portion of the resolution runs thus:

> "That every means of writing and speaking be used by this Commission and others concerned to arouse the entire Church to a sense of its serious shortage of suitable men for meeting its present opportunity."

The writer of this letter is thoroughly persuaded of the existence of such a shortage; he has served on the vestries of two parishes in different states, and has twice been a member of a committee for finding a suitable clergyman for rector of a parish. The experience was enlightening without being inspiring. He is anxious, therefore, to try to indicate how this problem of increasing the number, and improving the quality, of our clergy, appeals to one who is a lawyer and man of business.

Let me come directly to the point: Before we can expect high-minded and spiritual youths to offer themselves for the service of God as clergymen of our Church, it is essential that both the popular and the ecclesiastical conception of the duties, the standing, and the divine call of a clergyman, should be immensely raised. Personally, I do not wonder that earnest lads and young men hesitate to come forward, if they judge the office by the estimate which church members themselves evidently make of it. Let us try to put ourselves in the place of such a youth. He naturally finds his inspiration to enter the ministry from reading of the life and character of Him who was the Alpha and Omega, the First and the Last, our Lord Jesus Christ, the Almighty. He follows up such reading by a study of the lives of the Apostles, particularly of such outstanding and commanding figures as St. Paul, St. Peter and St. John. He reads of our Lord's never-to-be-forgotten mandate to the eleven on the mountain in Galilee, to go into all the world and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost, and teaching them to observe all things whatsoever He had said unto them. He reads St. Paul's tremendous assertion, "Woe is unto me if I preach not the Gospel." He reads of the Apostles' glorious company that went forth over land and sea; the very call of God seems to enter his heart.

Then he turns to look at the actual conditions in our Church. What does he see? An unlovely and uninspiring picture, namely: that when he becomes a rector, he will be expected to divide his time and strength between such things as the following: (1) The raising of money, so that his parish may pay its quota and make good its budget, or may build some new and costly church edifice; (2) the attending innumerable meetings of committees and societies and boards and conventions, and gatherings of young people and elderly people, where one of the principal pieces of business is that of eating and drinking, and where it is demanded of the clergyman, above all things, that he be what is known as "a good mixer." Over and above all this, he will see that the actual saving of souls and of inspiring those who are saved to go forward into the greater things of life, is shoved very much into the background. With a very little study of our new Prayer Book, he cannot help perceiving that our General Convention has given every encouragement to spending as little time as possible in the services of the church, in prayer, in listening to God's Holy Word. He will wonder why it is that a clergyman can commence the Sunday service with the words, "I was glad when they said unto me, we will go into the House of the Lord," and will then so reduce the reading of the psalter that it consumes scarcely more than a minute and a quarter. Perhaps he will see that many clergymen seize the opportunity (granted for the first time by the new Prayer Book) to omit the reading of one of the lessons at Evening Prayer, and to read just as few prayers as possible. He will wonder why there is so often a studied attempt to belittle that service which one of our Bishops has called the Church's "Missionary Service," namely: Morning Prayer. This service appeals to all persons, both those already within the church, and those who are without its membership, for it is the service which is meant to reach all sorts and conditions of men. It calls for a larger reading of Scripture than the Communion Office, and it places before the congregation things which the Communion Office, with all its beauty, does not pretend to set forth, such as the psalms, and the Old Testament prophecies and stories, so deep and inspiring and so wonderfully interesting. If it be true, as the psalmist says, "When thy word goeth forth, it giveth light and understanding unto the simple," why does it come to pass that it is becoming increasingly fashionable to shove Morning Prayer aside, especially on notable occasions and great days, such as the First Sunday in Advent, Christmas, Epiphany, Easter, Whitsunday, and Ascension Day, and the like? The Communion Office, glorious as it is, shows by its very composition and its own statements and rubrics, that it is designed for those who are already members of the Church, and who have solemnly accepted the duties and responsibilities of adults that are assumed at confirmation. Morning and Evening Prayer were introduced at the Reformation for the very purpose of laying before the people a greater portion of God's inspiring Word.

No youth who thinks long or deeply can fail to see that something very like a spiritual dry rot has come over our Church within the last twenty-five years or more. Preaching has sunk to a pitiably low ebb, and yet it is second to nothing in importance, if the cause of Jesus Christ is to win a lost world. The things that our Lord treated as of supreme importance are the things to which the Church at this time is giving relatively little heed. As a Church, we are largely taken up with the cares and riches and pleasures of this life, and are bringing little or no fruit to perfection. We are deeply concerned with questions of organization, with national councils and provinces and committees, with raising money for large and expensive cathedrals, and with supplying fine music. We lay relatively little emphasis on prayer, on the hearing of God's Word, on the preaching of the Gospel; we say little of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment, the three things which our Lord told His Apostles that the Holy Spirit should convince the world of.

If it be asked, why does not a right-minded youth determine to enter the ministry and attack such worldly conditions and practices, and seek to restore the higher life intended by our Lord, the answer is this: First, only a man of unusual and unbending courage is in a hurry to undertake the task of combatting the huge and overwhelming prestige of the clerical organization of our Church, the great mass of Bishops, Priests and Deacons, supported in large part by a worldly and careless laity. Such a man requires the call of a Luther or a Knox, an Elijah or a St. Paul. Few men have the courage for such a task. God grant that the courage and the call may come to many of our youths in the near future. Secondly, the conditions that we have sketched thus hastily, where the really important work of the Lord is moving along upon chariot-wheels that turn so very heavily, are enough to make many a man turn away and try to find his life's work in some side line, or in some other communion, or to say to himself in disgust, "Can these dry bones live?"

There are other serious difficulties, but I must not try to talk of them now. I have consumed more space than I like, as it is. May we all pray for an outpouring of the Spirit upon our beloved Protestant Episcopal Church, so that the arm of the Lord may awaken as in the olden time. I am sure such an outpouring will come some day; let us hasten it by all the power God has given us.

William Allmand Robertson.

ENCOURAGEMENT.

Mr. Editor:

When I renewed my subscription last week, I was too busy to say how deeply I respect your courage and fearlessness, and how much solid good and comfort our family gets from the Southern Churchman ever since you became editor. You are running it on a level it never before attained, in my life time.

Dean Ablewhite Elected Bishop.

The Very Rev. Hayward S. Ablewhite, dean of St. Paul's Cathedral, Marquette, Michigan, was elected Bishop of the Diocese of Marquette at a special meeting of the Convention of Marquette held in Grace Church, Ishpening on December 17, 1930. The bishop-elect, whose consecration is expected to take place in Marquette about a month hence, is forty-two years old, and has been dean of St. Paul's Cathedral since 1928. He will be the third bishop of the Diocese of Marquette, succeeding the Rt. Rev. Robert L. Harris, D. D., who resigned recently because of poor health.

St. James, Atlantic City, Has Memorials to Bishop Murray.

Lanterns in memory of Bishop Murray have been hung in the nave of St. James' Church, Atlantic City, N. J., where the Bishop's sudden death occurred on October 3, 1929. A silver cross has been placed on the concrete floor of the chancel, with an inscription reading:

> Here the soul of John Gardner Murray, D. D., Bishop of Maryland, Presiding Bishop of the Church, was quickly called into the nearer presence of God on Thursday, October 3, 1929, and on this spot his body lay before the altar of God and in the midst of his brethren.

A bronze tablet bears the following inscription:

> The Lanterns in the nave are in grateful and loving memory of the Rt. Rev. John Gardner Murray, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese of Maryland, Presiding Bishop of the Church.
> On October 3, 1929, at the altar of this church the Presiding Bishop celebrated the Holy Communion for the last time. Three hours later, in the same church, while presiding over a council, of his brethren gathered to choose others for the apostolic office, John Gardner Murray, who walked with God, "was not: for God took him."
> Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth:
> Yea, saith the spirit, that they may rest from their labours:
> And their works do follow them (Revelation 14:13).

Both inscriptions were written by Bishop Matthews.

Bishop of Southern Virginia Diocese Dies in Norfolk.

The Right Rev. Beverley Dandridge Tucker, D. D., Bishop of Southern Virginia and one of the most prominent Churchmen in this country died at 11:05 P. M. Friday, January 17, in the Sarah Leigh Hospital, Norfolk, Virginia. Bishop Tucker's death was the result of an illness following a fall sustained by him November 1, on the front steps of his home in Norfolk.

Funeral services were held Monday afternoon at old St. Paul's Church, Norfolk, of which Bishop Tucker was for many years the rector. Burial took place at Charlestown, West Virginia, where Bishop Tucker's late wife, Mrs. Maria Washington Tucker, was buried.

The Norfolk "Virginian-Pilot" said:

"Bishop Tucker numbered his personal friends by the thousands, and through his works of kindness and charity, he came to be known as 'the beloved bishop,' by persons of whatever congregation.

"Among his kindly tendencies was a habit, formed when he first entered the ministry, of calling upon households visited by trouble, sickness, or death, no matter what denomination they presented. His gentle presence comforted many a desolate home and during his long years as a rector it was said of him that he was always the first to reach the home of those in sorrow.

"For twelve years, from 1906 to 1918, Bishop Tucker made his home at Lynchburg, where he speedily became as beloved as he was here during his tenure as rector of Old St. Paul's. An example of his unaffected kindliness and hospitality became apparent during his years at Lynchburg when each Sunday, around his family board, would be gathered some of the boys from the Virginia Episcopal School, situated a few miles from the city.

"It did not matter to Bishop Tucker whether he knew the boys. His son, Ellis, now at St. John's, Shanghai, China, and then an instructor of mathmatics at the Virginia Episcopal School, would simply extend a general invitation and all of the youngsters who could get away would take Sunday dinner at the bishop's table. In fact, they would visit the bishopric, or as it was more generally known, "Bishop Tucker's house,' on every occasion that 'town leave' was granted. On Monday, the weekly holiday, the bishop was sure to receive many young visitors.

"His hospitality never failed. He received prelate and preparatory school youngster with the same cordial welcome and the 'stranger within the gates' was no longer a stranger when he passed the portals of Bishop Tucker's home. Much of the charm of the home was due to Mrs. Tucker, as remarkable a woman as he was a man. Many a homesick boy sobbed out his woes to her and her gentle voice and tender fingers tided scores of lads over the doleful period when to leave school and go home seemed all that life was worth living for."

The Norfolk paper also recalled an unique ceremony when Bishop Tucker's youngest son, Francis Bland Tucker, now rector of St. John's, Georgetown, D. C., was ordained. Bishop Tucker conducted the ordination services and in the chancel with him were his other clergymen sons, including the Rt. Rev. H. St. George Tucker.

The Richmond "News Leader" said:

"By all who had the privilege of claiming Bishop Tucker as a relative or a friend, his death was today keenly regretted, as that of a man who was not only a notable Churchman and a rare scholar, but one who in his whole bearing charmingly exemplified the finest traits of the Virginians of an older day.

"By virtue of his years and his attainments Bishop Tucker, at the time of his death, was the ranking member of one of the most distinguished families in the history of the state. Each generation of his family, from the earliest period of the commonwealth, had contributed conspicuous leaders in various fields of service, but none of them was more honored and beloved by Virginia people than this venerable bishop and man of learning who has now fallen asleep.

"Bishop Tucker was a great grandson of St. George Tucker, who was a colonel of Virginia militia in the War of the Revolution and was also professor of law at the College of William and Mary, and a member of the Court of Appeals. He was a grandson of Judge Henry St. George Tucker, President of the Court of Appeals of Virginia.

"Among the several prominent sons of Judge Henry St. George Tucker and Mrs. Ann Hunter Tucker, was the late Nathaniel Beverley Tucker, who was the father of Bishop Tucker, and who is recalled by many of the older citizens of Richmond as a man of brilliant wit and charming social gifts. Nathanie Beverley Tucker died in Richmond in 1890, after a notable career as an editor and a diplomat in the service of the Confederate States Government.

"Bishop Tucker was a native of Richmond, and this city claimed him as one of her most distinguished sons. His father was the late Nathaniel Beverley Tucker, and his mother was Jane Shelton Ellis, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Ellis, of Richmond.

"Bishop Beverley Dandridge Tucker was born here, November 9, 1846, at the old home of his Ellis grandparents, which stood for many years at the southwest corner of Franklin and Second Streets and was one of the notable homes and landmarks of the city during the greater part of the last century. Edgar Allan Poe as a boy had been a frequent guest in this old home and the old garden of Mr. and Mrs. Ellis, on the opposite side of the street, was Poe's 'enchanted garden'.

"Bishop Tucker, as a youth, was educated in England during the period when his father was United States consul at Liverpool, in the fifties, and he also attended a well-known school at Vevey, Switzerland. In the latter institution he acquired a perfect knowledge of the French language, which he continued to speak with beauty and precision all his life. His later education, just after the close of the War Between the States, in which conflict he had taken an honorable part as a member of the Otey Battery, was received at the University of Toronto, Canada."

Bishop Tucker was fifteen years old at the outbreak of the War Between the States. In 1864 the young man enlisted in the Confederate Army and served with distinction in engagements around Richmond, being with General Lee's Army at the surrender of Appomattox. General Lee was a close friend of the family, and took a personal interest in the youthful soldier, who was one day to become one of the most distinguished Churchmen in the State.

"After the close of the war and his return to Virginia from Canada he determined to enter the ministry of the Episcopal Church and with this purpose in view he became a student at the Theological Seminary at Alexandria, from which he graduated in 1873.

"He was married, July 22, 1873, to Miss Anna Maria Washington, a daughter of Colonel John Augustine Washington, C. S. A., of Mount Vernon. Colonel Washington was of the illustrious Washington family of Virginia, and was the last member of that family to own and reside at the noted estate on the Potomac. From him Mount Vernon passed into the reverent custody of the Mount Vernon Association and became the outstanding historical shrine of the American people. Mrs. Maria Washington Tucker, Bishop Tucker's devoted wife, died at her home in Norfolk a few years ago.

"Ordained to the diaconate in 1873, and to the priesthood in 1875, Bishop Tucker's first parish in Virginia was that of Farnham and Lunenburg, in Richmond County, where he continued to serve until 1882, when he went to Norfolk to become the rector of old St. Paul's Church, in that city. He continued in Norfolk, as rector of St. Paul's, until he was consecrated, October 3, 1906, as bishop-coadjutor of the Diocese of Southern Virginia, of which diocese the late Rt. Rev. A. M. Randolph, D. D., was then bishop.

"Upon the death of Bishop Randolph, in the spring of 1918, Bishop Tucker became the bishop of the diocese, which he continued to serve with unremitting zeal until his recent illness, which resulted from the fall sustained by him at his Norfolk home, Stockley Gardens.

"No recital of Bishop Tucker's notable services to his denomination and to the whole cause of religious work would be complete without recalling his vital interest in missionary work; his fatherly devotion to both clergy and people of Virginia of every faith; and his special efforts to further the welfare of the Negro people of his diocese.

"Since the death of Bishop Randolph, Bishop Tucker had served as the President of the Board of Trustees of the Bishop Payne Divinity School which was established some fifty years ago for the purpose of training Negro men for the ministry. Also within the bounds of Bishop Tucker's diocese was the St. Paul's Normal and Industrial School, at Lawrenceville, where a great and constructive work has long been carried on for the benefit of Negro youths.

"In 1919 the Diocese of Southwest Virginia was formed and thus the size of the Diocese of Southern Virginia was lessened to some extent in a geographical sense but the Southern Virginia diocese still contains some fifty organized parishes, together with several separate congregations representing about 13,000 communicants.

"Bishop Tucker was distinguished not only as a forceful preacher of the gospel, but as a gifted poet and writer and as a historian, and many of his addresses delivered on occasions of unusual significance throughout the state are recalled with pleasure by those who heard them delivered by him. No one who ever heard Bishop Tucker speak could readily forget the tones of his charmingly modulated voice that so happily gave expression to the culture and the sympathetic nature of the speaker. In reading the great hymns of the Church at large and the beautiful ritual of his own denomination Bishop Tucker's tone of voice was one of great softness and beauty that added to the effect of the words recited by him.

Bishop Tucker is survived by thirteen children, of whom nine are sons and four are daughters. His sons are: The Rt. Rev. H. St. George Tucker, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese of Virginia; the Rev. Beverley D. Tucker, Jr., D. D., rector of St. Paul's Church, this city; Augustine Washington Tucker, M. D., of Shanghai, China; John Randolph Tucker, attorney at law, Welsh, W. Va.; Richard Blackburn Tucker, of Pittsburgh, Pa.; the Rev. Herbert Nash Tucker, of Suffolk; Lawrence Fontaine Tucker, of Pittsburgh; Ellis Nimmo Tucker, of Shanghai, China and the Rev. Francis Bland Tucker, of Washington, D. C.

"Bishop Tucker's daughters are: Mrs. Winthrop Lee, of Concord, Mass.; Mrs. Luke M. White, of White Plains, N. J.; Miss Lila W. Tucker, of Norfolk, and Mrs. Malcolm Griffin, of Bedford County.

"Bishop Tucker is also survived by a brother, Charles Ellis Tucker, of Memphis, Tenn.

"Two other brothers of Bishop Tucker were the late James Ellis Tucker, of San Francisco, and the late John Randolph Tucker, of Richmond, who were well known here; and a sister was the late Miss Margaret N. Tucker, also affectionately recalled by the Richmond people of the older generations."

Romanists Praying For Us.

Arthur Brisbane says:

"It may comfort Protestants, Hebrews, Mohammedans, Confucians, and Buddhists to know that next (today) Saturday, 2,000,000 good Catholics will pray for their conversion to the Catholic faith.

"Following the recent important statement by the Pope to the effect that Protestants are turning toward the Catholic Church, Cardinal Hayes, of the New York Diocese, has instructed congregations in 444 churches under his control, to begin next Saturday an eight-day period of prayer, fasting and penance for the return of Anglicans and other Protestants, originally a part of the Catholic Church, into the Catholic fold, and that all others of whatever race or religion may embrace Catholicism.

"Increase in the number of converts to Catholicism will enable observers to form valuable estimates of the immediate effect of prayer on a great scale.

"The widespread effort at conversion should offend nobody. Conversions will not occur unless it is God's will that it should occur. And no one can object to that."

Wycliffe College Principal Passes On.

The Toronto "Globe" brings the sad news of the passing of one of Canada's greatest and noblest Churchmen.

The Rev. Thomas Robert O'Meara, D. D., LL. D., Principal of Wycliffe College, Toronto, died suddenly as the result of a heart attack, at his college residence. He was sixty-six years of age.

An editorial in the "Globe" reads:

"In the typical adventure of the last months of Principal O'Meara's life is the key to the whole career of a great teacher and leader in Christian life. At an age when almost every other man would have sought rest and repose, the veteran Principal of Wycliffe set out personally to visit every Wycliffe graduate serving as a missionary. His bodily strength proved unequal to the strain. His death yesterday was no doubt hastened by the pilgrimage.

"Yet it was exactly as that great man Thomas R. O'Meara would have wished. His whole heart was in his life-work, and the missionary spirit was the dynamo which drove a mighty human force.

"The Principal of Wycliffe was a staunch champion of those evangelical principles for which his institution was born. The impress of his touch was felt, not only in Canada, but through the missionaries sent forth to many lands."

On the long journey of the world tour, Dr. O'Meara seemed to overtax his strength and by the time he reached he was unable to carry out his original plan to visit all the stations there, although a reunion was arranged at a central point.

It was with keen disappointment that he returned to Toronto in poor health and unable to continue his duties, either as Principal of Wycliffe or to undertake any work in the interests of the Missionary Society of the Church of England in Canada.

In a Convocation address the Bishop of Mid-Japan made the statement that Wycliffe College was based upon two principles: Evangelicalism and Evangelism. In like manner it is asserted that so far as the human factor is concerned, the measure of growth and success to which the college has attained had been due to a large extent to the two Principals, Drs. Sheraton and O'Meara, who, throughout the fifty and more years of its history, had led in shaping its policies and guiding its destinies.

Dr. O'Meara during his active, consecrated life, besides being Principal of Wycliffe, filled many positions of major importance and was connected with numerous Church and other allied Christian organizations. Among them were the Church of England Deaconess and Missionary Training House, Havergal College, Ridley College, Upper Canada Bible Society. He was Canon of St. Alban's Cathedral, Toronto. Owing to ill health he refused the Bishopric of Caledonia in British Columbia.

One of the most interesting facts in relation to Dr. O'Meara's connection with Wycliffe itself, to which he was appointed Principal in 1906, is the fact that from May, 1887, the week after graduation from the college and three months before ordination, up to the time of his death he had been in continuous service with the college in financial, teaching or administrative work, in all, about forty-three years out of the fifty-two or three years of the college's history.

Canon H. J. Cody said: "His passing leaves a great gap in the work of his college, and in the general religious educational work of the Church of England."

Shirley Denison, K. C., member of the Board of Wycliffe, said: "He was the very life of the college. He was one of the best men I ever knew."

New Dean for DuBose.

The Rev. Albert Glenn Richards, D. D., has announced his acceptance of the office of Dean at the DuBose Training School, Monteagle, Tennessee, to which he was elected on November 21. Dr. Richards, a native of Maryland, is a graduate of Hobart and the General Theological Seminary, with a doctor's degree from the University of Georgia. For the past ten years he has been rector of Emmanuel Church, Athens, where the University of Georgia is located, many of whose faculty and students have been on his communicant list.

The Ven. W. F. Claiborne was elected active vice-president, which continues his work as field director and general executive of the school.

There have been a total of twenty-nine students enrolled during the past year, which closed December 19. The new library, a gift of Mrs. Alfred Pell, is under construction, and will probably be opened in June.

Bishop of Capetown Resigns.

An outburst of mingled grief, affection and pride has come from South Africa, caused by the resignation of William Marlborough Carter, Bishop of Capetown and Archbishop of the Province of South Africa. He has spent thirty-eight years in South Africa, loved by English, African and Dutch. Bishop Carey says that to have him go is like moving out from under the shadow of an oak.

Bishop Overs Accepts Rectorship in New York.

The Rt. Rev. Walter Henry Overs, S. T. D., retired Bishop of Liberia, has been elected rector of Grace Church, Hastings on Hudson, Diocese of New York, has accepted and expects to start work there on February 1. For the past year or two he has been assisting Bishop Ferris in Western New York.

Bishop Overs is of English birth. (A misprint in the usually invaluable Stowe's Directory would indicate that he was graduated from college at the age of eight.) He did missionary work in Nigeria before coming to this country. He was ordained deacon and priest in 1910, by Bishop Darlington, and after serving in New York and Pennsylvania for nine years, during which time he was deputy to the General Conventions of 1913, 1916 and 1919, he was consecrated Bishop for Liberia in 1919. Resigning in 1925 on account of ill health, he worked for three years under appointment of the National Council's Field Department. He is a Fellow of the Royal and the American Geographical Societies.

Pray.

At the meeting of the National Council and its Departments to be held in New York February 11-13, reports from the various dioceses of the amounts which may be expected from them on account of the quotas for 1930 will be in hand. If these reports indicate that less than the quotas assigned will be paid, the National Council will be obliged to cut work now in progress in order to balance the budget.

Will you not pray that this catastrophe may be averted.

Charles P. Anderson,
Presiding Bishop and President of the National Council.

Fifteenth Anniversary of Bishop Hulse's Consecration Observed.

The fifteenth anniversary of the consecration of the Rt. Rev. H. R. Hulse, D. D., second missionary bishop to Cuba, who was the first bishop to be consecrated in the Cathedral of Saint John the Divine, New York, was observed by a special service in Holy Trinity Cathedral, Havana, on Sunday, January 12. The Bishop delivered the anniversary sermon, in which he gave the important stages in the development of the work in Cuba. The following Tuesday a parish reception was given to the Bishop and Mrs. Hulse at the Episcopal Residence.

Members of the Cathedral Parish and many other friends came to the reception to extend to Bishop and Mrs. Hulse congratulations and best wishes.

Sale of Priceless Bible Fought by Polish Council.

A special cable to the Globe and the New York Times reports that a Gutenberg Bible, belonging to the Catholic Seminary at Peplin, a former Province of West Prussia, was sold on January 9 for $110,000 to an American. The Bible, which was the only one in Poland printed by Gutenberg, had been kept since the fifteenth century in the library of the Bernardine Monastery in Lubawa, and only recently moved to Peplin. It is said to be one of the only ten known to exist. The Council of Polish Bibliophiles has sent a protest to the Ministry of Education against the Bible's exportation, but it remains to be seen whether the government can cancel the sale.

A Centennial Pentecostal Celebration.

A Centennial Pentecostal Celebration of the nineteen hundredth anniversary of the Church is being held in Columbus, Ohio, January 19-26. It has been arranged under the auspices of the Ohio Council of Churches, which includes members of many denominations.

Four conventions are included in the celebration.

The Eleventh Annual Ohio Pastors' Convention, January 20-24.

The Third Annual Ohio Conference of Church Women, January 21-24.

The Second Annual Ohio Laymen's Convention, January 21-24.

The Ohio Young People's Convention, January 24-26.

"Christian Unity" is the central theme for all four conventions. In the addresses by world-famous religious leaders and in the various commissions or sectional meetings, present-day movements for organic union of denominations and for consolidation of local churches, together with other phases of Christian unity, will be effectively presented and thoroughly discussed.

Dr. Littell to be Consecrated in February.

The Presiding Bishop has taken Order for the Ordination and Consecration of the Reverend Samuel Harrington Littell, S. T. D., as Bishop-elect of the Missionary District of Honolulu, on Thursday, February 27, 1930, in St. Andrew's Cathedral, Honolulu, T. H. The Rt. Rev. Hugh Latimer Burleson, D. D., Bishop of South Dakota will be the consecrator, assisted by the Rt. Rev. John McKim, D. D., Bishop of North Tokyo, and the Rt. Rev. Henry Bond Restarick, D. D., Bishop.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. Albert S. Thomas, Bishop.

Woman's Auxiliary.

Mrs. Louis D. Simonds, of Charleston, was reelected president of the South Carolina Woman's Auxiliary to the National Council of the Protestant Episcopal Church at the close of the very successful and fruitful tenth annual convention, at Florence, January 7-8. Other officers reelected were: Mrs. W. S. Poyner, of Florence, secretary; Mrs. Marie Heyward, Charlestown, treasurer; Mrs. H. D. Bull, Georgetown, educational secretary. Mrs. J. H. Rast, of Charleston, was chosen secretary of supplies and Miss Minnie T. Hazard, Georgetown, Custodian of the United Thank Offering. Bishop Albert S. Thomas officiated at the consecration of the officers. The Right Rev. Edwin Penick, Bishop Coadjutor of North Carolina, made a brief, stirring address on "The Epiphany Story".

The Rev. W. S. Poyner, rector of the Florence Church, and Mrs. H. O. S. Jackson, president of the Florence Branch, made cordial addresses of welcome to the visitors, to which Mrs. Ernest Duval, of Cheraw, responded appropriately and happily. Dr. Homed W. Starr and Bishop Thomas addressed the convention, by invitation, and reports from various departments of the work were presented by Mrs. William Eggleston, Mrs. L. A. Prouty, Mrs. I. G. Ball and Mrs. E. E. Rembert. The report of Miss H. P. Jervey on the Year Book was especially interesting and informing.

Other addresses, on selected subjects, were by The Rev. H. D. Bull, Mrs. Claude Whaley, substituting for Mrs. W. J. Loaring Clark, of Tennessee, unavoidably prevented from attendance, Miss Jervey, Mrs. Schoolfield, the Rev. Conrad H. Goodwin. The convention accepted an invitation to have its next meeting in St. Michael's Church, Charleston.

At the annual meeting of the Chancel Guild, of Grace Church, Charleston, S. C., Mrs. William Gaillard was reelected president; Mrs. William Way, vice-president; Mrs. P. G. Robertson, treasurer; Mrs. Henry O. Strohecvker, secretary.

Good Financial Report.

Encouraging reports on the financial condition and outlook of the Diocese of South Carolina were given by W. A Boykin, chairman of the department, at the first meeting for this year of the Executive Committee, Bishop Thomas presiding. Collections by the Diocese from the parishes in 1929 amounted to $40,000 and it is confidently predicted that this will be substantially increased this year.

Although the Council reduced the amount of the Diocesan Budget for the coming year, the pledge to the National Council of the Church was increased from $8,000 to $10,000. In 1929 the contribution to the national body was $9,600, or $1,600 more than the sum pledged. Therefore the pledge was increased to $10,000 by unanimous vote. Those attending the meeting were: The Right Rev. Albert S. Thomas, the Rev. F. W. Ambler, dean of Charleston Convocation; the Rev. S. Cary Beckwith, chairman publicity; the Rev. H. D. Bull, Georgetown, chairman, department of missions; the Rev. Edgar C. Brunz, Orangeburg; Walter Hazard, Georgetown; E. E. Lengnick, Beaufort; Miss Emma C. McCabe; F. K. Myers, treasurer; Mrs. G. T. Patton, Darlington; the Rev. O. T. Porcher, Bennettsville, dean, Peedee Convocation; the Rev. W. B. Sams, Mt. Pleasant, secretary of the diocese; the Rev. H. W. Starr, Ph. D., chairman, department of Religious Education; W. Ancrum Boykin, chairman, Finance Department, and H. L. Tilghman, Marion; O. T. Waring, chairman, Field Department, and J. D. Lee, Sumter.

FLORIDA.

Rt. Rev. Frank A. Juhan, D. D., Bishop

Preparations for Council and Many Meetings.

The Diocese of Florida is making her preparation for the Eighty-seventh Annual Council and its co-incidental meetings—a Clergy Conference, the twenty-second Annual Assembly of the Daughters of the King and the Fortieth Annual Meeting of the Diocesan Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary to the National Council.

The Clergy Conference will take place in St. John's Parish, the Rev. Newton Middleton, rector, January 22. For this conference Bishop Juhan is most fortunate in having secured the Rev. Samuel M. Shoemaker, Jr., rector of Calvary Church, New York, and some of his associates. All the Clergy of Florida will be in Jacksonville for this event. Needless to say, the topic to be dwelt upon is Evangelism. The day will be closed by a mass meeting for the clergy and laymen.

On this same day also the Daughters of The King will assemble in their annual session. Their meetings will be held in the Church of the Good Shepherd, the Rev. Charles A. Asby, rector. Mrs. G. Hendree Harrison, of Pensacola, the President of the organization, will be the presiding officer.

January 23, at 10 A. M., in the Church of the Good Shepherd, the Annual Council of the Diocese and the Women's Auxiliary will open their sessions with a celebration of the Holy Communion, the Bishop of the Diocese being the celebrant as well as the preacher. The sessions of these two bodies will continue through the twenty-fourth. The Rev. Mr. Shoemaker wil laddress the two convocations, as well as the churchmen of the city, at a mass meeting on the night of the twenty-third. This meeting will also be held in the Church of the Good Shepherd.

In the absence of Miss Margaret G. Weed, the President of the Florida Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary, Mrs. J. D. Russell, the First Vice-President, will preside over the sessions. Several speakers of note will be present with the Auxiliary gatherings: Mrs. James R. Cain, the President of the Woman's Auxiliary in the Province of Sewanee, as well as the President of the Upper South Carolina Auxiliary, will be the guest of honor. She will make two addresses to the women. One on the Advance Work Program of the National Council and one on the Provincial Auxiliary Program. Accompanying Mrs. Cain will be Mrs. Joseph E. Hart, also of Upper South Carolina, who will speak during the Conference on Life Work. Mrs. Hart has had much experience with this work and is well qualified to present it to the women of Florida. The third speaker will be Miss Florence Drinker, a missionary, serving under the United Thank Offering, in the Black Mountain region of North Carolina. Miss Drinker's work is well known in Florida and many Auxiliary women who have shared her work through sending boxes of clothing and supplies to her mission station, will be most happy to meet her face to face.

Bishop Weller Preaches in Jacksonville.

On Sunday, January 12, St. John's Church, Jacksonville, the Rev. Newton Middleton, rector, was most fortunate in having as its preacher at the 11 o'clock service, the Rt. Rev. Reginald Heber Weller, D. D., LL.D., Bishop of Fond du Lac, Wisconsin. Bishop Weller is a son of St. John's, his father, the Rev. Reginald Heber Weller, having been rector of the Parish from the years 1869 to 1888. It was from this Parish that Bishop Weller entered the ministry and St. John's is very proud to claim him and very grateful when he visits Jacksonville and brings one of his powerful messages to her pulpit.

Bishop Weller preached on the text, "Behold your King". He dwelt on the inherent Kingship of Jesus, a kingship over the moral world, and on the real characteristics of His life among men.

During the holiday season Florida's Candidates and Postulants for Holy Orders, Eldred Simkins and Alfred Matthews, while at home from the University of the South, made themselves useful by taking charge of the services at the Church of our Saviour, Mandarin, and the Chapel of St. Paul's by the Sea, Jacksonville Beach, both points being without a minister in charge at the present time. Recently Mr. O. C. Rauchenberg, a lay reader of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Jacksonville, held the service at Mandarin and Mrs. William P. Cornell, the Executive Secretary of the Diocese, made an address on the Program of the Church.

Due to the indefatigable efforts and enthusiasm of the women of St. Luke's Church, Live Oak, the Rev. Carroll L. Bates, rector, and to the generosity of many interested members of the congregation, the Church and Rectory building have recently been repainted and a splendid recreation hall added to the Church plant. A complete bowling alley has been donated and placed in the hall and this is providing a great source of pleasure to the young people of the congregation.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev A. Thomson, D. D., Bishop.

The One Hundredth Anniversary of the Consecration of Trinity Church.

On January 10, 1830, this old church was consecrated by the Rt. Rev. Dr. Richard Moore, second Bishop of Virginia, the whole state being one diocese, including West Virginia, in those days. Built in 1762; rebuilt in 1829, and a goodly portion of the original structure remains; consecrated in 1830; enlarged in 1893, are the principle dates. January 12 was chosen, being the Sunday nearest the exact anniversary to commemorate the consecration. Two of the former rectors were in the chancel, Bishop A. C. Thomson of this diocese, and the Rev. Newton Middleton, now at St. John's, Jacksonville, Fla. Regrets were sent by Bishop Reese of Georgia, also a former rector. The present rector, the Rev. Charles H. Holmead, had the Early Celebration of the Holy Communion with Bishop Thomson present in the chancel, and the Bishop delivered the historical sermon at 11 A. M. The day closed with a beautifully rendered Evensong of Thanksgiving at night.

MARYLAND.

Rt. Rev. E. T. Helfenstein, D. D., Bishop.

The Bishop's Guild.

The Bishop's Guild held their annual Memorial Service on Friday, January 3, in the Bishop's Chapel at the Diocesan House. Bishop Helfenstein celebrated the Holy Communion to about fifty members of the Guild.

This service was especially in memory of Bishop Murray, whom the Guild had loyally supported during his Episcopate.

The object of the Guild is to raise money for the Bishop to use in the education of young men for the ministry. Each year their budget is made up and each year they go "over the top". It was their pleasure to turn over a check for $1,500 to Bishop Helfenstein which accounts materially for their splendid efforts during 1929.

The Churchman's Club.

"Reciprocity between Christian Religion and Civilization with whom it comes in contact," was the subject of Bishop Anderson's address to the Churchman's Club of the Diocese of Maryland.

The meeting was held at the Emerson Hotel, Baltimore, on Wednesday, January 15, at 6:45 P. M. About four hundred men were present.

Besides Bishop Anderson's address the Club also enjoyed Canon C. E. Riley's talk on the "Problems of the Canadian Church".

Everyone missed the presence of Bishop Murray, but Bishop Helfenstein, accompanied by the President, Mr. Edward Guest Gibson, carried out the usual custom of going from table to table and shaking hands personally with each man present.

This occasion marked Bishop Anderson's first official visit to the Diocese of Maryland since his election as Pre-

COLLECT FOR THIRD SUNDAY AFTER THE EPIPHANY.

Almighty and everlasting God, mercifully look upon our infirmities, and in all our dangers and necessities stretch forth Thy right hand to help and defend us, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

COLLECT FOR ST. PAUL'S DAY.

O God, Who, through the preaching of the blessed Apostle St. Paul, hast caused the light of the gospel to shine throughout the world, Grant, we beseech Thee, that we, having his wonderful conversion in remembrance, may show forth our thankfulness unto Thee for the same, by following the holy doctrine which he taught; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

PAUL.

William Olney.

He was blinded by tradition,
  Which from childhood he was taught;
And the prejudice he nourished
  A still deeper darkness wrought.
But the journey to Damascus
  Cleared the shadows of the night;
And Christ's glorious revelation
  Put his ignorance to flight.

Then his knowledge of the Scriptures
  Came to help the new-born faith;
And the grace which showed the Saviour
  Was confirmed by what God saith:
So no college training needed,
  With the Word in heart and hand,
He not only preached the Gospel—
  But opposers could withstand.

In the quiet of Arabia
  He found spiritual light,
On the Holy Spirit's teaching
  Made God's saving purpose bright.
Then began the many journeys
  Through the world so far as known
And the preaching of the Gospel—
  The "good seed" amongst men sown.

O thou glorious apostle!
  May thy work and thy success
Teach ambassadors for Jesus
  How they, too, the world may bless!
Not philosophy nor logic,
  But Paul's motto: "Christ is all,"
Will destroy the modern idols
  And cause doubt and self to fall.

The Universal Prayer.

When ye pray, say, "Our Father" (Luke 11:2).

Suppose that we had never heard this bidding, how eagerly we should look for what would follow! For the greatest of spiritual teachers—He of whom plain men in His own time, sent to arrest Him, came back empty-handed, babbling, "Never man spake like this man." He in whom from then till now, and not least now, people of every sort, differing otherwise, have united to recognize the most spiritual and divine of human teachers—He is to speak on the highest and most distinctive, the hardest, yet the most universal, of human utterances; one towards which the stresses of experience, simple and daily, or crucial and tremendous, drive human hearts. He is to speak first to the little company, but sooner or later to an audience of the most varied kind: among them some such as pray best, but know best how hard it is to pray. Some who want to pray but have no notion how to do it; some children perhaps who love to be taught and encouraged to pray, and whose own praying is often so original and plastic; but indeed some of all sorts who, having some little turn or training in an art, know enough of it to appreciate the performance of commanding genius or exquisitely perfect skill. What will they hear? What will He say? How will He teach? For His reply must have a meaning for all sorts. The words that follow give the answer: "Say, Our Father" and the rest. It is not a disquisition, or, as we should say, a lecture, on prayer. A thing of that sort would be easier because it is abstract, and abstract teaching is easier to give because it allows the speaker more room to be vague. The answer of Jesus is of another sort; harder for the Giver, easier for the hearers, because though they understand it very little at first they can begin anywhere and grow with the understanding of it.

This is the method of this masterpiece. I would ask you to notice two things about it. One is the very simple observation that it has answered, or succeeded. Given as a prayer, it has been used as a prayer: not as a manual of teaching, however effective and concise, but as a prayer. It has, indeed, been abundantly commented on, explained and taught, but more by far than these, it has been prayed, and so its prayer-value has passed into the hearts and tempers of those whom it has taught by the best methods, the method of use.

The other observation is a little less obvious. It is that the prayer, though it is—and we may reverently say was meant to be—a prayer for all and always, had when He spoke it a special value and meaning for the moment—although one which it was never to lose. This value was that it was to be the special prayer given by the Master to His disciples. Notice the request as such to which it was the reply: "Master, teach us to pray as John also taught his disciples." That was the precedent in their minds. John gave those disciples of his a prayer, and no doubt they felt it had helped them. May not we, they felt, Thy disciples, have our prayer too, and a better one, since our Master, as John himself tells us, is so much the greater? It was to be the prayer of the "little flock" whom the Good Shepherd was getting about Him: and getting about Him with a purpose other than, and beyond, the good or the feeding of themselves. "Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the Kingdom"—the Kingdom which He had announced from the first, when He came saying, "The Kingdom of Heaven is at hand"; the kingdom which He had illustrated and described by every kind of parable and picture; the kingdom to which He was to make claims most plainly when it was most dangerous, standing before Pilate: "My kingdom is not of this world," the kingdom that they vaguely hoped and felt that He was somehow going to set up and head—this kingdom was to be entrusted to them, to serve, to found, to carry forward, and so, of course, to pray for.

The prayer, therefore, is the prayer of the one loyalty, the common allegiance, the corporate body. The individual members will take it into their private use: but it is the prayer of the whole, and for the whole. So at its head, after the salutation of reverence, "Hallowed be Thy Name," comes the great supplication, "Thy Kingdom come." It was a prayer which was to come out of hearts alive with all this loyalty to the common cause. Sometimes, indeed constantly, it was to be the voice of the body speaking audibly in united assembly and worship: sometimes it was to be the prayer of those separated in time and place, yet stirred in their private prayings by the remembrance of each that, as he prayed, so the great company all the world over were praying.—Bishop Talbot (England).

The World's Most Beautiful Story.

Renan called the Gospel of Luke the world's most beautiful book. If Luke is the most beautiful book in the world, then the Christmas story is the most beautiful story among all the beautiful stories in that most beautiful book; and today that story is being read by the children of every land, in every language that has been reduced to writing. There lies on my desk a volume of selected short stories recently published and in the preface it is told that the essay is dead; and that the long involved historical novel is dead but that the short story is now a living reality in literature. That is not new. That has always been true. The children have known that a long time.

The Bible is full of inimitable short stories and of all the stories this is the best. If you wish to give immortality to literature you must give your words wings. If you can wed your history to song or story it will fly out into the world and will not rest until the tale is heard in every language. Here in this story history is wedded to music. Here is theology more thrilling than fiction. Here are facts marvelous, miraculous facts which are set to a melody that thrills and enthralls. Here is a creed that sings, and a creed that sings is the only creed worth while. There is no story like it. Little children love it; old folks listen to it with rapt attention. It is for youth and yet it is for age.

Let us think first of the singers. The singers are the angels. They have come out of the invisible. They are heavenly choristers in God's great cathedral of nature. The clouds are their curtains. The stars are their tapers. We would never have thought of such a story. It is a story not of man's invention or discovery. It is a surprise. We would never have thought of it. It is inconceivable. The angels have come out of the invisible and stand on solid ground beside the shepherds who keep watch over their flocks. What does it mean?

Well, it means that heaven and earth are one. It means that the visible and the invisible, the seen and the unseen, belong to one world. It means that death is not the end but that earth opens out into heaven and the angels and man belong in the family of God.

Scientists are never tired telling us about the marvelous unity of the physical world. The spectroscope has revealed the fact that the most distant star that no eye has ever seen is the same in substance with the infinitesimal atom that is invisible.

So God would have us think of the larger world, the universe of life. It is one world. It is a house of many mansions—our Father's House, and God is in every minute of it. That is what the presence of the angels meant.

Let us think of the song. There are those who say that the story is a fairy tale, perhaps one of God's fairy tales. They suggest that the shepherds heard no music, that there were no angels and perhaps were no shepherds and no Christ Child. But the wonderful and incredible thing is that here is the song that was sung. We can read it. We can sing it and so strange and wonderful is the song that no singer we have ever known could have penned the words or composed the music. Certainly the shepherds could not have thought it out and in that dead, decadent age there was no one who could have manufactured the meter and invented the thought.

What a song it is! The chorister, or Herald Angel, sings his recitative alone, on the ground beside the shepherds—"Be not afraid for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy which shall be to all people, for unto you is born this day in the City of David a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord." Then the heavenly chorus made up of innumerable angelic choristers take up the refrain which echoes through the night—"Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men." It is all one song. The Herald Angel gives the theme and the theme contains the Christmas message "Unto you—is born—a Saviour." That is the message which is given. That is the theme—"Unto you—a Saviour." That is not what the world was looking for. That is not what the world wants. It wants an advisor, an orator, a scholar, a philosopher, a scientist, a philanthropist, a big-business man; but what the world needs is a Saviour; for sin is here and fear is here and sometimes the night is dark and there are no stars. This is the most glorious message that was ever sung in song or story, "Unto you is born a Saviour."

Let us think of the shepherds. It was a strange audience to which the angelic host sang their music in the night. We remember the simple Swedish girl in her native simplicity singing before the queen; that fact is interesting and appeals to the imagination. But here the heavenly choristers sing their Christmas carol before nameless obscure peasants that keep watch over their sheep in the night.

I think I could have arranged it differently. I think I could have improved upon the scenery and the background I would have arranged it not out on the plains of Judea in the presence of a few scantily clad shepherds. I would have staged the Christmas pageant amid the glories of Herod's temple on Mt. Sinai in Jerusalem. I would have had the radiant heavenly light illumine the candlesticks and the altar and the golden bowls of the temple and I would have had the angel choir arranged to sing an antiphonal chorus while the high priest and all the priests and the Levites and the great, crowded audience of wondering people bowed in silence while the music echoed from corridor to court and all Jerusalem was thrilled with the song "Glory to God in the highest."

That is the way I would have done it. That is the way we would have arranged it if we had had anything to do with this Christmas pageantry; but that is not God's way. God always works in secret and in obscurity. He gives His revelation under cover of the night. He comes not to priests and to kings but to lowly folks. His voice is not heard in the street.

"How silently, how silently
The wondrous gift is given,
So God imparts to human hearts
The blessings of His heaven."

That is what Christmas means if it means anything. It means that all life is filled with glory and melody and joy; and that fear has forever fled. Jenny Lind summed up the great purpose of her life in four words—"I sing for God." So the shepherds went back to their task, each one holding his secret in his heart and saying to himself—"I keep sheep for God." That is the spirit which has transformed the world. "I do business for God." "I teach school for God." "I keep house for God." "I drive an automobile for God." "I plow fields and gather the harvest for God." "I practice medicine for God." "I nurse the sick for God." "I make money for God." "Glory to God in the highest." Anything I can do or say or sing I lay at His feet. I give Him what I have, whether it be gold or frankincense or myrrh, whether it be my song or my sermon, my scholarship or my sheep over which I keep watch. "Glory to God in the highest."—Dr. Kerr, in Presbyterian Banner.

ANSWERS.

Charles Ballard.

Who loves the rose?
I, said the bee,
For the nectar I find among these clinging petals:
I love the rose.

Who loves the rose?
I, said the lover,
For my lady to twine in the shadows of her hair:
I love the rose.

Who loves the rose?
I, said the sleeper,
All summer I lie here with roses on my breast:
I love the rose.

Who loves the rose?
I, said the Lord God.
Last of all flowers I made her—queen of my Garden;
And when the two were exiled the Woman carried one away:
I love the rose.

Christ and the Harvest.

At the opening of His ministry the heart of Jesus was stirred by His conversation with a woman, who was a Samaritan. He went aside to meditate, and His disciples followed Him. Have you not a proverb that says something about there being four months to harvest? "Lift up your eyes and look on the fields; for they are white already to harvest." It is the heart of Jesus opening itself in fellowship with His disciples after what had happened at the well of Sychar.

At a later stage He had made a tour of the villages, preaching the good tidings of the Kingdom and healing the sick. He had found the people to be as sheep without a shepherd: "the hungry sheep look up and are not fed." Again, He had retired to reflect upon His experience, and again He spoke to His disciples. "The harvest truly is great, but the laborers are few. Pray ye, therefore, the Lord of the Harvest, that He will send forth laborers into His harvest." He was training His disciples.

It was, as I suppose, still later in His ministry, when the clouds were gathering. The time—the immediate time—before Him was short, and He was straitened until that which He called His baptism was accomplished. He was sitting towards sundown on a hillside, and His disciples were lying on the ground beside Him; they were watching a shepherd on the opposite hill, across the little valley, who was leading his flock into the fold for safety during the night. "I am the Good Shepherd." The door of the fold is closed and the darkness is beginning to cover the land. "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold. Them also I must bring." He was looking into the future, and foreseeing when He would bring them in through the fellowship of His disciples. —Rev. David Jenks.

THE HYMNS OF CHARLES WESLEY.

What simple strains are these, to live so long,
To move so many in so many lands,
When self-appointed arbiters of song
Are all effaced like scribblings in the sands!

In dens of London, choked with sin and shame,
The beggar and the burglar stop to hear,
And in the night, beneath the street lamp's flame
The ruined woman feels a burning tear.

In mines of Cornwall, underneath the sea,
The brimy laborer hears their martial tread,
Their fervent call from coming wrath to flee;
Above the ocean thunders overhead.

Amid Missouri's forests, dark and lone,
And by the Mississippi's turbid waves,
In nameless churchyards bramble-overgrown,
Their converts fill a thousand thousand graves.

Among the rude huts of the pioneers,
These hymns awoke the wilderness at dark,
Above the cries of wild beast, fraught with fears,
The panther's growling and the gray wolf's bark.

So I remember, when a barefoot boy,
I thrilled to hear thy wondrous trumpet-call
To Zion and its days of deathless joy,
Its crystal river and its jasper wall.

And, led by thee, I saw its clustered palms,
Its shining summits with their diamond skies,
A Beulah-land, with everlasting calms,
And lilies wet with dews of Paradise.

These hymns have raised the peasant from the sod,
Have made the rude, half-savage nature sweet,
Have reared a score of kingdoms unto God,
And laid a million hearts at Jesus' feet.

—Walter Malone.

The greatest possible joy of the human heart is the joy of salvation, but to make such a salvation possible Christ became a man, a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief, who came into the world to save sinners. Christmas would not be Christmas unless there were a Calvary.

IN YOUTHFUL DAYS.

E. Elizabeth Bateman.

"Seek ye the Lord in the days of thy youth before the evil days come, when thou shalt say, 'I have no pleasure in them'."

Seek ye the Lord in youthful days,
When hearts are young. Oh, learn to praise
Thy great Creator's wondrous ways.
Learn to adore Him and to bless
His loving kindness, faithfulness,
And with thy life His love confess.

Seek ye the Lord. For wisdom pray
Thy life to guide in every way;
To trust and serve Him and obey.
'Twill fill thy days with peace and joy,
And happiness without alloy,
When thus thy powers thou dost employ.

In Everything Give Thanks.

The gallant and indomitable Paul was writing to the Christians in Thessalonica—our modern Salonika—when he said, "In everything give thanks." Admittedly it is a hard saying.

But Paul was a pretty good practicer of what he preached. Such record of his life as we have, and more particularly the letters from his hand which have come down to us, furnish abundant evidence that this courageous little man, incessantly active, undergoing hardships, facing gravest perils, beset by treacherous foes, meeting innumerable discouragements and disappointments, suffering from physical affliction, maintained a thankful heart whatever happened. Few notes are so characteristic of the music of his life as those of joy and praise. He sang in prison, his feet in the stocks, his wrists in chains. He sang in the storm, when the fierce euroclydon, sweeping down upon the Mediterranean, tossed the little ship on mountainous waves, and every moment threatened disaster. When criticism and contempt were heaped upon him, and the cold shoulder was offered his loving approaches, the spirit of praise and rejoicing did not leave him.

There can be no question that such a spirit as this makes for triumphant living. It is the psychology of the overcomer. It maintains the resilience of the soul. It gives wings which can rise above the low-hanging clouds and glimpse the stars in the darkest night. With such an attitude of mind it is vastly easier to get well if one be physically ill.

The thankful spirit liberates and stimulates the constructive forces of life; the spirit of gloom and grouch and despondency inhibits them.

With Paul every day was a thanksgiving day, and thanksgiving was in fact thanksgiving. Thank and think are related words; they both sprang from the same root. It is the thoughtless who are the thankless; the people to whom life is a matter of sensation rather than of reflection.—Chicago Evening Post.

The Word Teddy Backed Up.

"Huh! You can't do it!"

The voice had a jeering tone that was not pleasant to listen to.

"I can!" Teddy Perkins emphasized the assertion by a stamp of his foot. "Say, mother," he appealed as Mrs. Perkins at that moment appeared upon the scene, "Donald says I can't get V. G. in conduct for a week, and I say I can! I know I can! Don't you believe it, mother?"

"Why, yes; if you know you can, of course you can," mother said with an encouraging smile. "But 'know' is a pretty strong term to use, son, unless you can back it up," she cautioned.

"You'll see whether I can back it up!" the boy declared, straightening himself.

Teddy was mischievous, and apt to be careless about his conduct marks, although he was quick to learn, and in his lessons V. G. appeared quite often upon the cards that he carried home for his parents' signatures.

His brother, Donald, was a little jealous of the readiness with which Teddy mastered his lessons, for Donald was not quite as quick to learn as his wide-awake little brother, although he excelled him in conduct. If Donald's V. G.'s could have been transferred to Teddy's card, or Teddy's to Donald's, the result would have been a card to delight the eye of any fond parent or appreciative teacher.

The next day Teddy started to school with a new light in his eyes. He walked directly to his seat, even before the school was called to order, which was a very unusual thing for Teddy Perkins to do. In vain, Dick Jones stuck pins in him arm and tickled his neck with a feather from his seat behind; Teddy kept his eyes studiously fastened upon his books until his tormentor got tired of his efforts to tease and also went to studying.

Once when Teddy raised his eyes he caught Miss Durkee watching him approvingly, and, thus encouraged, he managed to keep out of mischief for one-half day, at least. The afternoon was easier to get through, because it was shorter, and there was not a prouder boy in Spencer than Teddy Perkins when he rushed into his mother's presence at four o'clock and triumphantly held out his report-card, where V. G. stood at the end of every line.

"Bravo! I am indeed proud of my son!" his mother asserted. A thing that has once been accomplished becomes easier each time it is attempted. And at the end of the third day, Teddy decided that it was quite easy to bottle up his mischief until recess-time and then let it all at once, and be ready for another hour of quiet study, when the bell again called the class to order.

When Friday night came, Teddy could hardly realize that a whole week had actually passed without a single disfiguring mark upon his report-card.

"I said I could, and I did!" Teddy replied, throwing back his shoulders when his teacher questioned him concerning it. And then he went on to explain why he had been led to make so positive a statement.

"What has been done once can always be done again," Miss Durkee encouraged.

Teddy thought it queer that his mother should say the same thing when he held the transformed card before her approving eyes some time later.

But the strangest thing of all to Teddy was when he found himself also repeating to Miss Durkee's words whenever he was tempted to misbehave at school, until, in a very short time, it would have been as difficult for him to have disobeyed the rules as it had before been for him to be good.

"If you know you can, of course you can," is a motto that Teddy is now very fond of using.

When his mother hears him, she usually asserts, with a twinkle in her eyes: "'Can' is a strong term, but my son has proved to me that he can back it up."—Child's Hour.

Lindbergh Says—

I came to the conclusion that if I knew the difference between the right way to do a thing and the wrong way to do it, it was up to me to train myself to do the right thing at all times.

"So I drew up a list of character factors at the left margin of a sheet of paper, and then I numbered the top of the sheet from 1 to 31, ruling the sheet both up and down and sideways.

"One vertical column under a certain number would be my daily chart for that particular day of the month.

"At night I could read off my list of character factors, and those which I had fulfilled satisfactorily during the day I would mark with a red cross, those I had not been called upon to demonstrate that day, would get no mark.

"But those character factors which I had actually violated during the day I would mark with a black cross.

"I began to check myself from day today and to compare my 'blacks and whites' from month to month and year to year. I was glad to notice an improvement as I grew older."

These are the character factors mentioned above:

Altruism, Ambition.
Brevity in speech.
Concentration, calmness in temper, clean body, clean speech, clean thought, clean conduct, cheerfulness, courage.
Decisiveness, Determination.
Economy, Energy, Enthusiasm.
Firmness, Faith.
Gracefulness.
Honesty, hopefulness.
Industry, Initiative.
Justice, Judgment.
Love toward all, loyalty.
Moderateness, Modesty.
Neat appearance. No argument, no sarcasm, no fault finding, no talking about others, no talking too much.
Optimism.
Perseverance, physical exercise, pleasant voice, punctuality, patience, politeness.
Reverence—Divine, parent, home and family, country; respect superiors, respect fellow men, readiness to compromise, recreation—manful.
Self-esteem, self-control, self-confidence, sense of humor, sleep and rest, sympathy, sincerity.
Tact, truthfulness, thoroughness.
Unselfishness.—Exchange.

The Raggedy Dolly.

Amanda was an old raggedy doll with stringy hair and faded cheeks. She sat forlornly on the top of a barrel of rubbish in the cellar. Amanda was the only person left in the house. The family had moved out and gone to the suburbs, where the children would have a garden in which to play.

It was terrible to be left behind. Amanda had been sure that she would go, but when Eloise had grabbed her up hurriedly, and exclaimed, "Muvver, let's not take this old dolly. She's hidjous, Muvver," Amanda's stuffed heart nearly burst with sorrow.

She could remember Eloise's soft, cooing good-nights and wet kisses. Life had been all sunshine and playroom parties and buggy riding. And now—! What a descent, all the way to the cellar.

"Ha, ha, ha!"

Amanda opened her eyes wide in surprise. Who could be laughing in this damp place?

"Ha, ha, ha! Look at the fright!"

Amanda shivered. She glanced over the edge of the barrel.

"Howdy, newcomer!" It was Timothy Mouse.

Amanda ducked back and hid her head behind a pair of old shoes. Timothy gave a leap and landed on the toe of one shoe.

"Your hair will make the nicest sort of lining for my nest," he said. "Martha will be delighted. You battered old thing, at first sight I thought you were good for nothing. Whoever would have believed you were once the pride of Eloise's heart! Dear, dear, how we do fail in life? Hst! What was that?"

Mr. Tom Cat brushed his frowzy tail again the barrel, and looked up at Amanda.

"I do declare!" he exclaimed: "What freak have we here? I have seen funny sights in my life, but none funnier than you." And Tom set up a howl that nearly frightened the wits out of Amanda. "Just look at me," continued Tom. "I was once the pride of the household. But you! Oh, dear me, you dreadful looking thing! I don't blame the family for leaving you behind."

Now Timothy couldn't stand it another minute, because he agreed so heartily with the cat. So he piped up:

"Right, Tom! Isn't she awful?"

"That will do!" Tom sprang up the side of the barrel.

But Timothy was too quick for him. He sprang down as Tom sprang up, and scampered into a hole in the wall.

Amanda felt her head. Her hair was still there, but there was a leak in her arm and sawdust sprinkled over her body. However, the pain in her arm was nothing to the pain in her heart. Not to be loved, not to be wanted by any one. It was too dreadful.

Then something happened. Something inside her whispered to take courage, not to give up, but to struggle on. Amanda fell asleep at last dreaming that she was rescuing a little girl from drowning and that she was a heroine indeed.

When she awoke in the morning her dream was still with her and that made her smiley and happy. In fact, she was so smiley that when the ashman came to haul the barrel of rubbish away he stared at Amanda in surprise. Then he grinned from ear to ear, picked Amanda up and stuffed her, head first, into the pocket of his overalls.

All morning long Amanda doubled up and straightened out in the man's pocket, as he hurried about his duties.

Then, suddenly, he ducked into the basement of a house, stamped through a long, dark hall, threw open a door and called:

"Mother, Mother, come here. See what I have for little Anna's birthday."

He pulled Amanda out of his pocket and held her up to view. A dear lady with a sweet, sad smile took Amanda and examined her carefully.

Such an overhauling as that lady gave her! She was washed and combed and the hole in her arm sewed up. She was dressed in a long, flowing gown that the lady hurriedly sewed together. And then she was placed on a chair beside a bed, where a little girl lay sleeping.

Amanda trembled with excitement. It seemed to her as though her seams would surely burst. The little girl looked so sweet and pale and beautiful and had such pretty yellow curls. Would she love her as Eloise had?

Amanda hadn't long to wait, for little Anna stirred in her sleep, brushed the curls from her forehead with the back of her hand, and yawned. Then she opened two of the bluest eyes Amanda had ever seen. She stared at the smiling dolly, her mouth wide open in surprise.

Amanda's heart flip-flopped. Would she—could she—

The little girl gave a glad cry, leaned out of the bed and grabbed Amanda to her heart.

And there Amanda stayed, snug and warm, loved and petted. As she snuggled down with her cheek pressed close to her newfound friend she thought, "How glad I am I didn't lose my courage!"—S. S. Times.

Not in mine own, but in my neighbor's face,
Must I Thine image trace;
Nor he in his, but in the light of mine,
Behold Thy Face Divine.

GET WHAT YOU BUY.

Monument buyers are in almost all cases interested in securing the very best material. Material costs only about 20 per cent of the price of the job. Hence the percentage of increase for the best material over the cheapest material is insignificant. Besides which, Winnsboro Granite, when specified, returns to the dealer considerable saving in working as it works easier and more safely, owing to the toughness, than most other granites.

The buyer should be sure that the monument purchased is not of boulder stone; is not from some quarry of inferior crushing strength, or larger content of lime, iron and water—all of them injurious. To be perfectly sure, specify Winnsboro Granite in your purchase contract; require the dealer to furnish you a quarry certificate signed by the manager of Winnsboro Granite Corporation; and test the monument by throwing water over it. If there are any flaws, white or black streaks or splotches of size; or if there is wave (variation in the mixture of light and dark crystals) in the grain, some mistake has been made.

Insist upon flawless, even grain, straight grain granite. Only such granite, quarried and graded by Winnsboro Granite Corporation, is dependable as the best; and it is certificated on request.

You can get second, known as "Smith stock," but you sacrifice beauty and quality. You can get cheap boulder granite, but you sacrifice beauty and permanency. You can get granite from many other quarries which looks very attractive, but it will not last as well because containing more injurious ingredients—lime, iron, water. To be safe and sure, specify Winnsboro Granite. Have it certificated; examine it while wet.

The honest dealer, eager to please his customer, will be glad to make this test for you on all faces of the monument, and to furnish you a certificate from the quarry, which costs you nothing.

The pleased customer, sure that he gets what he buys, is a living advertisement to any monument dealer.

SHALL THE CHURCH RETREAT

Must the Gospel Be Withheld?

Must Hospitals Refuse Patients?

Must Schools Refuse Pupils?

THE answer will be announced by the National Council on February 12th, but the Council will only speak as the mouthpiece of the people of the Church.

YOU, through your representatives in General Convention, have ordered your National Council not to spend more than its expected income.

PRESENT estimates of income for 1930 indicate that a reduction of $250,000 must be made to balance the Budget.

THE present Budget is no larger than the one for 1923, notwithstanding continuing success and consequent growth of the work. No room for cutting now without sacrifice of vital work!

GENEROUS gifts or pledges, over and above your contributions to the parish quota, sent to your Bishop and reported to the National Council before February 12th—This is the only way TO AVOID RETREAT.

What Is Your Answer?

RT. REV. THEODORE N. MORRISON.

Resolution.

A minute, unanimously adopted by the Bishop, clergy and lay officials of the Diocese of Iowa, at a meeting in the Cathedral Parish House, following the burial of the RT. REV. THEODORE NEVIN MORRISON, D. D., LL. D., third Bishop of Iowa, Tuesday, December 31, 1929:

"He went in and out among us for lo, these many years: Thirty! He was become part of our life's landscape; a venerable figure, walking our streets; visiting our homes and our churches; preaching the Word with insight and with power; ministering at our altars. A good neighbor, a friend, a citizen-statesman, a man, priest, preacher, a Bishop in the Church of God. None crossed his path but to remember him and honor him.

"This practical mystic, this spiritualized intelligence, because he believed in God, believed also in men and honored them with his service. He lived as a successor of the poor fishermen of Galilee and walked in the steps of their divine Master and his.

"Nurtured in the bosom of the Church, he knew and loved her ways and was jealous of her good name. And though he came to a place of power, his episcopate was a manifestation of growth in the wisdom of love, and his ministry among us was a symbol visible of direct loyalty to the redemptive Personality of the Incarnate God, whom he apprehended with his mind, adored in his soul and served with intelligence and humility all the days of his earthly ministry.

"Courtly in deportment, in speech gentle; tender of heart and full of forgiving grace, his sympathy was redemptive, his attitude of soul and mind winsome and persuasive. The sweep of his mind was alien to no human interest. The insistence of his kindliness subdued men to his will and his transparent humility won men's affection and lasting devotion.

"Some will think of him as a Bishop in the Church of God; others will see in him the leader of a Diocese full of exacting duties and fatiguing errands. Some will think of him as an able, practical administrator of Diocesan institutions. He was all of these, and more. For us he will remain what at the core of his soul he was, a sensitive, firm, gentle man, full of daring kindliness, who turned not his face from those who needed him.

"Those who were enriched by his fellowship, and were privileged to share the precious gift of his friendship, began to build their little worlds firmly on those foundations. His sudden passing has rudely shaken those worlds and left us a bit desolate. We who knew him in this life know all the better for that experience the significance of Christian character and the implications of faith in God. Full of years, in his tragic death he leaves us poorer on earth, but makes the life to come more attractive and the great adventure a more wistful and exhilirating anticipation.

"As he approaches the nearer presence of God,

'All the way attended
By the vision splendid',

we know he will hear the music of his favorite text:

'Eye hath not seen, ear hath not heard, nor hath it entered the heart of man to conceive what good things the Lord hath prepared for them that love Him.'

"We know that for him faith has become sight, and that his portion is assuredly in heavenly places in Christ Jesus.

"Eternal rest grant unto him, O Lord, and let light perpetual shine upon him."

JOHN C. EASLEY.

Resolutions.

The vestry of Grace and Holy Trinity Church, Richmond, Va., in common with the entire community, was profoundly shocked and distressed at the announcement of the death from accidental cause of MR. JOHN C. EASLEY on December 27, 1929. Mr. Easley became a vestryman of Grace Episcopal Church on April 6, 1914, and on the consolidation of that congregation with that of Holy Trinity was elected as the first junior warden of Grace and Holy Trinity Church, and later became her senior warden, which position he occupied at the time of his death. He was also one of the leaders of the adult Bible class of his parish for five years.

As an administrator of the temporal affairs of the church he ever displayed the same ability and energy that marked his successful career in the business world. Courageous and forceful, he was confidently relied upon by our congregation for leadership in all progressive movements and ever proved a veritable tower of strength. He was not only a regular attendant upon the services of his church, but also a lively participant in all her activities, faithfully endeavoring in every way to advance the cause of Christ's kingdom.

Ever walking humbly and reverently in the sight of God, he won and preserved the love of all those connected with this church, and they will always experience a spirit of thankfulness for the privilege of their relationship with him and a sense of deep gratitude as well for the example of his Christian life.

The rectors and vestry wish inscribed in their records this slight tribute to the memory of this faithful follower of Christ who has been gathered unto his fathers "having the testimony of a good conscience; in the confidence of a certain faith; in the comfort of a reasonable, religious and holy hope."

JAMES BRUCE McCLELLAND.

Very early in the morning of December 19, 1929, in the seventy-second year of his life, JAMES BRUCE McCLELLAND, of Clarendon, in the Missionary District of North Texas, entered into the rest that remaineth for the people of God.

For many years he had served St. John's Baptist Mission as warden and then as treasurer. For several of the last years of his life he was the faithful and enthusiastic and successful District Treasurer for the Church's Program Fund. He was a regular attendant upon Convocation as well as upon his local church services, was deputy to the General Convention of 1922 and alternate in 1925. He was a pioneer surveyor in the Panhandle of Texas, and subsequently a leading banker in Clarendon.

He is survived by his wife, Mrs. Kate E. McClelland; his son, Bruce, of Oklahoma City, and his daughter, Mrs. Harry (Lila) Dodge, of Scarsdale, N. Y., all devoted church workers.

Mr. McClelland was a consecrated, courteous, Christian gentleman who in his life and in his death bore witness to the Christ and to the church he loved.

Burial was from the church after a communion service in the home. Bishop Seaman conducted the funeral, assisted by Rev. L. L. Swan, of Clarendon, and Rev. F. A. Foster, of Amarillo.

ROBERT MARION WARD.

Entered into the life eternal suddenly in the early morning of Saturday, December 28, 1929, ROBERT MARION WARD, son of the late George W. and Julia A. Ward, of Winchester, Va.

Robert Ward was a very outstanding figure in the life of the community in which he lived, and by his strong character and delightful personality drew to himself a host of devoted friends.

Prominent as a churchman, a lawyer and a citizen, he was actively identified with the leading interests of his native city, where he held many positions of honor and trust. For some years he represented the counties of Frederick and Shenandoah and the city of Winchester in the Senate of Virginia.

Mr. Ward was a lifelong member of Christ Episcopal Church. For over twenty-five years he was a vestryman, serving also for some years as senior warden. He frequently represented his parish at the meetings of the Church Council.

After attending the Shenandoah Valley Academy at Winchester for some years, Mr. Ward became a student at the University of Virginia, taking both the academic and legal courses. Returning to Winchester, after graduating with honor at the University, he here began the practice of law. His superior mental qualifications, strict integrity and sound judgment won for him a high place in his profession, both in his native city and throughout the State. In 1907 a legal partnership was formed between Robert M. Ward and Herbert S. Larrick, known as the firm of Ward & Larrick, and this partnership continued unbroken until the recent death of the senior member of the firm.

No notice of Mr. Ward would be in any measure complete without mention of the wholesome sense of humor, the ready wit and the courteous, kindly hearing which made him ever a delightwul companion and welcome guest.

Mr. Ward is survived by his widow, who was formerly Emily Ridgman Funsten, daughter of the late Colonel David and Susan Meade Funsten, of Clarke county, and by one brother, Dr. Julian F. Ward, of Winchester.

Funeral services were held on Monday afternoon, December 30, from Christ Episcopal Church, interment being made in Mt. Hebron Cemetery. Here was laid to rest under a wealth of flowers the body of Robert Marion Ward, a Christian gentleman whose death brought sorrow to many hearts.

MISS MARY COLES CARTER.

Died at her home in Baltimore, Md., MISS MARY COLES CARTER. She was one of the founders and for thirty-five years the principal of St. Timothy's School for Girls at Catonsville, Md. She was eighty years old.

Miss Carter's family, one of the oldest and most distinguished in the South, was impoverished by the Civil War. Miss Mary Carter and two of her sisters determined to earn their own living. Miss Mary first taught in a girls' school at Edge Hill, Va., beginning her work soon after the war.

A few years later the three sisters established St. Timothy's, which came to rank among the very best of the private boarding schools for girls in the United States. At a time when sending girls away to school and college was unusual, fastidious parents were glad to find a place for their daughters at Catonsville. Many women now prominent in New York, Boston, Philadelphia and other Eastern cities are graduates of St. Timothy's.

Seventy-eighth Anniversary of the Protestant Episcopal Brotherhood.

Nineteen hundred and thirty ends the seventy-eighth year of the Protestant Episcopal Brotherhood in the Diocese of Maryland, and was celebrated on Sunday and Monday, January 12 and 13.

On Sunday evening, January 12, the Anniversary Service was held in St. George's Church, Dundalk, of which the Rev. James McNeal Wheatley is rector, and also chaplain of the Brotherhood. At this service the Rev. Charles E. McAllister, rector of St. Michael and All Angels Church, Baltimore, preached the sermon.

On Monday evening, January 13, a banquet was held in the parish house of St. George's Church, and the speakers at this time were the Rt. Rev. Edward T. Helfenstein, D. D., and Hon. Albert C. Ritchie, Governor of Maryland. Mr. Herbert Grimes was toastmaster.

Daughters of the King.

The January Local Council of the Daughters of the King of the Diocese of Washington was held January 23 at 8 P. M. in Ascension Church. A special feature was a talk by Mrs. William Channing Johnson on the Episcopal Church Home of the Diocese of Washington.

The Entire Diocese Sympathizes with the Rev. F. Bland Tucker, rector of St. John's Church, Georgetown, in the loss he has sustained in the passing away of his father, the Rt. Rev. Beverley D. Tucker, Bishop of Southern Virginia. Mr. and Mrs. Tucker left Washington on January 14 for Norfolk, arriving before the Bishop's operation and last hours. Bishop Tucker has visited and preached at St John's Church several times during his son's rectorate there, and also supplied for confirmations throughout the Diocese of Washington, during Bishop Harding's last illness, and had, therefore, in Washington and especially Georgetown, many friends and admirers.

Christ Church, Georgetown.

Rev. and Mrs. E. Pinkney Wroth were the honor guests at a delightful reception in the parish hall of Christ Church, Georgetown, on Monday evening, January 13, just two days prior to their leaving for their new work in Warren, Pennsylvania.

Mr. and Mrs. Wroth and presidents of the parish organizations received the large number of friends and parishioners who attended and wives of the vestrymen assisted at the tea tables. In the course of the evening Mr. George A. King, representing the vestry, paid tribute to Mr. Wroth's work in the parish and community and presented him as a gift from the whole vestry a gold watch. Mr. Wroth, just the week before had received from his choir an English Oxford traveling bag. Mr. Wroth and his family have arrived in Warren and established themselves, and word received gives very happy accounts of their findings in their new field.

Until the new rector assumes charge of Christ Church, the Rev. Edwin B. Niver, of Baltimore, and now connected with Washington Cathedral, will have charge of the parish, celebrating communions and preaching at the 11 A. M. services on Sunday. At the evening services, the preacher will be Mr. Albert Stuart, student assistant from Virginia Theological Seminary. Mr. Stuart is also superintendent of the Sunday School.

Spiritual Healing.

Savannah, Ga.—The Society of the Nazarene of St. John's Church, the Rev. C. C. J. Carpenter, rector, was very active in the week of January 5-12, when services were held daily in cooperation with the "Worldwide Spiritual Healing Convention" initiated by the Rev. John Maillard, warden of "The Divine Healing Fellowship," London, England, and editor of "The Healing Church."

A new Guild for intercession and healing was organized at St. Michael and All Angels' Church, the Rev. Joseph Burton, rector, when, following a celebration of the Holy Communion, the rector of St. John's gave a short address on the meaning of Spiritual Healing and the value of such an organization as a Guild for this special work in any parish.

Rt. Rev. Campbell Gray, D. D., Bishop.

For Building the Cathedral.

A gift of ten thousand dollars, unsolicited and unexpected, has been presented to Bishop Gray of Northern Indiana, toward the building of the Cathedral in Mishawaka, on a lot which was given some years ago for that purpose. Friends outside of the diocese, who had read a copy of the Field Department issue of the diocesan paper, published in the fall, selected this object for their gift because, they said, viewing the work as a whole, they felt that a cathedral, properly equipped and endowed, as a center not only of devotion and efficient organization but also of missionary work, would be the solution of all the other problems.

TENNESSEE.

Rt. Rev. Thos. F. Gailor, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. J. M. Maxon, D. D., Coadjutor.

Adeste Fideles, a Christmas mystery play by the late Marie E. J. Hobart, was presented by a group of little children at Sewanee, first on Christmas Eve and later a second performance was given for the benefit of the theological students at St. Luke's Chapel on January 13. The children were very young, ranging in age from four years old to twelve, and averaging six or seven years. At the first performance the music was furnished by a volunteer choir who after the play, went around the campus and to the hospital singing the Christmas carols. At the second performance the music was furnished by the University choir. This is the second in the series of mystery plays that is being inaugurated to illustrate the course in the Psychology of Worship given by Professor the Rev. George B. Myers as part of his senior course in the Philosophy of Religion. This year Mrs. Myers, who was before her marriage Margaret Hobart, will lecture to the seniors on religious pageantry and drama.

Personal Notes

The Rev. T. Carter Page, rector of Trinity Church, South Boston, Virginia, since 1925, has resigned and will retire from the ministry. He is planning to live at Berryville, Virginia.

The Rev. John C. Skottowe, for some time minister-in-charge of St. Katherine's Mission, Pensacola, Florida, has accepted a call to the Diocese of Georgia and will leave Florida for his new field about the first of February.

ORDINATIONS.

The Rev. Charles L. Wulf was ordained to the priesthood by Bishop Woodcock of Kentucky on December 18, 1929, in the Church of the Advent, Louisville, Kentucky. The candidate was presented by the rector, the Rev. H. S. Musson, and the sermon was delivered by the Rev. Richard I. Brown, rector of St. Stephen's Church. The Rev. E. J. Kendall, of Eutaw, Alabama, read the Litany, and the Epistle and Gospel were read by Canon Hardy and Dean McCready, respectively. In addition to the Bishop, all of the priests present united in the laying on of hands. Mr. Wulf, who since his ordination to the diaconate in June, has been in charge of St. Mary's Mission, Madisonville, and St. John's, Uniontown, will continue his work at these two places, residing at the rectory in Madisonville.

Charles G. Leavell was ordained deacon by Bishop Woodcock, of Kentucky, in St. Andrew's Church, Louisville, Kentucky, in December. He is now a student in the graduating class at the Virginia Theological Seminary.

Lewis Owen Heck was ordained to the diaconate on Sunday morning, January 5 by Bishop Helfenstein, in the Church of the Messiah, Hamilton, Maryland. The Rev. James Archibald Mitchell, rector of the church, presented the candidate and the Rev. Charles L. Atwater, of Chestertown, Maryland, preached the sermon. Mr. Heck will return to the Virginia Theological Seminary to resume his studies, where he will graduate in June.

SPREADING THE GOOD WORD

Quite recently the mail in one day brought to the SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN offices subscriptions and remittances from readers in sixteen of the States in the Union. Here they are:

Washington, Florida, Massachusetts, New York, California, West Virginia, District of Columbia, Mississippi, Virginia, Pennsylvania, North Carolina, Maryland, Alabama, Ohio, Nevada, Wisconsin.

Earlier in the month subscriptions were received from Illinois, Texas, Georgia, Michigan, Indiana, South Carolina, Arkansas, Missouri, Louisiana, New Jersey, Tennessee, Kentucky, Hawaii, and from far-away Italy.

Returns from other States are coming in with each daily mail, for the SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN has readers in every one of them, also in all the mission fields of the Church, and in many foreign countries.

In this wide distribution, the SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN reaches many people of many trends of thought. Read what they say:

"I have found the Southern Churchman one of the most intensely religious papers that come to my home."—Richard H. Edmunds, Editor Manufacturers Record, Baltimore, Md.

"There is no paper to which I send the subscription price with as much feeling of value received as I do when mailing a check to Southern Churchman."—Rt. Rev. Theodore P. Thurston, California.

"Your paper is so spiritual and educational in every way that I wish every soul in America could read it."—Oliver Orr, Macon, Ga.

"The Southern Churchman is a paper which any church family should be proud to have enter the home."—Minister, South Carolina.

"The best family church paper published."—Subscriber, Chanute, Kansas.

AN EXTRACT FROM A GREAT SERMON BY THE LATE REV. ROBERT STUART MACARTHUR

"WHAT THINK YE OF CHRIST?"

"Dr. Geikie, in his life of Christ, calls attention to the fact that the Jews confess great admiration for the character and words of Jesus; that the Mohammedan world gives Him the high title of Messiah; that the myriad-minded Shakespeare paid Him lowly reverence, and that men like Galileo, Kepler, Bacon, Newton and Milton set the name of Christ above every other name. He also reminds us that Jean Paul Richter, whom his countrymen call 'Der Einzige, the unique,' tells us that 'the life of Christ concerns Him who, being the holiest among the mighty, the mightiest among the holy, lifted with His pierced hands empires off their hinges, and turned the stream of centuries out of its channel, and still governs the ages.' Spinoza, the great philosopher, son of Portuguese Jews, disciple of Abenezra and Descartes, calls Christ the symbol of divine wisdom. Schelling and Hegel speak of Him as the union of the divine and human. The immortal Goethe, the acknowledged prince of German poets, and one of the most superbly accomplished men of the eighteenth century, says: 'I esteem the Gospels to be thoroughly genuine, for there shines forth from them the reflected splendor of a sublimity, proceeding from the person of Jesus Christ, of so divine a kind as only the divine could ever have manifested upon earth.'

"Permit me to think of this church as a courtroom. I now summon additional witnesses to testify to the character of Jesus the Christ.

"What thinkest thou of the Christ, O Jean Jacques Rousseau, with all the brilliancy of thy intellect, the singularity of thy character and the enthusiasm of thy writings? Give place to the witness Rousseau; hear his testimony. Rousseau speaks: 'How petty are the books of the philosophers compared with the Gospels! Can it be that writings at once so sublime and so simple are the work of men? Can He whose life they tell be Himself no more than a mere man? Yes, if the death of Socrates be that of a sage, the life and death of Jesus are those of a God.'

"What thinkest thou of the Christ, burly, brusque, brave and heroic Thomas Carlyle, with all thy marvelous reading, thy profound thinking, and thy contempt of cant and love of truth?

"Carlyle steps forward and speaks: 'Jesus of Nazareth, our divinest symbol! Higher has the human thought not yet reached.'

"Let us summon Dr. Channing, the cultured and eloquent preacher and writer, the foremost man among American Unitarians in his day.

"What thinkest thou, O Channing, of Jesus Christ?

"He makes reply: 'The character of Jesus Christ is wholly inexplicable on human principles.'

"What thinkest thou, O Herder, illustrious German thinker, broad scholar and exquisite genius, of Jesus the Christ?

"Superb is his reply: 'Jesus Christ is in the noblest and most perfect sense the realized ideal of humanity.'

"What thinkest thou of the Christ, O Napoleon, mighty son of Mars, striding through the world like a Colossus darkening the brightness of noonday with the smoke, and lighting the darkness of midnight with the fires of battle?

"Hear this man of gigantic intellect, whatever may be said of his ambitious motives: 'I think I understand somewhat of human nature, and I tell you all these (the heroes of antiquity) were men, and I am a man, but not one is like Him; Jesus Christ was more than man. Alexander, Caesar, Charlemagne and myself founded great empires; but upon what did the creations of our genius depend? Upon force; Jesus alone founded His empire upon love, and to this very day millions would die for Him.'

"Compared with such witnesses as these, the opponents of Jesus Christ of to-day are pigmies so contemptible in mentality and so questionable in morality as to be ruled out of every court of testimony where intellectual ability and moral worth have weight.

"A true conception of Christ's ideal humanity leads us to the assertion of His real divinity. We shall not, however, at this point spend time in splitting theological hairs. We may be able to pass the examination of a church council on our knowledge of divine sovereignty and human freedom, or on any of the 'isms' of ancient or modern heterodoxy, and yet we may be spiritually dead. We may recite creeds by the yard, and yet be black in heart and vile in life. A dead orthodoxy may be worse than a live heterodoxy. Creeds may be as powerless over our lives as the multiplication table. We must know Jesus Christ as the vicarious sacrifice for sin, and as our personal Lord and Saviour. The atonement is the part of theology. The Cross is the center of the universe. It is the pivot around which all the great events of history revolve. The historian and the philosopher, as truly as the theologian, must build their studios on Calvary.

"I summon thee, O execrable Judas. Behold him flinging down the thirty pieces of silver before the chief priests and elders. Hear him speak in his agony of soul: 'I have sinned in that I have betrayed the innocent blood.'

"I summon thee, O Pontius Pilate, with thy immortality of shame in the creeds of the ages.

"The Roman Procurator washes his hands. Strange sight! He speaks: 'I am innocent of the blood of this just person.' He speaks again: 'I find no fault in this man.'

"I summon John, the heroic Baptist. Hear his testimony: 'Behold the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world.'

"O loving and divine John, the evangelist, what thinkest thou of the Christ?

"The Evangelist John speaks: 'He is the Vine, the Way, the Truth, the Life, the Light and the Word, and the Word was God.'

"I summon thee, O matchless Paul. What is thy testimony? 'He is the image of the invisible God. The blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords.'

"I summon thee, apostle Peter, once confessor, then denier, but afterward penitent witness and heroic martyr.

"What is thy testimony? 'He is the Christ, the son of the living God.'

"I summon thee, O once doubting but always brave Thomas. Hear the testimony of this witness as he falls at the Master's feet and exclaims, 'My Lord and my God.'

THE HEALING MINISTRY OF JESUS

A Healing Handbook for Believers.

By REV. FRANK N. RIALE, Ph.D., D. D.

Author of "The Divine Antidote to Sin, Sickness and Death."

There are few things that we know less about, yet sincerely desire to know more about, than the place of "the gift of healing" in the full Evangel of Jesus. All down the Christian centuries there have been various ways of approach to God for His healing help. But the Holy Spirit is ever saying to men, "and yet I show you a more excellent way". It is this "more excellent", more rational and more universal way, that this little volume aims to set forth.

REV. JOHN GAYNER BANKS, D. D.

Director of the Society of the Nazerene, the international healing guild in the Episcopal Church, writes: "Thousands of souls pursued by 'The Hound of Heaven' will welcome your message as the very word of God speaking to them, coming as a veritable 'Sword of the Spirit', with power and conviction."

REV. L. O. HARTMAN,

Editor of Zion's Herald, Boston, says: "Your own experiences are remarkable. Your message is bound to make men and women think more seriously than ever before, about divine healing.

"It is certainly one of the very best discussions on divine healing in print."

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

"A perfect God is He. And He is fully ours."

Starters are plentiful, stickers are scarcer, but finishers are scarcest.—Mr. James W. Merritt.

The progress of the race depends upon the value that each generation puts upon its children.

What is the wisdom of rejecting that which is revealed because we do not understand what is not revealed?—John Wesley.

A great saint once said, "All things come to him who knows how to trust and be silent."—Selected.

The superfluous blossoms on a fruit tree are meant to symbolize the large way in which God loves to do pleasant things.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Wouldst thou fashion for thyself a seemly life?
Then do not fret over what is past and gone;
And spite of all thou may'st have left behind
Live each day as if thy life were just begun.
—J. W. von Gothe.

The highest of all achievements is likeness to Jesus.—Dr. J. C. Wilkinson.

"Unthanked, unnoticed and unknown,
Blamed sometimes and misunderstood;
Yet if our Lord but sees our work,
And by His grace shall own it good,
It will not matter what men say,
Since God is Judge of all, not they."

There are but two freedoms, the false, where a man is free to do what he likes; the true, where a man is free to do what he ought.—Charles Kingsley.

Independence of thought is the prerogative of every individual and one of the chief glories of man. Strange, therefore, that people should ever quarrel over differences of opinion.

There is dew in one flower and not in another, because one opens its cup and takes it in, while the other closes itself and the drops run off. So God rains goodness and mercy as wide as the dew, and if we lack them, it is because we do not open our hearts to receive them.—Aughey.

ANSWERED

According to the old newspaper rule, when a dog bites a man the fact is usual and normal and is not news; but when a man bites a dog it is unusual and abnormal and, therefore, news. Likewise, when ministers of the churches behave themselves seemly, do faithfully their appointed work and are trusted, beloved and commended, the conditions are general and usual and, therefore, not news. When a minister misbehaves or the churches are attacked and denounced, the circumstance is unusual and more or less shocking and, consequently, news. And if the assault is by one who has borrowed the livery of Heaven, it is special and unctious news. Presumably in obedience to this instruction, The Associated Press sends from Chicago and the newspapers print a somewhat extended report of an attack on Protestant Churches of the country generally and those of the manufacturing districts of the South especially, by James Myers, "industrial secretary of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ", before the annual meeting of the executive committee of that organization. In the official statement of the Council, Mr. Myers is listed as "Rev.", although the newspaper story, evidently carefully prepared and handed out for publication as a sensation, omits the "Rev." The official description of the individual is "field secretary."

Mr. Myers began with the sneer that "Protestant churches in most cities of the country were likely to be found on the comfortable side of town." With this preliminary declaration of allegiance, he bewailed the probability of trend of industrial workers, especially those of the Southern textile enterprises, away from religion and the churches. Mr. Myers said he had just returned from the Southern cotton mills where strikes have occurred. Everywhere, he indicated, the clergy had proved powerless, or unwilling to help the strikers. In some instances the local preachers, involved in the mill system, had proved the worst enemies of the labor unions, opposing them, "when people in desperation adopted the strike as the last resort to remedy conditions which they felt to be intolerable." This is in exact accord with the address of an Atheist and Communist strike organizer who returned recently from stirring what trouble he could in the Southern mills and reported, despondently, to an atheistic and communist meeting in Washington, that the churches and ministers of the South were the worst opponents his mission of destruction encountered and that there would be little hope for prevalence of his doctrines until they were abolished, as in Russia.

It happens that answers to both these reformers is given from several sources. One is the general return to work of the strikers. Another is conviction in a North Carolina court, after trial scrupulously fair by an impartial jury, of the labor organizers and their followers of riot. Another is the fact that at Gastonia, centre of the agitators' activities, less than a fourth of the mill workers could be induced to join the strike. Yet another is a statement published recently in The Manufacturers Record, taken from The Charlotte, N. C., Observer, which few newspapers, even in the South, saw fit to publish. It is signed by 156 of the 202 men and women employed in the Leaksville, N. C., woolen mills, where a strike was organized by the imported agitators, and sixty-six of the workers walked out. The others say they are church members, loyal American citizens, opposed to bolshevism, communism and disorder, and add:

> "The employees of this mill are perfectly satisfied with the wages they receive and the hours they work. Most of us have bank accounts. With one or two exceptions, every family owns an automobile, and some families have as many as three. The mill owners voluntarily cut the working hours from sixty to forty-eight hours a week, with the same pay. In this period of business recession nobody but a fool or a bolshevik could expect or desire more."

That is a glimpse of the intolerable conditions which the Rev. Mr. Myers reports to the "Federation of Churches"—the rest of the title of the organization includes blasphemy so horrible that it need not be repeated. This Federation is supported by fearful misuses of a $2,000,000 endowment fund left it by Andrew Carnegie. Its officials treat themselves pretty well, as the English say. They have pleasantly equipped offices in handsome buildings in New York, Washington, Chicago, each presumably with its comfortably paid secretaries and manager. Mr. Luzzo, leading official of the American Federation of Labor, the greatest labor organization in the world, in a published letter to President Green, protests against the activities of this Federation of Churches to cripple the Federation of Labor and encourage Communists and Anarchists and outlaw unions, like those that have invaded North and South Carolina, denounced the churches and proclaimed atheism as the only hope of deliverance for workers, along with communism, bolshevism, and miscegenation. Luzzo's accusations are confirmed by the utterances of the Rev. Mr. Myers, so promptly given to the press.

Those who have observed and know the preachers in small Southern communities, especially those of the mill villages and towns, know their patient, self-sacrificing, faithful zeal and devotion. They carry with them comfort, hope, help, for soul, mind and body, toil ceaselessly for small pay, are useful beyond all calculation in training the young, reclaiming to righteousness and usefulness and good citizenship those tending to be dissolute and drifting toward degradation and vice. Remembering these, we must be moved to indignation and contempt unutterable toward those who pervert a dead man's bounty and, living on it in idle ease, seek maliciously to destroy the religion beneath the cloak of which they try to hide, to tear down the industries built by the labor and pioneer enterprises of honest and public-spirited men, to lead multitudes of trusting people to poverty and lawlessness, to spread wreck and riot and ruin where through all these years have been peace and prosperity and contentment; where God fearing people have corrected what wrongs might develop by lawful, orderly methods.

Alfred B. Williams.

THE PERIL OF SUNDAY SCHOOLS

(A Talk to Teachers)—

By the Reverend S. S. Drury, D. D.

THE Sunday-school teacher's problem is the dilemma of St. Francis. You may remember how that humble expert in the spiritual life debated at Assisi between praying and preaching. "Of a truth," he says, "I that am wrought more simple and awkward in speech have received more grace of prayer than of speaking." But as we know, his perceptive companions urged him to let praying merge into preaching, to the enrichment of all Europe. Thus a conscientious parochial Christian might say: "Had I not better humbly pray, perhaps visit a poor home or two, diligently improve my own character; but as for taking a Sunday-school class and leading a group of romping boys and wriggling girls, that is not for me." Let us be plain about it, and at the outset honestly declare: Sunday-school teaching is a full-sized job, requiring piety, tact, a light hand, a taming eye, consecutive study and a personal experience of God. No wonder a man or woman thinks a dozen times before answering the rector's bidding: Won't you take a class?

Yet, if the conscientious decline, the Church School will become a greater peril than ever, undermanned as it will be, by, oh, so fragile leaders, and fed by such pallid pabulum. It is a risky thing to play with souls, as we all know. There is peril in preaching, a weekly menace of pulpit peril, bound up in one man's essay to lead another God-ward. If this be true of trained specialists, where a chance sentence or oblique reference may deviate a pilgrim soul, how much truer in the huddled parish hall, where a young Miss of twenty is trying to explain the miracles to ten boys of ten; or a college student is sophomorically enumerating the things he does not believe.

A devoted ministry of lay folk is a challenging desirability as well as crying need. We must laicize the Church, purging it from dependence on priestliness; for religion is not the secret of priests, but the common property of all pilgrims. The best lay folk, therefore, should magnify their office by volunteering for the Sunday School. It is an expected part of the Christian profession for the strong to carry forward the weak, while weak. Needed, too, is this lay ministry. In our Church the priest has a thousand souls to tend, a thousand sheep to shelter. Can he do it alone? Impossible. The disciple of Christ must be forever becoming an apostle of Christ; and our able but egocentric parishioner, above mentioned, will be scanting his duty, unless in some capacity he places his powers at the disposal of the shepherd in the care of a scattered flock.

On your precise weekly preparation as teachers of the leaflet or the book I cannot help you, save to say that the good teacher spends always hour for hour. Your scholars, like Dr. Arnold's, must drink of a running stream. It is unworthy of souls to get up your Sunday's lesson in a hurried ten minutes beforehand. The cause of God demands the deepest kind of preparation. But what, speaking more generally but no less definitely, shall we call the teacher's autumn ideals, lasting from October to June? You may be imparting Old Testament law or Christian ethics or the journeys of St. Paul. Well and good. Master the lesson, but master more. What are the predispositions, all the prolegomena to specific Christian teaching? For there must be in the ardent teacher's heart a sense of woe-is-me, a truly salvational element, as who should say: Tommy this or Mary that—with me now, perhaps remaining for half a year. In our nomadic scene, Tom or Mary may never see a Christian School again. What indelible durabilities can I transmit to Mary and to Tom that will never pass away? It is that pulsating question that should accompany the teacher every Sunday to class, and set the tone.

I begin by telling my boys of two courses which divide the world. The one says: "Love God." The other says: "Forget God." The one motto reads: "Love God and do as you please." The other by changing one word changes every thought towards heaven and earth. It is: "Forget God and do as you please." The center of every Sunday-school lesson is God. For if we know Him, we shall love Him, and if we love Him, all conduct is glowingly consecrated.

You will say that I am turning ordinary friendly lay teachers into theologians. Yea, verily. The teacher in the Church School must be primarily a God-imparter. The personal transmission of awaredness of spiritual values of belief in the Divine Father is your first privilege. Of the essential profundity of your task Professor Whitehead writes: "We can be content with no less than the old summary of educational ideal which has been current at any time from the dawn of our civilization. The essence of education is that it be religious. Pray, what is religious education? A religious education is an education which inculcates duty and reverence. Duty arises from our potential control over the course of events. Where attainable knowledge could have changed the issue, ignorance has the guilt of vice. And the foundation of reverence is this perception that the present holds within itself the complete sum of existence, backwards and forwards, that whole amplitude of time which is Eternity."

The resolution of the Sunday-school teacher is thus dipped and seasoned in reality. While it is well to explain the meaning of altar candles and the symbolism of the season's colors, it is not essential food. Your hungry sheep will look up, interested no doubt, but scarcely satisfied. Every Church School lesson must dwell on the beauty and reasonableness of believing in God.

Intelligence, personal consecrated acumen, must bear on the next ideal of the Christian teacher. Because he is a Christian, he feels impelled, and quite naturally, to further the interests of Christ. Clearly, you can't be a Christian and leave out Christ. My fear is that Sunday Schools often prove their peril by a wrong presentation of Our Lord. We must not be more Christian than Christ. Nor is it loyalty to press His claims more vociferously than He Himself presented them. If we let Him alone, all men will come to Him. Can the loyal disciple sufficiently let Him alone?

A Polish girl in New York, when recently asked the difference between an educated man and an intelligent man replied: "An educated man knows what other people think. An intelligent man works his own thinks." Just here the teacher must work his own thinks, and in persuading scholars to be disciples of Christ, must adjust the message to the child and not attempt to pour the whole of Nicene thought into an adolescent mind.

Canon Raven in his recent book on Christ and Modern Education persuades us that Our Lord trusted to an evolutionary belief in Himself. Like all sound teachers He worked from the known to the unknown, from the familiar to the ineffable. He presented Himself as a serviceable friend, a foremost companion. It is so hard for the ardent Church School teacher to adopt the patience of Christ in furthering Christ's claim. Now, the second dominant ambition of the Sunday-school teacher should be, in my judgment, not to convince every child that Jesus is the Son of God, but to produce an increasing, loyal admiration for the Hero of the Gospel and the World. Shall we not thereby build up a more durable foundation of Catholic theology, which would be my avowed goal, than to superpose on an inexperienced and unbuilt mind an apex of conviction? We should not seek to stifle inquiry or natural admiration by a mysterious assertion that this Hero is divine, and that, being divine, every miracle is natural, and that the religion of Jesus imports us into the exotic realm of magic. That will not wear. The poorest teaching is the sort which later requires unteaching, and thereby begets a sense of unreliability in the thing taught.

Youth is in a ferment of practicality. It is dangerous to fill the mind with ideals, unless we offer to the hand moral opportunities. While we grant that youth is dreamy and even metaphysical, often desirous of a solitude which should not be denied, our instructions must not end in the air. They must be embodied. There must be scope for action, where creed can precipitate into conduct.

The bridge from creed to church, from what we think-is-so to what we ought-to-do must be an active nexus. Faith without works is dead; the faith without practice is ghostly. Teachers, therefore, frankly aim to encourage youth to loving the Church and to participate in its services. Sunday Schools are perilous, when they become ends in themselves. If choice must be made between attending Sunday School or attending Church, who would doubt the rightness of choosing the latter? Just when the final transfer from tutelage to free membership should come is doubtful. In general it is well to keep the young people vitally connected with the Church School as helpers in some form, since there is a common leakage between regular appointments at 9:30 and free choice. Confirmation should not spell freedom from the ideals begot by routine.

A Christian lives a life. That makes him a Christian. The nearest definition of Christ's will for us was and is the way. It is a thoroughfare of thinking and of doing. The Christian way is the creed lived.

Emphasizing the truth that religion must ever be an embodiment (if no more, as Our Lord said, than giving a cup of cold water with a friendly hand), we shall avoid the menace of "inert ideas." An inert idea is a truth which is not applied, and, not being released, never achieves its full free life. Teaching which does not lead its votaries to the broad highway of living and there dismiss them with "and therefore since you know, do" merely clogs the mind with inert ideas. And this becomes a moral peril. To put the mind under an obligation of vital thought and then to expect or to provide no activity therefrom is to violate a law of thought, which is embodiment, and to vitiate the mind's welfare. It is like placing brimming measures of germinated seeds on the edge of fertile acres and then preventing all sowers to approach.

Learning the lesson prepares us for church attendance. We are promoted. The idea gathered in the parish hall is released from inertia by the activity of worship and Communion. But it is a peril of Church as well as of Sunday School, though not so great. The idea formed or enriched in church can become inert, unless again released into practical embodiment at home, school or office. A good Sunday-school teacher can never admit that getting the lesson successfully through with is the end of his or her responsibility, any more than that getting the pupil regularly to church is the end of the privilege. No, Christian life is a continual impregnation of daily environment by the nourished convictions of the heart. If either church attendance or successful Sunday-school routine become satisfied ends in themselves, they are perils.

Shall we not return to those resolutions, which can enhalo all our work. They will be personal, they will concern not books or courses, but the technique of the heart. It is a truism that we teach, not the Bible, but persons about the Bible. Our goal is the pupil's mind. It is but lost labor, unless we have won or are winning the scholar. Impartation is but inspiration. All education is a glorious game of follow the leader. Though there be slave drivers in many schoolhouses, who win our exasperated regard, they are not the men of light and leading who carry us up the heights. What shall the Sunday-school teacher do to himself or herself, what new inner conspiracy of frank reform shall he adopt, in order to win his girls or boys?

(a) I think our first improvement should be the use of imagination. Put yourself in his place is the basis of all sympathy, and sympathy is as needed in days of routine progress as in hours of sorrow. If I approach my class full of my own hobbies, thinking about myself and dominated by my own ego, I may be temporarily impressive, but I shall not win my flock. I must employ the perceptive eye, which sees the home background of the pupils, the richness or futility of it, the inevitable ambitions of youth, however they be camouflaged by an assumed indifference. The good teacher like His Master must know what is in men, before he essays to add to or change that content. Only by active imagination can he proceed from the known to the unknown, from the familiar to the strange, which is the basis of all teaching. Take a minute, yes, a reflective ten minutes, before your class to meditate on the personalities you are set to feed. They are all different; they emerge from varied backgrounds; they speak different languages.

(b) But not alone by merging ourselves with the flock shall we become leaders. Sympathy is essential, but inadequate. We must win our pupils by what I can only call fascination. This does not mean performing high jumps or hand springs. I do not recommend showing off. But I do mean being interesting. There are good people who have the faculty of draping the very stars with common-place-ness. They hang gray cambric over every subject that they teach. Much as we deprecate showing off in teachers, dullness is worse. There be parents and teachers who rely on their position to enforce their admonitions. To me that is all poppycock. The centurion attitude is defensible only when the centurion is just. An unexplained dictum must spring from verity. You will not achieve, and you should not deserve, the attention of your pupils or your children, unless you are telling them the truth. And the truth merits gay and brilliant setting.

That is what I mean by fascination. How many parents bore their children, slumping back into comfortable authority, when they might be tonics and spurs. How many teachers rely on their piety or their regularity, when they should be leading by a vivid, brilliant, up-to-date transfer of Capernaum to the city where we live here and now. Do not trust to your goodness, do not stand on your dignity, do not rely on your authority. Take truth by the hand and let it carry you and your class on its gay and hair-breadth adventures.

(c) Your last and deepest innovation will be partly seen and partly guessed. It is the devotion that all pastors take in the flock and in the great Shepherd. There is nothing so winning as personal devotion. Imagination is needed, fascination is an asset, but devotion is essential. Win the pupil by a year of built up companionship. When you have proved that you care for the pupil, that shy being will care for the message. For we believe in people before we believe in what they tell us, and the reception of a message is strangely dependent on the reliability of the messenger.

The other phase of devotion, pulsating and hidden, is the devotion of the teacher to Jesus Christ. Jesus Christ is God. He is God in the World. He is the pilgrim's picture of the divine, active in common life. We pray to Him, for He is God; we commune with Him, for the bread and wine are the life of God; we fit His action to our environment, knowing that it will work. Our pupils will intuitively take knowledge of us whether or not we have been with Jesus. The only way to win pupils to Christ is first to have been won by Him.

BIBLE QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

(Our readers are invited to send in their questions from time to time concerning Scriptural subjects in which they are perplexed or desire light. Our limited space necessitates brevity in questions, as well as in the answers which we will endeavor to maintain in strict accord with the Word of the Lord which, after all, settles all argument. This column is therefore not for controversy, but for a testimony.)

Question No. 19.—Is there hope for a backslider, and how would you deal with him?"—D. E. P.

Answer.—Yes, an abundant hope, but I would first find out if he really is a backslider; for, if the person in question was truly born into the family of God, he is still a son. This can be tested by his present attitude toward John 3:16; 5:24; and Rom. 10:9.

If still a believer he is doubtless in the position of a wayward son, and if penitent, should have his attention called to 1 John 1:8, 9; and 1 John 2:1. Sin interrupts fellowship with God, while confession restores it. Persistent sinning will result in chastisement and loss of rewards. (See numerous passages of Scripture on the subject.) A full surrender to Christ and not again be enticed by the beggarly elements of the world, is the only safeguard.

Question No. 20.—Is baptism by immersion really essential to salvation?—M. J.

Answer.—Apparently not. See Rom. 10:9, and other precious promises, remembering also our Lord's reply to the penitent thief, "Today shalt thou be with me in paradise."

Baptism by immersion is a beautiful symbol of the new birth however, as well as a strong testimony, and all who are so led may rest assured that in following such ceremony, they have the approval of the Master Himself (Luke 3:21).

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSE.

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice, eternal treasures, indeed. "Thy word have I hid in my heart, that I might not sin against thee." Ps. 119:11.)

This week the following verse was submitted by

Miss Lydia Hannam, of Chester Heights, Pennsylvania:

> "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life" (St. John 3:16).

Who will send one from the far-away places as well as very near us?

LETTERS OF JACKSON.

THE value of letters in the study of great men cannot be over-valued. In them we find the unguarded utterances of friend to friend, or important statements in history-making and the estimates of contemporaries. A complete file of letters is one of the best biographies of historical personages. The letters I am about to submit marked the most critical moments in the life of the great Southern leader, while at the same time they reveal his intense devotion for the cause he espoused and his unshaken conviction of its righteousness.

Fort Hamilton, Long Island, N. Y.,
February 2, 1849.

Dear Sir:

Having to a great extent recovered my strength, I hope my health, I take pleasure in returning you my most sincere thanks for your repeated kindness towards me; hoping at the same time, that some opportunity may present itself, of discharging my debt of gratitude in some other way: though at present, I must admit, that I can not see very clearly in what way I can ever be serviceable to you; though should that opportunity never present itself, I well know from the interest you have taken in my welfare, that you will consider yourself compensated, if I but turn to the best advantage, the opportunities which your exertions in my behalf, have, and may hereafter give me.

I regret that I could not have had an occasion of conversing a moment with you at our last meeting; you might have given me some information, which I could not otherwise acquire.

I believe that the list of brevets is now being made out, and from what you intimated to me, and from information received since, and the strong grounds on which I have been presented, I have but little or no doubt but that I shall be advanced; provided my claims should be presented to the Secretary of War; but I am afraid that the case may, from forgetfulness, not be brought to his consideration at this time; as the list is being filled up.

I would be glad to converse with you; as I know that my conversation would be directed to my best friend; but that pleasure I must forego for the present. My sense of gratitude for the interest which you have taken in my welfare is easier to be appreciated by the heart than to be expressed by words.

I purpose, with the blessings of Providence, to be a hard student, and to make myself not only acquainted with military art and science; but with politics, and of course, must be well versed in history. My historical studies I have arranged in the following order: first, a general history, ancient and modern, and then, special histories of important events, countries, etc.

I have commenced with Rollins Ancient History, and have read about one-fourth of it; reading about forty or fifty pages per day.

You will please answer this, and remember me to your family, those absent, as well as at home.

The gold fever is running quite high here; I have conversed with Mr. Loeser, an officer of the army, from the gold mines, and who brought a quantity of the precious metal with him; the dust consists of scales, of which he brought a vial full, holding the value of a hundred dollars; and its appearance is that of scale, instead of sand, as I had formerly imagined it to be; he also brought a solid piece weighing probably more than an ounce.

This officer stated to me that the average gathering there was about 90 dollars per day, but that everything was extremely high. The climate, he says, is charming, the thermometer ranging from 60 to 70 degrees.

This post is about ten miles below N. Y. City, and on the east bank of the Hudson, or North river, and is a delightful station.

Your sincere friend,

T. J. Jackson.

Col. Samuel L. Hays.

This is a copy of the original. Col. Hays secured "Stonewall" Jackson his appointment to West Point Military Academy, being his congressman. The copy was furnished me by a granddaughter of Col. Hays.

I am indebted to the Hon. Lewis Bennett, of Weston, W. Va., for the following contributions to Jackson's history. They are remnants of a great number, lost in the confusion incident to the fall of Richmond. Jackson is never thought of as having any of the instincts of a politician. The subjoined letter shows his keen interest in local affairs in Lewis County, and his readiness if he had been in a position both to electioneer and to go on the stump. It is a new light on his career, and marks the intensity of his feeling for party success. It was written from the quiet precincts of his professor's chair—but in no sense is academic, but militant:

Lexington, Va., April 17, 1860.

My Dear Friend:

I am anxious to see us possess that influence in our section of the State that will enable us to secure any office there, by merely nominating a suitable person and concentrating our strength upon him, and now in my opinion is the time to test our strength by electing Wm. L. Jackson to the judgship. Of course ——— influence will be vigorously exerted to defeat him, but it appears to me that the united influence of ———, with their relations, connections and friends, ought to prevail over ——— influence, even in Lewis and Braxton, where I suppose it is strongest. I have been told by a member of the old Whig Party that W. L. J. is one of the shrewdest political managers of his party in the State, and I am in hopes that with his influence united to that of his friends we may be able to set up for ourselves. All of us who may be looking forward to advancement may expect to have prospects brightened by Jackson's election and diminished by his defeat. Being a professor my hands are tied so that I can not appear in the canvass—all I can do is to write to my friends. I would like to take an active part in the canvass if it were practicable. You have a strong arm, and I think with it you may carry Lewis and Braxton. I have written with that freedom which I always desire from you to me. Please say nothing about the contents of this, but if you think as I do upon the subject, I hope that you will if possible give Lewis and Braxton to Wm. If I can be of any service, let me know how it can be rendered. I will always be glad to hear from you.

Very truly yours,

T. J. Jackson.

Copy of a letter from T. J. (Stonewall) Jackson to Hon. Jonathan M. Bennett, of Weston, W. Va. This copy was made by Lewis Bennett on March 20, 1907, and the original loaned to Hon. Virgil A. Lewis for use at the Jamestown Exposition:

The following letters are most interesting as giving the several steps by which Co. T. J. Jackson received his commission as commander of the immortal "Stonewall Brigade.' One can see the desire of Jackson to serve as well as command. Possibly no one ever did as much for Jackson as did his life-long friend, Hon. Jonathon M. Bennett. He secured him his appointment as a Cadet to West Point, and he also secured him his commission as Brigadier of Virginia forces in the Army of the Confederacy.

The following letter is in answer to one received by Jackson proposing to secure him a commission as Brigadier. Had Jackson on appointment been sent into West Virginia no one can forecast results:

Headquarters, Va. Forces.

Harper's Ferry, June 5, 1861.

My Dear Colonel:

Your very kind letter—proposing, if I so desire, to make me a Brigadier General and send me to the North West in command of all Troops of that region, has been received, and meets my grateful approbation. The sooner it is done the better. Have me ordered at once. That country is now bleeding at every pore. I feel a deep interest in it and have never appealed to its people in vain, and trust it may not be so now. I agree with you fully respecting the advantages named in your letter. Remember me kindly to Judge Allen and thank him for his kindness. Believe me with lasting gratitude ever yours,

T. J. Jackson.

Copy made October 5, 1909, by Louis Bennett of a letter written by "Stonewall" Jackson to Jonathan M. Bennett, then Auditor of the State of Virginia.

Jackson, fearing some miscarriage might prevent the letter mailed to Hon. J. M. Bennett reaching its destination, followed it by another, sent by personal messenger. It reads as follows:

Harpers Ferry, June 5, 1861.

My Dear Colonel:

Lest the letter mailed this morning, and in which I thankfully accepted the opportunity of being made a Brigadier General and put in command of all the North Western Troops should fail to reach you, I send this by private hands. Please have me ordered forthwith.

Very gratefully yours,

T. J. Jackson.

Copy of a letter written by T. J. Jackson ("Stonewall") to J. M. Bennett, then Auditor of the State of Virginia, made by Lewis Bennett on October 5, 1909.

One more letter bearing on this subject is furnished me by Hon. Lewis Bennett, son of the Hon. M. J. Bennett and one of his executors. In the interval between the last two and this, Hon. J. M. Bennett had not as yet succeeded in getting the commission of Brigadier. Later he secured the commission.

Headquarters 1st Brigade,
Camp Stevens, June 24, 1861.

My Dear Colonel:

At present I am in command of the Va. Vols. organized into the 1st Brigade of the Army of the Shenandoah, and have my Headquarters on the road from Martinsburg to Williamsport, and about four miles distant from the former place. On Saturday last the enemy commenced crossing at Williamsport into Va. and immediately advanced with one Regt. of Infantry and a Battery of Arty., but it mounted to nothing, as the enemy recrossed the river into Maryland. They are evidently afraid to advance.

In your last you stated: "I presume all commissions will issue from the Confederate Government; if so, I have no pledge for any commission, but I shall never cease until I get it. You will hear from me soon again." Knowing your success in carrying your measures, the energy with which you press them, and not having heard from you, the thought struck me that there might be some obstacle in the way which, if made known to me, I might be able to remove. I am in command of a promising Brigade, and I would be greatly gratified if you could secure me a Brigadier Generalcy, and if I cannot be ordered to North Western Virginia, of course I would be continued in my present command, and as I am so far West, an opportunity might soon offer of having me with my command ordered into that region. Providence has greatly blessed me in securing good staff officers in the Quartermaster, Commissary and Ordnance Departments, which are so essential to the efficiency of the troops. All are anxious for active service. I feel deeply for my own section of the State, and would, as a Brigadier General, willingly serve under General Garnett in its defense. I know him well. There are three Brigades under General Johnston, and a few days since Brigadier General Bee was assigned to the command of one of them, and at any time, so far as I know, another may be assigned to the command of mine, unless you can induce President Davis to make the appointment soon by my promotion.

Please let me hear from you when convenient, and ever believe me your grateful friend,

T. J. Jackson.

Please direct your answer to Martinsburg, Berkley County.

CHURCH UNION IN SOUTH INDIA.

To the Episcopal Recorder we are indebted for the following concise account of the Movement for Church Union in South India:

If the plan of Church union proposed for South India should be consummated, it would be the first union combining churches that emphasize the tradition of the undivided Church with churches that emphasize the heritage of the Reformation. To state the situation more precisely, the South India proposal contemplates a union between the Anglican Church, on the one hand, and the Methodist, Presbyterian and Congregational groups on the other.

The path for such an epoch-making union was prepared more than twenty years ago by the formation (in 1908) of the South India United Church, itself a union of the Presbyterian, Reformed and Congregational bodies in that area, growing out of American, English and Scottish missions. The new plan would provide for the merger of this United Church of South India with the Church of England in India and Ceylon and the Provincial Synod of the Wesleyan Methodist Church.

The "proposed Scheme of Union," originating at an informal meeting ten years ago, took final form at a meeting of a joint committee, representing all the interested churches, in March, 1929, and is now before the official governing bodies of the respective ecclesiastical groups for their approval or disapproval.

The essential points in the plan are as follows:

1. The Holy Scriptures, the Apostles' Creed and the Nicene Creed constitute the basis of faith.

2. The historical episcopate in a constitutional form is accepted; that is, bishops will be elected by the Church and their powers defined in a written constitution. It is agreed that there is no intent "to imply, or to express a judgment on, any theory concerning episcopacy.

3. It is the "intention and expectation" of the uniting churches that eventually all ministers will be episcopally ordained; but for a period of thirty years all ministers ordained in any one of the churches shall be "received as ministers of the United Church," if they accept the basis of union; with the understanding, however, that a minister not episcopally ordained shall not be transferred to, or minister temporarily in, a congregation accustomed to an episcopally ordained ministry, without the unanimous consent of its communicant members.

4. Bishops will be episcopally ordained, but at the first service of consecration (at which the union will be inaugurated) the Anglican bishops and the ministers of the South India United Church and of the Wesleyan Church shall lay hands on the heads of the new bishops, "thus conserving for the United Church the traditions held by each of the uniting bodies," and expressing a mutual recognition of the equality of the ministry of the several churches.

The union, if ratified, would bring into the one church over 448,000 baptized Christians, with additional adherents bringing the total constiteuncy up to nearly 740,000.

MARTIN BOOS: By Arno C. Gaebelein, D. D. Cloth. Pp. 77. Published by Our Hope Publishing Company, 456 Fifth Avenue, New York City. Price, 75c.

So accustomed are we to meeting Dr. Gaebelein in the field of Biblical exposition, that this contribution is a pleasurable expression of his capacity for biography.

The story of Martin Boos, born December 25, 1761, is the record of another Luther, persecuted by the ruling Church, of which he was a faithful priest, for preaching the true Gospel of our Lord Jesus as Redeemer and King. So loyal had he been to the rules and habits of his calling that he was wont to afflict himself in order to subdue the flesh and give the spirit triumphant supremacy. Yet captured by the grace of God in his own soul and committed by God to give that experience to others, he willingly subjected himself to the cruelty of the prevailing ecclesiasticism of his day.

No marvel, that while not excommunicating him, seemingly only to torment and to destroy him by slow processes, the Church he loved to served, witnessed in the midst of one of its harrowing examinations the stroke of paralysis by which at the age of fifty-one, this virile man was felled. But to win at last, as it always has, this proud relentless Church, deposed its devoted priest and he became an exile, to gain in the end a truly martyr's grave at the age of sixty-three. But by just such lives and just such passings has the progress of the Gospel been signalized in blood and tears.

THE NATURAL YEAR: By Frederick Edwards. Cloth. Pp. 71. Published by William Albert Broder, 120 Seventy-fourth, New York City. Price, $1.50.

The author, late Dean of St. Paul's Cathedral, Detroit, Mich., and for several years president of the American Society for Psychical Research, here presents to us a portion of his intended course, covering the twelve months of the year, the present being the number December. This, from the pen of a Churchman, would essentially include Advent and Christmas.

As a poet, the author shows the rare capacity to sit still before a fact and translate it into rythmic action. He sees what we miss who are pressed by the crowd into ceaseless activity. We need him therefore as a balance in the great wheel of life.

If every number is as good as this, the entire course will be worth possessing. Here is another voice calling us to dare to meditate. Who of us is the more thoughtful and contemplative because of the stirring and momentous events which have shaken the world during the past quarter of a century. Of it he writes: "That period was marked by great changes in science, philosophy and church life. It covers the Great War in which I have suffered—I have lived." Surely no man can be a poet who has not endured sorrow and loss; nor yet can any man be a great Christian who is unacquainted with the fires of affliction.

CALVARY TODAY: By Bishop Charles Fiske, D. D. Cloth. Pp. 105. Published by The Morehouse Publishing Company, Milwaukee, Wisconsin. Price, $1.

The prolific pen of this ever active prelate has now given us a strong series of Good Friday Three Hour Addresses He concedes that the chapters herein contained were the sermons he preached to a crowded congregation at Trinity Church, New York; and that they are in print because requested by interested listeners.

We usually find the Three Hour Addresses of a like class and form. But no one can believe that Bishop Fiske could hold himself to any pathway trodden by others. And yet the novelty, if we may call it that, is not other than wholesome and winning.

The book is wisely published in time for thoughtful preachers to secure a fresh stimulant to thought and an inspiring impulse to heart-appeal.

CORRECTION.

Mr. Editor:

In your issue of December 7, 1929, I find a list of questions under the heading, "How Many Can You Answer?" One question reads, "Who first translated the Bible into Latin?" and the answer given is, "St. Jerome." This is a mistake. At least one Latin version of the Bible existed long before Jerome's time, namely, the Vetus Latina (not vetus Itala, a phrase not used by scholars). The learned Benedictine, Dr. Gasquet, says as follows: "The Latin text of the Sacred Scriptures existed from the earliest times of Christianity. The translator or translators were unknown to St. Augustine and St. Jerome; but the former says that the old Latin version had certainly come 'from the first days of the Faith,' and the latter that it 'had helped to strengthen the faith of the infant Church. St. Jerome revised and corrected the then existing Latin text, re-translating many passages anew, collating the text with 'Greek and other MSS., even at that time considered ancient, which are not now known to exist. He could compare dozens of important texts, and he had Origen's 'Hexapla' and other means of determining the value of his material, which we do not possess'."

A TRIBUTE, THE LATE BISHOP BEVERLEY D. TUCKER.

Mr. Editor:

The American Church, in recent days, has lost two of its greatest and ablest Episcopal leaders; and, in the departure of Bishops Murray and Tucker, the Colored work of the country has lost its foremost friends and advocates.

The late Bishop Beverley D. Tucker enjoyed the distinction of having laid his hands in Confirmation, on the heads of more Colored people, and admitted to the sacred ministry, more Colored men, than any other Bishop, living or dead. There was not the least feeling of "prejudice' in him with respect to the Colored members of his Episcopal family. He really loved the Colored people, and this love was innate. Like Bishop Murray, he was absolutely, and firmly, set against any official recognition of the "color-line." The writer of this tribute can never forget him, for he not only examined us for the ministry, and presented us for priest's orders, but under him we served our diaconate. The late Bishop Whittle ever manifested an affectionate interest in the writer, and on the eve of our ordination to the diaconate, addressed a letter to each of the Norfolk rectors on our behalf. In a long letter in reply to Bishop Whittle's epistle, Rev. Dr. Tucker, in part said: "Yours in reference to Mr. Bragg has been received. I promise to pay $100 a year from St. Paul's Church towards his support. I will gladly do anything to help his work here. I am in hopes that Mr. Bragg will do well." Bishop Tucker was a great and good man, and he loved our people with a faithful and true heart, and shepherded them diligently and lovingly with all his powers.

CONVENTIONS, COUNCILS, CONVOCATIONS

ARKANSAS.

The fifty-eighth annual convention of the Diocese of Arkansas convened in Trinity Church, Van Buren, at 9:30 on Wednesday morning, January 15.

Bishop James R. Winchester, the Bishop of the Diocese, was not able to attend on account of ill health. The first service was the Holy Communion, in which the Suffragan-Bishop, the Rt. Rev. Edwin M. Saphore, was the celebrant, assisted by the Rev. David Jones, rector of Trinity Church, and the Rev. C. C. Burks, President of the Standing Committee.

Bishop Winchester's address was read by the Rev. C. C. Burke. Four clergymen had left the diocese during the year, and three had been received.

The Bishop requested that Bishop Saphore take his place during the convention, and represent him.

Messages of sympathy and greeting were sent by the convention to Bishop Winchester, and the Rev. J. W. Thompson, who is ill.

Laymen Speak at Luncheon: All of the speakers at luncheon on the first day were laymen. Mr. Sylvester Matteson spoke on the History of the Church. Mr. Grover Owen stressed the importance of business principles in the operation of parishes and dioceses. Mr. Thomas E. Wood emphasized the importance of the personnel in the work. Bishop Edward T. Denby, Negro Suffragan, told of the need of the Negro race for the Church, and of its wonderful effect upon them. He related the wonderful record that was made in the Negro schools. Their religion becomes a reality to them, and arrests for law-violation are unknown.

Afternoon Business: Bishop Saphore made his report of visitation, and they were numerous. He had confirmed 191.

Bishop Saphore has charge of the Pension Fund interests of the diocese. Only two parishes are not affiliated with the pension fund, namely the Good Shepherd, Forest City, and St. Mark's, Jonesboro. All other parishes had paid their assessments to the Fund.

Bishop Denby made a report of his work. He has in his care all the Negro work in the Seventh Province also. He reported twenty confirmed in this diocese and sixty-six in this province. Although no quotas were given to the Negro missions, two-thirds of them had paid in full what would have been a fair quota for the Church Program.

In the business session the second day the treasurer reported that the churches had fallen short on paying their quotas.

The examining chaplains reported Mr. Paul Newell as having been examined and passed for Holy Orders. There was also a postulant.

The Rev. C. C. Burke was appointed trustee to represent this diocese on the Sewanee Board. The University of the South reported the largest attendance in its history.

Another important change was mad in the canons bearing on the election o a vestry. This same matter is discusse every year. The law has been that one third shall be elected annually to serv three years. Last year an exception wa made for parishes having only nine eli gible. Now, another exception is mad in the case of parishes having less tha fifty eligible men. They may reelec whom they please.

An important change was made when the time for the meeting date of future conventions was made the fourth Wednesday in April, instead of the third in January. The reports will be for the year ending December 31.

The meeting place for the convention next year will be Trinity Cathedral, Little Rock.

Elections: Thomas E. Wood, of Little Rock was elected Secretary of the Diocese, and S. A. Pernot, of Van Buren, Treasurer.

Members of Standing Committee: The Rev. H. A. Stowell, Pine Bluff; the Rev. Randolph R. Claiborne, Camden; the Rev. C. C. Burke, Marianna; the Rev. John M. Williamson, Little Rock. Laymen—R. E. Lee, Pine Bluff; J. A. Coates, Jr., Little Rock; Sylvester Matteson, Mena.

Board of Trustees: The Rev. John M. Williamson and the Rev. W. P. Witsell; Messrs. D. L. Phillips, John A. Coates, Jr., Morehead Wright and A. N. Tanner.

Executive Council of the Diocese: The Rt. Rev. James R. Winchester, D. D., the Rt. Rev. Edwin W. Saphore, D. D., the Rev. C. F. Collins, the Rev. W. P. Witsell, D. D., the Rev. S. H. Rainey, the Very Rev. John Williamson, the Rev. H. A. Stowell; Messrs. T. E. Wood, John D. Barlow, H. J. Coomber, the Rev. C. F. Collins, the Rev. David Jones, Grover Owens, W. L. Ford, W. W. Maxwell.

Examining Chaplains: The Rev. W. P. Witsell, D. D., the Very Rev. John Williamson, the Rev. H. A. Stowell, the Rev. C. F. Collins.

Delegates to the Synod of the Seventh Province: The Rev. H. A. Stowell, the Rev. W. P. Witsell, D. D., the Rev. C. C. Burke, the Rev. Elnathan Tartt, the Rev. C. F. Collins, the Very Rev. John Williamson, J. C. Fitzhugh, C. D. James, Thomas E. Wood.

Woman's Auxiliary: The annual meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary was held at the same time as the convention. Much work was done, and there were many entertainments given for the members of each organization. All reports showed that the Auxiliary made its usual fine record. If there be any slacking up, it is not in the members of the Auxiliary.

Mrs. Hanson A. Stowell, of Pine Bluff, was elected President; Mrs. A. N. Tanner, First Vice-President; Mrs. William Gamble, Little Rock; Second Vice-President. The Treasurer is Mrs. Clifton Dancy, of Pine Bluff; Mrs. N. W. Campbell, Little Rock is Secretary. Mrs. F N. Burke, Fayetteville, Custodian United Thank Offering; Mrs. H. C. Saunders Newport, Secretary of Box Supply.

The Auxiliary has been constantly an inspiration to the whole diocese; and i is certain that if the men of the church and the women who are not member did as well as the members of the Woman's Auxiliary, everything would go forward with enthusiasm.

NORTH TEXAS.

The twentieth annual convocation o the Missionary District of North Texa met in St. Andrew's Church, Amarillo exas, January 19, at 11 A. M., and con nued in session until 4 P. M., Tues ay.

Sunday was devoted to inspirational ervices, in which all of the ministers f the district participated.

Bishop E. Cecil Seaman was the cele rant in the Holy Communion Service, nd the Rev. Carrol M. Davis, LL. D., omestic Secretary of the National ouncil Department of Missions was the onvocation preacher.

The Convocation and the Woman's uxiliary of the District made a pil rimage to the new Little House of Fel owship, which has been recently com leted and is used as a non-denomina tional student center by the students nd faculty of the West Texas State eachers' College.

The night services were a special service by the Young People's Service League; and the twentieth anniversary service of thanksgiving and rededication; with all of the clergy of the district present and vested.

The speakers at this service were: Mr. Thomas R. Smith, "The Laymen of North Texas"; the Rev. Willis P. Gerhart, "The District Clergy"; the Rev. Thomsen, D. D., minister of Central Presbyterian Church, Amarillo, "Other Christians in this District," and the Rev. Carrol M. Davis, D. D., "The National Council and North Texas."

The Monday session began with Holy Communion, followed by the joint meeting of the Convocation and the Woman's Auxiliary. Mrs. J. C. Tolman made a short, inspirational talk at the close of this session.

The Y. P. S. L. of St. Andrew's Church, Amarillo, presented the playlet, "The Color Line", in a very effectice manner at the night meeting.

At the Tuesday sessions the following appointments and elections were made: Chancellor of District of North Texas, Mr. Joseph B. Dooley, Amarillo; Registrar of the District, the Rev. William H. Martin, Big Spring; Treasurer, Mr. C. J. E. Lowndes, Amarillo; Secretary of Convocation, the Rev. William H. Martin; Treasurer of Church Pension Fund, Mr. W. W. Rix, Lubbock; Treasurer of Field Department, Mr. Henry S. Gooch, Amarillo; Treasurer of Bishop Temple Fund, Mr. Will Stith, Abilene.

After receiving the departmental reports, and the report of the Committee on the State of the Church, which shows gratifying growth and healthy interest in all things affecting the spiritual life of the Church, the Convocation and the Woman's Auxiliary adjourned to meet in Emmanuel Church, San Angelo, Sunday, January 25, 1931.

ALABAMA.

Birmingham, Alabama.—With one of he largest attendance in its history, the inety-ninth annual council of the Dioese of Alabama convened at the Church f the Advent, Birmingham, January 2-23. The Rev. David R. Covell, Field ecretary of the National Council, was he speaker at the opening service. 'God's Great Family" was his theme, nd became the keynote of the council, ounded frequently throughout its ses ion.

Not in vain did the Bishop urge, in is council address that "more heed be iven to the Still Small Voice than to he reading of reports of committees, nd that there should be more search g of hearts than of train schedules"; or signs of the Spirit's presence were ot wanting. Bishop McDowell suggested the perfection of plans for the celebration of the one hunderdth anniversary of the diocese to be held in January, 1931, at Christ Church, Mobile. He called attention to the graduation of the first class from the Bishop Wilmer Training School for Deaconesses, situated in Mobile. Mention was also made of the large number and high order of men seeking Holy Orders in the diocese, several of whom are turning to the Church from the ministries of other denominations. The Council heard with satisfaction that the diocese had not only lived within its income for the past year, but that a large deficit had been so reduced that it could be, and was, provided for before adjournment, and all this in the face of great financial stringency throughout the state.

The Bishop was authorized to appoint a committee on clergy placement, to study the whole matter and report to the next annual council. Meanwhile the Bishop announced that he was already undertaking in a small way the experiment suggested by the Commission on the Ministry, with the assistance of the Diocesan Standing Committee.

A radical change in policy was effected, whereby the department of missions of the diocese was to assume only that part of the salaries of its missionaries supplementary to amounts pledged by the missions themselves, and that each mission treasurer should pay its portion of the salary directly to the missionary himself; and not, as heretofore, through the diocesan department of missions.

Another forward step was noted in the erection of a complete church plant at Auburn, Alabama, by means of pledges made by virtually every congregation throughout the diocese, covering a three year period. At Auburn is located the Alabama Polytechnic Institute, necessitating more elaborate buildings than the local congregation was able to erect. Completing this, the diocese contemplates a similar undertaking at Montevallo, home of the Alabama Woman's College.

In the report on Colored Work, by the Rev. C. W. Brooks, it was noted that every Colored congregation in the diocese had met in full its obligations to the diocese and General Church. The Council listened with deep interest to the address of the Rev. R. C. Fletcher, missionary to the deaf and dumb of the Fourth Province; who, though totally deaf himself, spoke with clear and pleasing intonation, outlining far-seeing plans for work among deaf mutes in the Province.

The work of the Woman's Auxiliary was presented by Mrs. Albert F Wilson, Diocesan President, and Mr. D. E. Wilson, Diocesan Educational Secretary. Miss Ruth Bettner presented the work of the Young People's Service League; Miss Helen McLane told of St. Barnabas' Guild; and Miss Ella Charles discussed the Church Mission of Help, in which she is doing such outstanding service in the Birmingham District, with the Church of the Advent as its centre.

Members of Council were invited to a banquet served in the Parish House of the Advent on the evening of the first day of Council, as guests of the congregation. Addresses were made by the rector, the Rev. Charles Clingman, D. D., who introduced the other speakers: the Bishop of the Diocese, the Rev. R. A. Kirchhoffer of Mobile, and the Rev. Bland Mitchell of Birmingham.

All diocesan officers were reelected. The council rose in honor of Mr. R. H. Cochran, who entered upon his thirtieth year of service as treasurer of the diocese.

Deputies to the Provincial Synod were elected as follows: Clerical—the Rev. Charles Clingman, D. D., the Rev. P. N. McDonald, the Rev. V. C. McMaster, the Rev. Bland Mitchell, the Rev. G. W. Ribble, D. D., the Rev. G. C. Tucker. Lay—Messrs. W. T. Archer, Algernon Blair, Farres Coleman, R. R. Randolph, F. E. Feltus, S. E. Thompson.

The day preceding council was marked by an informal conference of the clergy of the diocese, called by the Bishop to consider: (1) Changes in Public Worship under the Revised Prayer Book; (2) Placement of the Clergy; (3) Financial Problems of the Diocese Regarding its Missionary Work. This conference was for discussion only, in order that more intelligent action might be secured by Council in session the following day.

ATLANTA.

The twenty-third annual council of the Diocese of Atlanta, together with the annual meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary and the semi-annual session of the Daughters of the King was in session in All Saints' Church, Atlanta, Ga., January 22-23.

Preceding the meeting of Council on Tuesday night, the Executive Board of the diocese held its annual meeting, at which the Rev. F. H. Harding, Treasurer of the Nation-Wide Campaign Fund, made his report for the year, which showed every Diocesan obligation had been paid and that a balance was on hand.

The meeting of the Board was concerned chiefly with the pledges and program for the coming year.

At the meeting of the council the following elections were held: The Rev. F. H. Harding was reelected Secretary, and named the Rev. J. D. C. Wilson, Assistant Secretary.

Standing Committee: The Rev. Messrs. S. Alston Wragg, W. W. Memminger, D. D., and the Rev. C. E. Bentley; Messrs. Z. D. Harrison, D. C. L., Judge E. E. Poneroy and Dr. G. H. Noble, Sr.

The membership of the Executive Board of the diocese was named the same as last year with the exception of the addition of the name of Mr. Francis E. Williams.

Delegates to the Provincial Synod: The Rev. W. W. Memminger, D. D., the Rev. Messrs. F. H. Harding, J. D. C. Wilson, C. E. Bentley, S. A. Wragg and N. R. High Moor. Lay Delegates—Messrs. Wm. Parker, Jr., John Glenn, Dr. G. H. Noble, Sr., H. M. Heckman, Francis E. Williams and Walter J. Single. Alternates: Clergy—Dr. G. W. Gasque, Ernest Risley, Charles Holding, George H. Harris, G. G. Rogers and W. W. Silliman. Lay Members—Miss Florence Blair, Robert Quinlan, A. B. Clarke, J. B. Greenleaf, L. N. Robert and Charles De Foor.

Trustees of the University of the South: The Rev. S. A. Wragg, Dr. G. H. Noble, Sr., and David Woodward.

Examining Chaplains: The Rev. Messrs. N. R. High Moor, the Very Rev. Raimundo de Ovies, H. F. Saumenig, and C. E. Bentley.

The Council included in its budget the provision for a $17,500 life insurance policy for the benefit of the wife and daughter of its Bishop.

The diocese, realizing that sufficient provision is not yet made for the dependents of the clergy, is endeavoring in this way to provide for the dependents of its Bishop; and by group insurance to protect its clergy.

The following were reelected officers of the diocese: The Hon. Robert C. Alston, D. C. L., Chancelor; the Rev. Thos. Duck, Registrar; Mac C. Dexter, Treasurer, and the Rev. F. H. Harding, Treasurer of the Nation-Wide Campaign Fund.

The matter of the placement of the clergy was brought to the attention of the council and a special committee was appointed to take the matter under advisement and report to the next Council.

At the night service, the Bishop of the Diocese, the Rt. Rev. H. J. Mikell, D. D., read his annual address, and the Rev. David R. Covell, representing the National Council, who is making his home in Atlanta, was the special speaker.

The Rev. Cary Montague, D. D., of Richmond, Va., was a special speaker at a meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary, and presented the subject of "Christian Social Service."

TENNESSEE.

Bishop Gailor, in his address at the opening service of the ninety-eighth convention of the Diocese of Tennessee, held in Grace Church, Memphis, the Rev. Charles T. Wright, D. D., rector, January 22 and 23, strongly emphasized and insisted upon the General Church Program as of primary obligation upon diocese and parish, saying in part: "This Mission to all the world is the raison d'etre, the very reason for the existence of the Church. And in order to facilitate this missionary service, to make it more effective, the Church, at a very early date, organized itself into groups, which came to be called dioceses and parishes. But manifestly the dioceses and parishes are nothing more than operating agencies, by which the Church may be enabled to carry on more effectively its world-wide mission in obedience to Our Lord's Command. Therefore, it would be a most unfortunate and mischievous result, if the dioceses and parishes should become so absorbed in their own private affairs, that they were unable to contribute to the work of the Church at large. Imagine the captain of a company in time of war reporting to the colonel, that his company could not fight, because they were busy getting new uniforms and practicing fancy drills. And yet, that seems to be the temptation, yielded to by some dioceses and some parishes. They spend so much upon themselves, their buildings and accessories of worship, that they cannot afford to contribute their quota to the work of the National Church."

Following their diocesan's lead, the delegates in convention again voted, after prolonged debate, to place in the budget the full quota from the National Council of $29,600, despite the experience in 1929 of failing by several thousands dollars to balance the diocesan budget. Definite plans were made for a vigorous campaign to supply all deficiencies in 1930 expectancies as well as to clear up all arrears. On actual quota acceptances by parishes, the 1929 showing was remarkably good, 97.97 per cent being collected. Acceptances for 1930 showed large increases on the part of a number of parishes.

The outstanding piece of legislation by the convention was the ratification of the constitutional amendment proposed last year, restoring the Negro clergy and congregations to their original status, as prior to 1909, of direct representation in Convention.

All officials were reelected, as were the Deputies to the Provincial Synod. New members of the Bishop and Council, succeeding those ineligible for reelection under the canon, are: the Ven. Henry J. Geiger, Archdeacon of East Tennessee; the Rev. Edmund P. Dandridge, D. D., of Nashville; Judge Arthur Crownover, of Nashville, and Mr. George K. Brown, of Chattanooga. An effort to amend the canon so as to allow continuous service beyond the limit of "one full term of three years" was defeated.

MARYLAND.

Bishop Helfenstein made an excellent address in opening the one hundred and forty-sixth annual convention of the Diocese of Maryland, held in the Church of the Prince of Peace, Walbrook, January 22-23. After giving the year's statistics, he dwelt briefly on the Revised Prayer Book, saying: "It is now part of that Doctrine, Discipline and Worship to which we solemnly promised conformity at our Ordination. It should command our loyal acceptance and conscientious use, without forbidden omissions or unlawful additions." He then urged that Maryland give the same support to Bishop Anderson as she had done to Bishop Murray, in the work of the National Church, stating that "it is his due and our obligation." He called attention to Canon 23 of the General Church and to the Canons on "Transfers" and "Marriage and Divorce."

The Canon referring to the Executive Council was amended to drop one member of each order every year, the Council to have the right to determine the method. A new Canon was proposed and carried whereby a Central Register is to be established at the Diocesan House.

The Rev. Dr. Arthur Chilton Powell presented the report on the Cathedral and told of two bequests amounting to nearly $50,000 being turned over to the Cathedral fund in the last few days. Four legacies in the last two years have been turned over to this Fund aggregating $125,000.

When the Budget for 1930 was presented, it was reported that the Executive Council had felt authorized to pledge only $65,000 to the National Council out of the $75,100 apportioned to Maryland for 1930. After increases in pledges had been presented by several parishes from the floor of the convention, the convention unanimously authorized the Bishop to accept the quota in full.

Members of the Standing Committee and the Executive Council were elected, and the following delegates elected to the Provincial Synod: Clerical—the Rev. Messrs. Roger A. Walke, Wm. O. Smith. Jr., D. D., Philip J. Jensen, James A. Mitchell. Lay—Messrs. Herbert Boehm, Adrian H. Onderdonk, John G. Schlipp, Thomas Fell.

FLIPPANCY MISPLACED.

Says The Arkansas Churchman:

"While we read The New York Churchman, we cannot say that we hold it in exceptional high favor. Too frequently it appears to us, it lends to the truly sacred things—the Godly and spiritual—an air of flippancy and abandon. It leans too much to the flare of sensationalism. Too often magnifying the little things and minimizing the really great ones. This is a style of journalism that may popularize the publication, but as to whether it will popularize Christianity and the Church is another question."

Church Intelligence

Dr. Glazebrook Resumes His Missionary Journey.

Dr. Larkin W. Glazebrook, on an evangelistic tour of the Far Western provinces, after a brief rest during the Christmas holidays, is back on the job and writes:

"I am afraid we of the East do not quite understand the great land of the West. There is a real call to 'He-Men' out here. The harvest is ripe. Those here are working whole-heartedly for their Master. Young men, full of vigor and with a vision to serve their Master, will find here a field that they will not soon leave."

The formal report to the Rt. Rev. William Hall Moreland of the Visitation to the Diocese of Sacramento (California), follows:

After two weeks spent in summer home of Bishop Stevens at beautiful Del Mar (it being impractical to make any appointments for the Christmas period), I left January 3, 1930 (Los Angeles), at 8:15 P. M.; arriving the next day at San Francisco; leaving at 4 P. M. for Naya; arriving there on the fourth at 6 P. M.

January 4, 7:30 P. M., addressed the ministerial group of seven clergy.

January 5, 9:30 A. M., spoke to about sixty-five children of the Sunday school; 11 A. M., spoke to congregation of sixty-five; a most cordial reception by the Rev. Mr. Child and his people. It was a rainy day. Took two o'clock bus for Santa Rosa; arrived at 4 P. M., met by the Rev. Mr. Clark; 5 P. M., spoke to a congregation of about 125, splendid reactions; 7 P. M., the rector and his wife invited about twenty to supper; we had a most worthwhile after meeting, continuing until 10:30 P. M.

January 6, Mr. Clark drove me to see the great redwood forest en route to Petulema, where the Rev. Mr. Mainwaring met me and took me to a meeting of his Guild (20); whom I was privileged to address; 8 P. M., spoke in the church to about sixty-five; afterwards three interested men sat until quite late, going over the challenge.

January 7, took 9 A. M. bus for Vallejo; met by the Rev. Mr. MacGovern; 8 P. M., church service, about thirty present; fifteen of them came to the rectory afterwards and we had a most satisfactory afternoon.

January 8, took 9 A. M. bus for Sacramento, arriving 11:30; went to Diocesan House; 12:30 P. M. addressed Bishop and eight of his clergy; 3 P. M. addressed Woman's Auxiliary, about thirty; driven twenty miles to Woodland by the Rev. Mr. Clements; met a group of physicians at their splendid clinic; 8 P. M. spoke to congregation of seventy-five, many men. A group of fifteen men and a few ladies came to the rectory for a splendid after meeting.

January 9 took 6:30 A. M. train for Chico. arriving at 11:50; met by the Rev. Dr. Little; taken to hotel, where I spoke to twenty-five at Lion's Club; most worthwhile; 8 P. M., spoke in his church to about twenty-five.

January 10, took 7:45 train for Marysville; met by the Rev. Mr. Freeland; 3 P. M., spoke to 400 boys and girls; Tuba City High School; 6 P. M., rector and vestry invited to dinner with Mr. and Mrs. Swain; 8 P. M., spoke in church; a splendid congregation of about 130; about thirty of these came from his missions from ten to twenty miles.

January 11, driven by Mr. Freeland to Timbuctoc and other interesting places. Three of his laymen accepted challenge of "Peter, James and John.' Took 3:20 train for Sacramento; met by the Rev. Mr. Hermitage.

January 12, 9:30 A. M., spoke to his Sunday school; rainy, bad, slippery day; 11 A. M., addressed his congregation of about 100; Bishop Moreland present; 4 P. M., the bishop had called a special meeting of the men; there were about ninety men and ten women present; splendid reaction; the Bishop presenting me in a fine appeal. In the evening several clergy and men came to rectory for a conference. Three laymen responded to "Peter, James, John," appeal.

January 13, left 8 A. M., for Grasse Valley; arrived in time to address thirty Rotarians at lunch; enthusiastic responses; there was two feet of snow at this place. At 8 P. M., addressed a group of fifteen in Parish Hall; almost an impossible night for people to be about. In order to keep my appointment at Alturus (200 miles away), I expected to motor twenty-nine miles to the train; but was snowbound; so telegraphed the Rev. J. M. Thomas.

January 14, took 8 A. M. bus and plowed through snow to Aubnrn, twenty-nine miles. Took 1 P. M. train for Reno; arrived at 6 P. M.; spent night there.

January 15, took 6 A. M. train for Lakeview, Oregon, to keep appointment there that night; a wreck on the track ahead delayed us five hours; so I was forced to telegraph the Rev. Mr. Thomas impossible to be there on time; continued on to Klamath Falls January 16; remained in my berth until 8 A. M. Begin my Mission in District of Eastern Oregon.

I am most appreciative to the Bishop, his clergy and their lay people for the great interest they took in my visit to this diocese. Nowhere that I have been have I seen a finer group of men, especially, and more willing to accept responsibility. The Bishop and clergy should be greatly encouraged in their advance work for the Master. Praying God's blessing upon His work in this outstanding vineyard, I am faithfully yours,

L. W. Glazebrook.

Kismath, Oregon,
January 16, 1930.

The lay evangelist writes further:

"You would enjoy the Church as one finds it out here. These people are most loyal to their Christ and His Church, and their clergy are leading them with emphasis on the real essentials.

"God still makes me equal to the opportunities that are given me, and I feel His presence at all times. When one depends absolutely upon Him, all goes well."

Conference on the Ministry.

Over one hundred and thirty undergraduates and graduates of college and universities attended the New Year Conference on the Ministry at St. Paul's School, Concord, New Hampshire. This meant their giving up almost four days of Christmas holiday, January 3-6, and should be an encouraging note for those so frequently lamenting the follies and thoughtlessness of present-day youth.

The Rev. Dr. Samuel S. Drury, Headmaster of St. Paul's School, and the Rev. J. Leslie Glenn, of the Department of Adult Education of the National Council, directed the conference.

The leaders and speakers included: Bishop Dallas, of New Hampshire; the Rev. Dr. Herbert Gray, pastor of the Crouch Hill Church in London; the Rev. Henry W. Hobson, rector of All Saints' Church, Worcester, Mass.; the Rev. A. L. Kinsolving, of Amherst, Mass.; the Rev. Dr. Samuel Tyler, of Worcester, New York; the Rev. Ernest Stires, the Rev. John Crocker, John Bryant, the Very Rev. K. B. Sturges, D. D., Dean of St. Paul's Cathedral, Boston; the Rev. Dr. Frederick Sill, Headmaster of Kent School; Coleman Jennings, prominent layman from Washington, D. C.; the Rev. W. A. Lawrence, of Grace Church, Providence.

The afternoons of the conference were given over to winter sports and interviews between the leaders and the delegates.

A genuine interest in the ministry was shown. It was said that the informality of the conference added much to its effectiveness, and the amount of time allowed for personal interview and conversation was well spent. St. Paul's School was an ideal place for such a gathering, and the entire facilities of the school were placed at the disposal of the conference by Dr. Drury.

A similar conference for high school students is to be held at St. Paul's in June.

Church Colleges and the Church: Memorandum

Minutes of a meeting held by the five Church College Presidents with the Rev. Dr. George Craig Stewart, and the Rev. Leslie Glenn, in Washington, D. C., on Tuesday, January 14, in the New Willard Hotel. Dr. Peirce was in the chair and Dr. Bell was asked to act as Secretary.

1. After considerable discussion the following resolution was adopted:

1. Resolved, That the Commission to be set up by the National Council of the Episcopal Church through its Department of Religious Education on cooperation between the Church and the Church Colleges, is to report to General Convention through the National Council and to recommend such action by General Convention as it may deem desirable.

2. This Commission once appointed shall be independent of the Church colleges and of the Department of Religious Education of the Church.

3. The Commission shall recommend in view of the fact that the Church as such makes no contribution toward the support of the Church Colleges, what in their opinion the Church and Church people ought to do toward supporting and strengthening the five official Church Colleges as contributors to the Church's whole educational enterprise, and to make to the Church Colleges suggestions of how they can strengthen and enrich among their faculty and students Christian faith and character.

It was further agreed that the first paragraph of the above resolution means that the report shall be first given by the Commission to the Department of Religious Education, which may make such recommendations as it desires, but which shall without fail transmit the reports to the National Council exactly as received from the Commission: and, furthermore, that the National Council may take such action upon the report as they see fit, but that they shall forward it in its entirety to General Convention, that it may receive final consideration from General Convention.

It was further agreed that the three men to be appointed on the Commission should be selected from among the following seven, in the order named: President Hullihan, of the University of Delaware; President Sills, of Bowdoin College; the Rev. Dr. Anson P. Stokes, formerly of Yale, and now Canon of the Cathedral in Washington; the Rev. Dr. Niles Carpenter, Professor of Sociology in the University of Buffalo; the Rev. Dr. Thayer, of St. Mark's School, Southboro; Professor Denny, of the Department of Philosophy in Western Reserve University; Professor Chauncey B. Tinker, of the Department of English in Yale University. The actual invitation to these men is to be extended as from the National Council and the Church College Executives by the Rev. Dr. Stewart.

It was agreed that a remuneration of $500 and all expenses should be offered to each of the Commissioners, this money to be paid by the National Council.

It was agreed that each Commissioner should be expected to visit each of the five Church Colleges for not less than forty-eight hours.

Bernard I. Bell,
Secretary of the Meeting.

Church Burned by Union Soldiers Reimbursed by Federal Government.

St. Paul's Church, Selma, Alabama, has just recovered $5,680 from the United States Government for damages incurred sixty-five years ago. At the very end of the War Between the States, April, 1865, St. Paul's was burned by Union soldiers. The people took the loss of their property as only a part of the price that Southern people were required to pay, and started to build a new church as soon as circumstances would permit. In 1903, claim for recovery was filed against the government. After dragging for twenty-seven years the bill has finally been settled by the unanimous approval of the Senate Claims Committee.

The Parish House of St. Paul's has only been recently built. It was constructed of bricks, which were taken from the ruins of the first state capitol building at Cahaba, Alabama. Cahaba, once a thriving center and the seat of the first state government, is now an almost forgotten village.

Conference on Boys' Work.

A regional conference for workers with boys is to be held in Indianapolis on Friday and Saturday, February 7 and 8, under the auspices of the National Brotherhood of St. Andrew. To this conference has been invited a number of representative Church leaders and specialists in boys' work from the second, third, fourth, fifth and sixth provinces, and an intensive program of study and discussion will be carried out during these days. Headquarters will be at the Claypool Hotel.

The Chairman of the Conference will be Irwin C. Johnson of Detroit, Boys' Work Director of the Diocese of Michigan, and among those who are expected on the program or in attendance upon the Conference are Bishop Francis of Indianapolis, Bishop Gray of Northern Indiana, Bishop Abbott of Lexington (if circumstances permit), the Rev. Philips E. Osgood of Indianapolis, the Rev. H. H. Lumpkin of Madison, the Rev. Humphrey Dixon of Louisville, the Rev. Herman R. Page of Dayton, the Rev. Otis Jackson and George C. Kubitz of Chicago. H. Lawrence Choate of Washington, President, and Leon C. Palmer of Philadelphia, General Secretary, of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew in the United States, will be present at the conference.

Among the subjects to be considered are: The Nature and Needs of the Adolescent Boy; What the Church is Doing for the Boy, and what it can do; Organizations for work with Boys in the Local Church; The Place of the Brotherhood in the Life of the Church; and others.

Bishop Anderson in Critical Condition.

The Rt. Rev. Charles Palmerston Anderson, D. D., Bishop of Chicago, our Presiding Bishop, is seriously ill in Chicago as the result of a severe heart attack on Wednesday, January 22. We are happy to be able to inform our readers, however, that a telegram dated 11 P. M., January 27, from the secretary of the Chicago Diocesan Council, reads "slightly improved this evening."

Let us unite in praying the Father of Mercies to give strength and skill to all those who minister to the sick and to prosper the means made use of for his cure; that He will comfort him, preserve him and give him patience under his affliction, and in His good time restore him to health, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

Fire at Nenana.

Fire destroyed the new dormitory building at St. Mark's School for Indian children at Nenana, Alaska, January 23, according to a wireless message received by the Department of Missions on January 24.. The building was occupied by thirty-four children and five American women. They are temporarily quartered in the class-room building and a two-room cabin.

Later information received January 27, indicates that all the food supplies and most of the furnishing, bedding and clothing were saved. Miss Florence Hissey and Miss Anne Thompson lost their personal effects. Probably two thousands dollars will cover all loss not included in the insurance, which amounted to $30,000.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND NEWS.

(S. C. London Correspondent.)

New Chairman of the Council of the National Church League.

It is much to be hoped that the retirement of Bishop Knox from the chairmanship of the Council of the National Church League does not mean that we shall no longer have the advantage of his great learning and zeal in the defence of the positive truth of the Gospel. He has been so strong a force, especially during the recent Prayer Book controversy that his influence has been felt all over the country. His speeches and especially his pamphlets made a big impression. They were sound in their arguments and sufficiently lucid to be easily "understanded of the people," with the result that they strengthened the great cause he had at heart immensely. Now, however, at a great age and with failing health, he is obliged to seek release from many responsibilities. His chairmanship of the League mentioned was no sinecure He gave most detailed attention to its affairs and as it is an organization which has considerable influence, his resignation is of great importance. In his place Sir Thomas Inskip, who was Attorney General in the last Government and who is so well known in connection with Protestant Evangelical work, and did such noble work in the House of Commons, and indeed, outside, during the time that the Prayer Book Measure was before the Country, has been appointed, and all concerned in the upholding of Protestant Truth can but be thankful. It is too much to hope he can give the same time that Bishop Knox did to the League, but his sound judgment, whole-hearted adherence to Holy Scripture, and strength of character will be a great asset to its operations.

Universal Week of Prayer: The observance of the Universal Week of Prayer organized by the World's Evangelical Alliance is a further encouraging sign of the deepening of the prayer spirit in Christian people. In London the attendances were above the average and the meetings were marked by much fervor. Coming at the commencement of a year which will be marked by such important proceedings in regard to Christian Unity these meetings augur well. The Archbishop of Canterbury in a message to the General Secretary, said it was a "great step forward in the direction in which we all desire to move that so many Christian people sharing many different traditions should be able to join in prayer in this way for the peace and unity of the whole Church of Christ." At the same time an indication of the difficulties through which we are passing is given by the announcement that the Bishop of Winchester has forbidden a united Communion Service with Free Churches, stating, "Such an action has an effect, and carries a responsibility, beyond the borders of parish," whereas the Bishop of Bradford on the other hand has encouraged one of his Incumbents to do this very thing as it is only by such courageous action on part of adventurous spirits that great changes can often be brought about. The Bishop of Bradford has recently put out a very strong plea for a departure from the practice, which so widely prevails of insisting on Fasting Communion. He writes as though, himself one of the offending party in the matter, but of course Evangelicals have always stood out against this practice. No doubt we shall hear more about this.

Mrs. Hoover Breaks Ground for Episcopal Home for Children.

January 25 was an important day in the history of the Episcopal Home for Children, for ground was broken for the new building that day, by Mrs. Herbert Hoover. The Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman pronounced the invocation and benediction and delivered a short address, in which he said: "There is no project closer to the hearts of the people of Washington than the care of little children, and in this home the needy children are cared for, regardless of religious affiliation. Is it any wonder that we are rejoicing in the accomplishment of our purpose to raise sufficient funds to begin work at once upon this new and adequate group of buildings, in which to carry on this work? The old home is totally inadequate. Its equipment is obsolete. We now have in hand one-third of the total amount needed for the new home and we hope to have it ready for occupancy by next fall."

After his remarks, the Bishop handed

COLLECT FOR FOURTH SUNDAY AFTER EPIPHANY.

O Lord, Who knowest us to be set in the midst of so many and great dangers, that by reason of the frailty of our nature we cannot always stand upright; Grant to us such strength and protection as may support us in all dangers and carry us through all temptations; through Jesus Christ Our Lord. Amen.

THE PURIFICATION OF ST. MARY THE VIRGIN.

(February 2.)

Almighty and ever-living God, we humbly beseech Thy Majesty, that, as Thy Only Begotten Son, was this day presented in the temple in substance of our flesh, so we may be presented unto Thee with pure and clean hearts by the same Thy Son, Jesus Christ Our Lord. Amen.

A GENERAL CONFESSION.

Charles Nevers Holmes.

Almighty Father, we have erred
And from Thy pathways strayed,
Have wandered from Thy Holy Word,
Thy precepts disobeyed.

And we have followed frequently
Our own heart's wayward path,
And grievously offended Thee,
Provoking Thy just wrath.

We leave undone what we should do
And do what we should not;
And to ourselves we are not true,
Our duties are forgot.

Be merciful to us, O Lord,
Forgive what we have done,
Restore the penitent, O God,
Through Jesus Christ Thy Son.

And grant, O Father, that no shame
Will mar our lives again,
That we shall glorify Thy Name
With righteousness. Amen.

God's Plan for Every Life.

What a wondrous truth is this! And yet how reasonable a one. Shall the architect draw the plans for his stately palace? Shall the artist sketch the outines of His masterpiece? Shall the shipbuilder lay down the lines for his colossal ship? And yet shall God have no plan for the immortal soul which He brings into being and puts "in Christ Jesus?" Surely He has. Yes, for every cloud that floats across the summer sky; for every blade of grass that points its tiny spear heavenward; for every dewdrop that gleams in the morning sun; for every beam of light that shoots across the limitless space from sun to earth, God has a purpose and a plan. How much more, then, for you who are His own in Christ Jesus, does God have a perfect before-prepared life plan.

"In all the ages of the ages there never has been, and never will be, a man just like me. I am unique, I have no double." That is true. No leaves, no two jewels, no two stars, no two lives alike. Every life is a fresh thought from God to the world. There is no man in all the world who can do your work as well as you. And if you do not find and enter into God's purpose for your life there will be something missing from the glory that would otherwise have been there. Every jewel gleams with its own radiance. Every flower distills its own fragrance. Every Christian has his own particular bit of Christ's radiance and Christ's fragrance, which God would pass through him to others. Has God given you a particular personality? He has also created a particular circle of individuals who can be reached and touched by that personality, as by none other in the wide world. And then He shapes and orders your life so as to bring you into contact with that very circle. Just a hair's breadth of shift in the focus of the telescope and some man sees a vision of beauty which before had been all confused and befogged. So, too, just that grain of individual and personal variation in your life from every other man's and some one sees Jesus Christ with a clearness and beauty he would discover nowhere else. What a privilege to have one's own Christ in-dwelt personality, however humble! What a joy to know that God will use it, as He uses no other, for certain individuals susceptible to it as to no other! In you there is just a bit of change in the angle of the jewel—and lo! some man sees the light. In you there is just a trifle of variation in the mingling of the spices—and behold some one becomes conscious of the fragrance of Christ."

You remember the story of the engineer of Brooklyn Bridge. During its building he was injured. For many long months he was shut up in his room. His gifted wife shared his toils and carried his plans to the workmen. At last the great bridge was completed. Then the invalid architect asked to see it. They put him upon a cot and carried him to the bridge. They placed him where he could see the magnificent structure in all its beauty. There he lay, in his helplessness, intently scanning the work of his genius. He marked the great cables, the massive piers, the mighty anchorages which fettered it to the earth. His critical eye ran over every beam, every girder, every chord, every rod. He noted every detail carried out precisely as he had dreamed it in his dreams and wrought it out in his plans and specifications. And then as the joy of achievement filled his soul, as he saw and realized that it was finished exactly as he had designed it, in an ecstacy of delight, he cried out, "It's just like the plan, it's just like the plan!"

Some day we shall stand in the glory and, looking up into His face, cry out, "O God, I thank Thee that Thou didst turn me aside from my willful and perverse way, to Thy loving and perfect one. I thank Thee that Thou didst ever lead me to yield my humble life to Thee. I thank Thee that as I, day by day, walked the simple pathway of service, Thou didst let me gather up one by one, the golden threads of Thy great purpose for my life. I thank Thee, as a tiny trail creeping its way up great mountain side, that pathway has gone on in darkness and light, storm and shadow, weakness and tears, failures and falterings, Thou hast at last brought me to its destined end. And now that I see my finished life, no longer through a glass darkly, but in the face to face splendor of Thine own glory, I thank Thee, O God, I thank Thee, that it is just like the plan, it is just like the plan!' "—Selected.

Today I caught a sound
Like children's laughter on the breeze;
I looked without,
But all that met my gaze was bare, gaunt trees.
Yet, even as I looked
There seemed to be a faint, sweet stirring all around;
And lifting up my eyes unto the sky,
I saw a flock of bluebirds northward bound.
And suddenly it came to me:
Forget the Winter's failures, trials and sorrow,
Begin anew with a tomorrow and God's promise of the Spring.

The Hard Task of Thinking.

The Mentor has assembled a number of instances from the experiences of noted authors, and, for the greater encouragement of all who write, we give a number of them:

"Virgil devoted seven years to the building of one of his 'monuments,' his 'Georgics' comprising a little more than two thousand lines. Just words, yet destined to outlive the pyramids.

"Lucretius gave a whole lifetime to a single poem. Then there is Thucydides, father of historical criticism. His masterpiece was twenty years in the making—a work that easily fits between two octacsize covers!

"Jean Jacques Rousseau wrote: 'My manuscripts, blotted, scratched, interlined, and scarcely legible, attest the trouble they cost me. Some of my periods I have turned and returned in my head for five or six nights before they were fit to be put on paper.'

" 'You will read this treatise in a few hours,' Montesquieu, the celebrated jurist, told some friends on completing 'The Spirit of Law,' 'yet the labor expended on it has whitened my hair.' That his time and effort were not altogether ill spent is conjectured from the fact that many of the principles defined in the book had a powerful influence in the framing of the Constitution of the United States.

"Even Carlyle with all his experience found the task of putting together a manuscript extremely arduous. 'Certainly,' he once remarked, 'no one writes with the tremendous difficulty that I do. Shall I ever write with ease?'

" 'He wrote with his heart's blood,' is the way his brother John expressed it. In time he sent his message forth in thirty-four volumes—a prodigious amount of work. Yet 'composition was a torture to him.'

"Rudyard Kipling rewrote his stories many times over, and then often made numerous corrections in the proof. Hal Crain made it a rule to revise every novel he wrote a dozen times. 'The Raven' lay in Edgar Allan Poe's desk for ten years before he considered it fit to be published. Locke's 'Essay on the Human Understanding' was eighteen years in the making. Plato spent weeks over a sentence, Charlotte Bronte hours over a word. Ruskin was never weary of polishing his jewel-like phrases, Izaak Walton's simple, homely diction cost him incredible toil.

"Men of the most brilliant and imposing talents have lived a life of intense and incessant labor. Yet, if any work be markedly good, it is the public's habit to attribute the author's success mainly to 'genius.'

"One definition of genius has been attributed to a dozen wise men: 'Genius is the capacity for taking infinite pains.' "—Presbyterian Standard.

A SEQUENCE.

The Parting.

Ruth Bush Lobdell.

When we two part,
Look not upon my lips,
For one pale smile
To hide the pain beneath;
As mourners with their flowers,
Weeping the while,
Cover their dead;
Bend not your head
To catch one broken phrase.
Silence of agony—
Silence and clinging hands
And transfixed gaze.
For, when we part,
Lest all that surging tumult outlet seek
From my full heart,
I shall not speak.

The Return.

When you return,
The living answer to my prayer,
With glory on your brow,
With music bursting on the vibrant air,
And young girls' laughter shrill above it all;
With children leaping in their parents' arms,
Old men and women weeping in the streets
For over-stress of happiness;
With serried rows of rhythmic-footed men
Whose faces, drawn with memory,
Quicken anew with a rebirth of joy;
With silken banners,
Scarlet, white, and blue,
Flung out gold-tasseled and triumphant over you—
When you return like this,
Look not amid the throng for me.
For I shall stand some time apart
With upraised face.
I shall stand by,
Hid in some deep-niched wall.

Your parting was for me—
For me alone—
Your coming is for all.

The Liar.

When I was a little boy, my family considered me an awful liar, and my three older brothers stated the fact both frequently and warmly to me and to others in my presence. But you know, I think they misjudged me. I wasn't an awful liar. I was an exceptionally good one. And why wouldn't I be with three older brothers to learn the technique from? I also learned some of the more subtle forms of deception from my mother and father and their grown up friends.

For example, I remember one day when I had "swiped" a cake of sweet chocolate and shared it with my brothers. Mother inquired about it casually—oh, very casually, if you know what I mean—so that I knew at once that I had been discovered. The inquiry was made in some such roundabout way as this: "Boys, I had a cake of sweet chocolate, which I think I put on the upper shelf of the pantry, but now it isn't there. I wonder if any of you have seen it."

We had not only seen it, but we had eaten it, and Mother knew that, and we knew that she knew it. If she really hadn't known, her manner would have been quite different. We could read her as readily as a book. Most children can read their parents. What she wanted was to give us a chance to "come out courageously and tell the truth." She didn't want to accuse us for fear of frightening us into a lie, and she didn't want to ask a direct question that could be answered by "yes" or "no" because "no," being the shorter word, was likely to be chosen in preference to yes." So she employed a perfectly transparent ruse, and a ruse to the keen, elemental mind of a child is just the same as a lie.

And what did my older brothers do in this crisis? They didn't try to lie out of it. Oh, no! They knew it wouldn't do any good. So they looked first naively surprised and then indignantly accusing at me. "Why, Mother," said they, "we ate it. Russell brought it out to us and said you had given it to him."

The worst of it was, I had said just that. I had said it but they hadn't believed it and I knew they hadn't believed it and they knew that I knew it. In fact the whole proceeding had been fabricated in duplicity. It was a system we had worked before and went like this: My oldest brother would lead us all to some distance from the house and would then say to me, "Russ, there's a cake of sweet chocolate on the top shelf of the pantry. Go ask Mother if we can have it." They knew perfectly well, by experience, that I should take it without asking, thus insuring myself and them against the possibility of refusal, while they were provided with a perfect alibi. And as for me, I knew Mother and Father didn't believe in whipping. The worst that would happen would be that they would talk to me sorrowfully about the pain it gave them to have a son who would lie to them. I knew I was expected to cry after a while and then it would be all over.

There were other times when Mother would pretend to believe me. She would say with great candor and sincerity: "If you say it is true, Russell dear, I know it must be. Remember that I trust you absolutely." But of course I knew she didn't believe me and didn't trust me, but was shaming me. It struck me as an agreeable though rather silly method and I swore with equal candor and sincerity that I was telling the absolute truth.

On the whole I think I deceived my parents more succesfully than they deceived me, and my advice to parents is: Don't lie to your children any more than is absolutely necessary, because you can't deceive them any way and there is always the chance that if you are truthful with them they may be truthful with you. It isn't like that they will, but they may. Children will do almost anything to imitate their parents.

As for the way I treat my own son: Well, I try to be honest. It is very difficult, I admit, but I'm always upheld by the thought that if I try to lie to him he'll surely see through it—and then where has my prestige gone to?—Russell M. Coryell, in National Kindergarten Association Release.

His Likeness.

In the soul of a man God has been revealed to us, "in that pure love that was the spirit of Jesus of Nazareth, in that simple tale of human goodness that was His life and in that poignant spectacle of human self-abnegation that was His death upon the Cross. 'To whom will ye liken God,' a great Hebrew brooder had asked long centuries before 'or what likeness will ye compare unto Him?' And now at last we can answer and, pointing to that Life and that Death can say, 'Here is His likeness. He who hath seen this hath seen the Father.' Now at last we know beyond assail of doubt where it is that the Eternal Over-soul descends into the familiar circuit of our poor human experience, and glorifies it with His most real presence, showing us Himself as He is and ourselves as we ought to be." Wonderful it is that the Almighty God should seek to draw near to man in an intimate friendship which he can understand, and that although no man hath seen God at any time, yet Christ has made Him plain.—Canadian Churchman.

ACROSS THE DARK.

It is a Voice that hails me in the night,
When the way home is dark and lone.
Around,
Pale shadows dance weird orgies on the ground,
And my weak heart is palsied at the sight.

Then, sudden, one who knows her child aright,
Calls him across the dark. Melodious sound!
For in that eerie lane his heart has found
Most valiant purpose, when he favored flight.

Out of the starless way that leads the soul
Beyond the margin of the seen and known,
Where pilgrims fear to walk the dark alone,
A Voice divine assures them of the goal.

For home lies somewhere on that silent way,
And God will suffer not His child to stray.
—Exchange.

Religion's Debt to Science.

Religion (indirectly perhaps) owes something of real value to the scientist which by revealing the unity of nature has established the unity of God, the existence of an unseen world beyond the range, at all events, of our normal faculties. It has consecrated to eternal honor the Christian virtues of hope and faith. For the Scientist lives largely by faith and not by sight. His mind is fixed on things beyond and above and the driving force of his life may be expressed in Wordsworth's oft-quoted words, "Effort, expectation and desire and something ever more about to be." The true scientist again holds up to honor the Christian virtue of a teachable spirit and reverence for Truth in whatever form it may present itself.—Canadian Churchman.

Seek ye the Lord. Oh, serve Him well.
His love for thee no tongue can tell.
He gave His Son that thou might'st dwell
Within the rock's most grateful shade,
Secure and safe and unafraid,
Because, for sin, the debt He paid.

Then seek the Lord in early years
And learn of Him, the truth, that cheers.
To love Him right will dry all tears.
Then seek the Lord. 'Tis ne'er too late.
He will forgive, though sins are great.
He'll be the master of thy fate.

Year by year He sets Himself before us a little Child, in great humility, and bids us become like Him, that when He appears again in His glorious majesty we may again be made like Him. Year by year, through His holy nativity, He calleth us to behold Him, and crieth, by His very speechless infancy, "Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls."—Dr. Pusey.

THE LOST SHEEP.

Far from the peaceful fold,
Over the mountain cold,
The lost sheep is calling
And stumbling and falling,
Helpless and prone
And alone.

Wounded and bleeding he lies
Under the pitiless skies;
Around him the steep
And the chasm so deep
Are yawning in wrath
In his path.

Out of the peaceful fold,
Over the mountain cold,
A footstep is falling,
A voice is now calling,
A voice that is known
By His own.

Leaving the ninety and nine,
For the light of His presence to pine,
He braves the cold blast
And the sky overcast,
And counts not the cost
For the lost.

Over the treacherous ground,
Bearing the sheep He has found,
Safe on His breast
Like an infant at rest,
For lo, the lost sheep
Is asleep.

—Augustus F. Lampkin.

The Sacred Fish.

Kukwera squatted before a large stone sharpening his knife. As he moved it slowly round and round on the top of the rock his mind was also working in circles. As though some one else were there to hear him he began to express the thoughts as they formed in his young bring.

"I think I will eat fish tonight. I am tired of dry rice or a little palm oil on the top of my food."

Carefully he tested the edge of the knife with his thumb. It was not quite sharp enough to satisfy him, so he began rubbing it on the stone again, while he mused.

"Over in Fisibu there are fish as big as my leg just floating around in that creek. I could easily spear one with this long knife."

Kukwera's eyes danced as he thought how much fun it would be to disturb the great lazy fish and really see them move rapidly for once. Then a strange look, almost as of fear, came into his eyes as he sat back to rest for a while. With his knees drawn up and his arms clasped about him, he sat for a long time deep in thought. He was thinking of the fish.

Ever since Kukwera could remember anything he had known those fish. When only a small chap he had loved to stand on the bank and throw bits of rice crust into the water just to see the great things grab and swallow. Often he had wanted to catch one and it would have been so easy. But always his mother had told him that he must not, because they were sacred fish.

He had often seen the people of the town go to the creek with food which they gave to these fish. Once when he had asked his mother why they fed the fish, she had told him that the spirits of their old people lived in the fish and that they must not forget to feed them. Of course Kukwera believed this. He did not want to offend the spirits of his old people. There were quite enough things to make him afraid. So, no matter how hungry he was nor how he wanted the fish, he had never caught one.

Now a change had come to Kukwera. He had spent several years in the Mission. He had learned to read and write. He had learned of Jesus, the great sacrifice.

"My old people taught me that our ancestors lived in those fish and we must not eat them. They taught me to make sacrifice to the fish, the hills, and our medicine tree. They taught me that it was good to put buckets, pots, money, rice and palm wine on the graves of our people who had died. They lay a strong vine clear around the town to keep out evil. Always they are making sacrifice to something. They are never satisfied. They are always fearing something. And the sacrifice does not keep the sickness and evil away.

"Now, the missionaries have come to teach us. They all tell us that Jesus is the only sacrifice. If we believe in Him we need not make all these other sacrifices again."

For a long time Kukwera sat thinking. If Jesus is the great sacrifice and we need no other, then the fish cannot be sacrifice. Just what would happen to him if he caught and ate one?

A little quiver ran through Kukwera as he thought of the superstition which for so many years had bound him. Then rising and taking up his knife he quietly said, "I will eat fish tonight."—Lutheran's Woman's Work.

The Dining-Room Mirror.

Mrs. Butler had been ill a long time, and Ruth and Herbert and John had been left to the care of a housekeeper, who was a good woman, but rather careless, and the three children—well, I don't like to tell it, but it may help some children—had dreadful table manners. Mr. Butler was much distressed about it, but he was a busy man who had to leave home, before the children were up in the morning and often was kept out until after their bedtime, so that Sundays were almost the only days when he had a chance to help them, and then it seemed hopeless.

Finally Aunt Fanny came to stay with them for a while, and Mr. Butler talked very seriously to the children about being nice and showing Aunt Fanny what good children they could be. Of course they all promised, but the very first day they all forgot, and Aunt Fanny was shocked. But being a wise lady she said nothing.

"Why, Aunt Fanny, you've changed the furniture around in the dining room!" cried Ruth when dinner was served next day. "How odd it looks."

"Yes, I rather like to turn things about," said Aunt Fanny. "Ruth, you may sit next to me, though I'll not promise that you'll have the same place always, for it's nice to shift about."

Right in the midst of eating her soup Ruth laid down her spoon and stared. In the mirror opposite was a little girl cramming crackers in her mouth at a great rate, and both her elbows were on the table. At last the little Girl in the mirror took one elbow off and then another, and though it was a cloudy day Ruth saw who the girl was. She turned as red as a poppy and kept looking back often to see if the girl was doing anything wrong.

"Well, how nice and clean your place is at the table, dear!" said Aunt Fanny. "I do love to see well-behaved little girls."

Next day John was allowed to sit by Aunt Fanny, and he saw a small boy with a brushy-looking head and a necktie all awry before Aunt Fanny came in from the kitchen, where she had been called by the housekeeper, "Will you please excuse me a minute?" asked the little boy, slipping down from his place.

When he came back the tie was straight and his hair was brushed. His hands were still wet on the backs and around the wrists, but nobody said anything about it. He kept looking at the boy in the mirror and for the whole meal his elbows were where they ought to be and his mouth was not stuffed full of food, though there was chicken that day.

"It's a pleasure to make good things for nice children," said Aunt Fanny, never looking at Herbert at all. "Now, some children get gravy on the cloth and spill things dreadfully, but John's place is tidy."

"So is mine!" said Ruth, who had twisted around, for glimpses of the little girl several times. "I think if Herbert could have a mirror opposite him he'd soon do better, too, Auntie."

"Is that why you changed the buffet, Aunt Fanny?" asked Herbert with wide open eyes.

"Yes, one reason for it. I wanted you children to see yourselves as others see you. That is what mirrors are for, you know."

"Yesterday I saw myself in the big mirror in the living room when I was angry," said Ruth, "and it was dreadful. But Aunt Fanny, we can't have a mirror before us all the time, can we?"

"Yes, dear, in a way we can," said Aunt Fanny. "The Bible is our mirror, and when we look into it we see the things that are wrong in our lives just as clearly as you see table faults in the dining room mirror. What was your verse, yesterday, dear?"

" 'Little children, love one another.' said Ruth, with downcast face. "And I quarreled with Edith," she added in a low voice. "I guess I was looking away from the mirror when I got angry with Edith."

"Even grown folks are careless, dear," said Aunt Fanny. "And now, do you want the mirror moved back where you cannot see yourselves at the table?"

"No no! no!" cried three small voices. "We want it to help us."

So the mirror is there to this very day, but it never shows any children with shocking table manners any more, only well-behaved, polite boys and a small girl, who are the delight of their father and the comfort of their mother who is back at her old place at the table well and happy.—Sunday School Times.

A Life of Faithful Service.

A merry crowd of young people had run over in a launch that clear August morning to visit the North Island light. They scrambled laughingly up the rocky path and then stood breathless, looking across the desolate pile of rocks, softened only by a few huckleberry bushes and stunted firs. That was not quite all, either; for in a sheltered angle of the house, was a tiny garden of portulaca, marigolds and zennias.

The keeper and his wife and son met the visitors—the two men with courtesy none the less genuine because it was splendid, the little gray-haired woman with vivid interest. The eagerness in her bright, dark eyes apepaled irresistibly to one of the girls. She dropped behind as the crowd trooped after the men, and turned back to the little woman.

"I've seen lights before," she said "I wonder if you'd let me come in and make you a little call instead?"

She was almost startled at the sudden illumination of the old face.

"Would I let you, dearie? I guess you don't know what it's like to live on a rock. I tell father and William the only time I envy them is when visitors come, and go tagging off after them. Most always they have to hurry right off as soon as they've seen the light, and I scarcely get a look at them."

The girl leaned forward, moved by a sudden impulse.

"How do you endure it?" she asked. "They have the light, of course: but you, off here alone. Oh! I don't see how you endure it!"

The wise old eyes met the young blue ones with quiet humor. "Oh, there's lots of ways of enduring," the keeper's wife said. "I think of farmers' wives to me I could live away from it. Then sight of the sea, and it doesn't seem as far off from folks as I am, with only land all around them. I was born in I belong to the light, too—you have to if you keep one; and if I don't touch the lamp, I cook for the men that do, and that counts. They'd get blue and queer in a hurry, if they had to do for themselves. I guess that's the real secret of it. You don't get very much out of sorts, as long as you've got somebody to do for, and I guess most people have that, if they'd only realize it."

The girl drew a long breath. "Thank you," she said, "it is a real and very helpful lighthouse sermon."—Classmate.

THE TONGUE.

"The boneless tongue, so small, so weak,
Can crush and kill," declares the Greek.
"The tongue destroys a greater horde,"
The Turks assert, "than does the sword."
The Persian proverb wisely saith:
"A lengthy tongue, an early death';
Or sometimes takes this form instead:
"Don't let your tongue cut off your head."
"The tongue can speak a word whose speed,"
Says the Chinese, "outstrips the steed";
While Arab sages this impart:
"The tongue's great storehouse is the heart."
From Hebrew writ this saying sprung:
"Tho' feet should slip, ne'er let the tongue."
The sacred writer crowns the whole:
"Who keeps his tongue doth keep his soul."

Home Has More Danger Than Savages of Brazil

JOHN J. WHITEHEAD, explorer and lecturer, has just returned from eight months in the jungles of South America, where he was searching for traces of the lost Colonel Fawcett and his son.

Dangerous as he found the jungle, he encountered a worse danger at home. But let him tell it.

"One of the great problems of a trip of this kind is keeping in healthy condition. When we started, some of the members of the party had laxatives with them, but made wise by experience I carried Nujol. All too quickly my stock ran out. Soon I was in bad shape—what with a diet of rice and beans, lacking vitamins and green vegetables.

"When we finally got back to civilization, entertained first in Brazil and later in the United States, I became positively ill. Severe stomach pains and poor elimination made me realize that Nujol would again prove the reliable, trusty keeper of health. Sure enough, with the first bottle the trouble disappeared.

Don't think Nujol is a medicine. It is as tasteless and colorless as clear water. It brings you, however, what your body needs like any other machine—lubrication. Just as a good bath washes our bodies clean, Nujol sweeps away, easily and normally, those internal bodily poisons (we all have them) that make us feel dull and headachy and sick. Nujol cannot hurt even a little baby; it forms no habit; it contains not one single drug. Doctors and nurses use it themselves and tell you to use it, if you want to be well.

John J. Whitehead, explorer and lecturer, with a Jungle Warrior

Take Nujol every night for two weeks and prove to yourself how happy and bright and full of pep you can be, if your body is internally clean. Get a bottle today at any drug store. It costs but a few cents, and makes you feel like a million dollars. Start traveling the health-road to success and happiness—this very day!

The Memorial Breastplate

"And thou shalt make the breastplate of judgment with cunning work.....And thou shall set it in settings of stones, even four rows of stones: the first row shall be a sardius, a topaz and a carbuncle: this shall be the first row. And the second row shall be an emerald, a sapphire, and a diamond. And the third row a ligure, an agate and an amethyst. And the fourth row a beryl, an onyx, and a jasper....."

EXODUS Ch. 28: Vs. 15-20.

Aaron, the high priest, was commanded to wear the breastplate with the names of the twelve tribes of the children of Israel on the twelve precious stones before the Lord for a Memorial.

Quite remarkably these precious gems and others are found in minute crystals in the superb modern Memorial stone

Winnsboro Granite

"The Silk of the Trade"

When the surface of this granite, which is a composite of these and other actual precious stone crystals, is highly polished, all the scintillating beauty and color of these minute jewels become visible.

Be sure that "Winnsboro Granite" is specified in your contract for monuments. Like other high quality materials, there are many inferior substitutes, which resemble this granite on first appearance, but do not possess its lasting qualities and permanent beauty, because they contain more deleterious elements, such as water, lime and iron. These elements tend to disintegration and discoloration.

Have your monument dealer furnish you with a personal guarantee from the quarries that the monument you purchase is cut in genuine Winnsboro Granite.

The certificate of the quarries is signed by B. H. Heyward, Treas., and General Manager, whose signature insures genuine Winnsboro Granite. A facsimile of this signature is reproduced below.

At our January meeting we had the pleasure of a visit from Dr. Robert Wilson, of Korea, who told of faithful service for the Lepers for nineteen years. Mrs. Wilson also is a great help and assistance in the work. He teaches them trades after many are cured and so gives them happiness and hope for the future. Many Lepers become earnest Christians. The Koreans are very grateful and have put up a shaft as a monument to Dr. Wilson, with his name written thereon, so he has the pleasure of reading his own epitaph as he passes by every day! The Japanese Emperor has presented him with a silver medal for his work amongst them. Total for the year 1929.....$2,891.77

Deaths

IN MEMORIAM.
1847—Mary Hoxton Randolph—1930.

I only knew her as the wife and mother, but if "the child is father of the man", then the girlhood that lay behind the years when I first met her must have been those of one who "endured as seeing Him who is invisible"; a vision that remained with her through life, strengthening her to be the Christian wife and mother she was. Devotion such as is rarely seen nowadays existed between Mrs. Randolph and her husband, and to her children she gave the best guidance of love tempered with wisdom. "Teach them to be unselfish" was her motto, almost an echo of General Lee's words, "Teach your child self-control, for that brings the blessing".

After her husband's death her rectors in Fauquier county found in her their best help and counsellor in their parish work, her sympathy and understanding never failing them. As her character shone more and more with that "light" that glorifies our Father which is in heaven, those who loved her best saw her drawing nearer and nearer to the presence of the King. At last on January 11 the "one clear call" came. Dear mother heart! as on earth you led your children heavenwards, so now in heaven will you draw them ever upwards, for every thought of you will be a call to "lift up your hearts", and lifting them up, they will find it is indeed "unto the Lord", for did He not promise where "I am, there shall also my servant be"? So we leave her in His keeping, and that thought must comfort all who love her.

IN MEMORIAH.
The Rt. Rev. Davis Sessums, D. D.
Fourth Bishop of Louisiana.
Born July 7, 1858.
Consecrated June 24, 1891.
Died December 24, 1929.

MINUTE.

Whereas, it has pleased Almighty God in His infinite wisdom and love to call to a higher sphere of life and service our beloved Bishop, the Rt. Rev. Davis Sessums, D. D., the Standing Committee of the Diocese, which has always enjoyed a close relationship with the Bishop, wishes to place on record its deep and sincere appreciation of his personal gifts and character, and of his faithful, efficient and persistent service rendered to his Diocese and to the Church at large during his thirty-eight years as Bishop.

Being consecrated at the unusually early age of thirty-two, Bishop Sessums brought to the duties of his office the physical strength of young manhood, which made it possible for him to meet the arduous demands and to bear the heavy responsibilities of an unusually long episcopate. He possessed the vigor and alertness of a brilliant mind, which, through constant study, made him one of the strongest preachers and profoundest scholars in the Church. For fitness of speech and gracefulness of expression on special occasions he had no peer in the House of Bishops.

He was endowed with a charming personality that won for him not only the admiration but the love of all those who really knew him. Graciousness and courtesy were terms invariably applied to him by all those who were fortunate enough to come under the sway of his spirit.

His deep loyalty and personal devotion to his Lord and Master were striking marks of his daily life, and nowhere did this deep spirituality manifest itself more clearly, more spontaneously, or more impressively than in his short, informal addresses delivered annually just before the adjournment of Council.

Though conspicuously gentle in his bearing, he was firm and unmovable in all those things where his convictions were concerned.

Our heads are bowed, our hearts are sad, and we feel, indeed, as a flock bereft of its shepherd; but in loving trust we commend his spirit to the God who gave it, and lift up our hearts in grateful recognition of his life and service.

We cannot but feel that God showed him special favor in taking him unto Himself on the eve of the Feast of the Nativity, when the angels were singing in blessed memory of the birth of Christ: for his soul must have been filled with rapture ineffable as he beheld with his own eyes that heavenly host that hovered over the hills of Judea, and heard with his own ears their heavenly song: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace and good-will toward men."

the shovel to Mrs. Hoover, who made no formal speech, but spoke directly to the fifty children from the home who had come to witness the ceremony. She said: "You and I will always remember this day and when the new home is built, I shall come and see you in it." Then, remembering the col dweather, she added, "It's cold, children, turn up your collars, just like this," and she demonstrated by turning up her own collar. Of course, fifty little collars went up at once. Dorothy Robey, representing the girls and George Smith, the boys, assisted Mrs. Hoover as she broke ground. The entire groups of children greeted Mrs. Hoover with a song and flag-waving and then at the last, as a surprise to all present, presented her with a large bouquet of pink roses.

Mrs. David Meade Lea, Chairman of the Board of Lady Managers, was in charge of the ceremonies and greeted Mrs. Hoover.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev A. Thomson, D. D., Bishop.

Woman's Auxiliary.

A meeting of the Executive Board of the Woman's Auxiliary of this diocese will be held in Hampton, February 6.

The members will be guests of Mrs. Frank Darling, Honorary President, at "Cedar Hall."

A brief memorial service to the Rt. Rev. Beverley D. Tucker, beloved Bishop of the Diocese, will be held, before going to executive session.

The Auxiliary is holding Educational Institutes February 7, at St. Paul's Church, Newport News; February 10, at Grace Church, Petersburg; February 11, at Trinity Church, South Boston. Miss Laura F. Boyer will be the leader. Representation at this meeting is a requirement for standard branches.

Personal Notes

The Rev. Arthur L. B. Ribble, formerlp non-parochial minister of the Diocese of Alabama, has accepted a call to Greenway Court Parish, Clarke County, and St. Stephen's and St. Thomas' Churches, Frederick County, in the Diocese of Virginia, with address at White Post, Virginia.

The Rev. William R. Rush was advanced to the priesthood on Sunday, Dcember 29, 1929, in Christ Church, Austin, Minnesota, by Bishop McElwain. The sermon was preached by the Rev. H. G. Wrinch, and the ordinand was presented by the Rev. G. H. Ten Broeck. The Rev. Mr. Rush will continue his work at St. Mary's Church, Malta, Montana, and associated missions.

WHAT THINK YE OF CHRIST.

"I summon thee, O John Bunyan, immortal thinker; thy glorious pilgrim marching through the ages, telling the story of redeeming love, is the testimony to the character of thy Lord.

"I summon thee, O Charles H. Spurgeon, and the testimony of all thy volumes, of thy glorious life and of thy peerless ministry is that 'Jesus Christ is the chiefest among ten thousand and the one altogether lovely.' I summon thee, O De Wette, great Biblical critic of Germany.

"De Wette testifies: 'This only I know, that there is salvation in no other name than in the name of Jesus Christ, the crucified.'

"I might summon thousand who from the Grassmarket in Edinburgh and from many racks and stakes went up to glory and to God, and their testimony would be: 'None but Jesus, none but Jesus."

"I summon thee, Toplady, sublime hymnist, and hear thee sing, 'Rock of ages, cleft for me.'

"I summon thee, Charles Wesley, and with thee sing myself, 'Thou O Christ, art all I want.'

"I summon thee, O Joseph Parker, after thy immortal ministry in London, and hear thee say, as that ministry nears its triumphant close:

" 'I have companied with Him of Nazareth and Calvary, in all holiness and tenderest love, love passing the love of woman, ardent like an altar flame.'

"I summon thee, Joseph Ernest Renan, famous French writer, theologian and Orientalist, and I hear thee say: 'Whatever the surprises of the future, Jesus never will be surpassed. His sufferings will melt the noblest hearts; all ages will proclaim that among the sons of men there is none born greater than Jesus.'

"I summon thee, John Stuart Mill, logician and economist. This witness answers: 'Whatever else may be taken away from us by rational critics, Christ is still left—a unique figure. He stands in the very first rank of men the sublimest genius whom our species can boast.'

"I summon thee, David Friedrich Strauss, theological and Biblical critic. "He speaks: 'Jesus remains the highest model of religion within the reach of our thought. No perfect piety is possible without His presence in the heart.'

"I summon thee, Thomas Jefferson, American statesman and President.

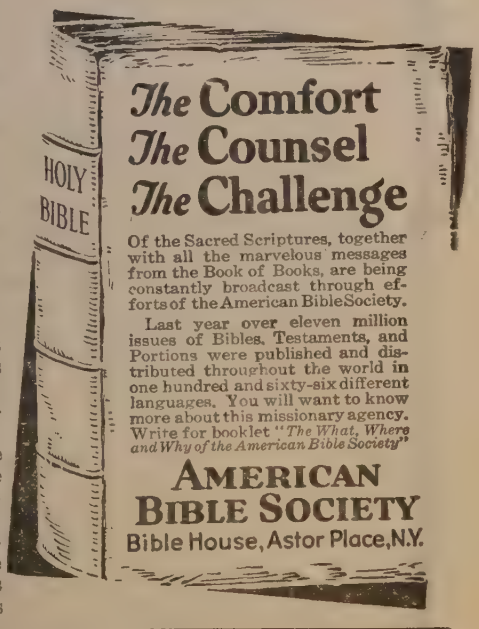
"He speaks: 'In the words of Jesus there is found the most sublime and benevolent code of morals which has ever been offered to man.' "

"For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have ever lasting life."

AN APPEAL.

The main building of St. Andrew's School, St. Andrew's, Tennessee, was entirely destroyed by fire the morning of January 20, 1930. Here were situated the dining-room, the linen-room, with all of the linen for the whole school, all of the reserve stores, the library, one of the best of any preparatory school in the South, the headmaster's office, the business manager's office, the living quarters of the nurse and other women helpers. Besides these, thirty boys and three masters lived in the building. These last lost every thing that they had. The building and contents are a total loss.

The school has no sheets, pillow cases or towels, except what happened to be in the other houses. There are one hundred and twenty people to feed every meal and no dining-room or kitchen.



In spite of these obstacles school is going on as usual.

Here is a list of the needs, all of which are imperative:

Sheets, 99 by 63 inches, tare measurement.
Pillow cases, regular size.
Hand Towels.
Dish Towels.
Bath Towels.
Blankets.
Nakins.
Socks, sizes 7 to 11.
Underwear, Union Suits, heavy, sizes 12 to 21.
Union Suits, light weight, sizes 12 to 21.
Shirts, collars attached, sizes 12 to 16 1-2.
Pajamas, flannel, sizes A. B. C.
Pajamas, light weight, sizes A. B. C.
Shoes, all kinds of shoes will be useful.
Overcoats.
Sweaters.
Handkerchiefs.
Hats.
Gloves.
Neckites.

There were two sewing machines which did good work under the skillful hands of our matrons. They are gone, too. Perhaps some of our friends would be glad to send us a new one, but we should be thankful for even second-hand ones.

TRUTH DISCOVERED

New York, December 27, 1929.

My dear Mr. Williams:

I have read "The Tragic Era" and am returning it with this mail.

It is a terrible indictment of the politicians in power in Washington in that era made into maniacs by passions aroused by the tenacious heroism and valor of the Southern armies in defense of their point of view:—that they had a heaven-given right to secede from the Union, when their fundamental interests demanded it, because the rapacity of the Northern Industrialists egged them on to inflict an onerous "tariff" on the Southern people, mainly agricultural, and too quickly and too heavily, on all importations from abroad—so that the South was forced to sell its products in the cheapest market and buy its necessary goods in the dearest market, this in order that the North—which had turned to intensive industrialism—might prosper more rapidly and thus, practically, making the South—up to then the most cultured part of the country—pay tribute to the "Industrial Barons" of the North.

The slavery question could have been easily settled, by buying the slaves and freeing them, without ever giving them the ballot! But the same fanaticism which has inflicted prohibition, instead of regulation, on the country was operative in 1860 and would not let the abolitionists even listen to reason and compromise, which has ever been the very essence of sound statesmanship.

In 1863 I was ten years old. My mother had died four years before. My father was chief engineer at the St. Louis arsenal, where bullets were being made to kill "Johnny Rebs." I was forced to join the boys who made those bullets and worked there for two years at it. In those days I heard so much about "the damned sesech" that I—a misled boy of ten—of course abhored them. But later, as I became a young man, I moved among a cluster of F. F. V. refugee families living in St. Louis, and there learned the truth about the war. And, after reading a good deal, my sympathies went out to the Southern people and have always remained there.

That accounts for my having done so much monumental work for the South.

Had the Northern politicians followed the policies of Lincoln and Johnson—to bind up the wounds of the Southern people, and to do all they could have done to rehabilitate the South and industrialize it also, and as quick as possible—all would have been as well as possible. But the infernal "lust for power" in the abnormal minds of the leaders of the still young Republican party fanaticized them to such an extent that they concocted the diabolical ("Reconstruction" policy which, as far back as 1873, I felt was ghastly, and at which time—though I was only twenty—I already wrote an essay attacking Grant and his nefarious, vicious, rotten administration, often devilish in its cruelty and corruption.

What fiends were Thad Stevens, Sumner, Morton, Butler, and all the lesser lick-spittle ward-healers in Congress who allowed themselves to be whipped by those four neuropathic, power-hungry, legislative misfits into being the scraggy tails to the bigger dogs and aided and abetted them to inflict on the South the hellish carpet-bag governments, made up mostly of negroes—after they had committed the unpardonable sin of fostering upon the blacks the ballot! It was simply awful! Poor South Carolina! What a nightmare she passed through!

All the South can do now, in its magnanimity, is to forget and, retrospectively, say: "Father, forgive them, for they knew not what they did!"—crazed as they were by a low, filthy lust for power, and believing that, if they committed the crime of giving the priceless ballot to a lot of semi-savage Africans, they would forever dominate the country. Vain, neurotic, dream!

Sincerely,
"ENLIGHTENED NORTHERNER."

GENERAL LEE TO COLONEL CHARLES MARSHALL

In an old letter (of April, 1904, of Captain R. E. Lee, my old comrade of the Rockbridge Battery), I find some comforting words of his father. I had said to Captain Lee that I wondered why our heavenly Father had allowed such a cause as ours, and such a leader as General Lee to fail. Captain Lee wrote: "As to finding out why Providence allowed our cause to fail, I'll send you what my father said in a letter to Colonel Marshall in the darkest hour of his own life, and of the fortunes of the Southern people.

"My experience (he wrote) of men has neither disposed me to think worse of them, nor, in spite of failures, which I lament, of errors which I now see and acknowledge, or of the present aspect of affairs, do I despair of the future. The truth is this. The march of Providence is so slow, and our desires so impatient, the work of progress is so immense, and our means of aiding it so feeble, the life of humanity is so long, and that of the individual so brief, that we often see only the ebb of the advancing wave, and are thus discouraged. It is history that teaches us to hope."

General Lee knew, no doubt, Pope's verses to the same tenor, and not more forcible than his prose:

"Safe in the hands of one dispensing power,
Or in the natal, or the mortal hour,
All nature is but art unknown to thee,
All chance, direction which thou can'st not see,
All discord, harmony not understood,
All partial evil universal good,
And spite of pride and erring reason's spite,
One truth is clear, whatever is, is right."

How calmly and wisely Lee views that "ebb of the advancing wave" which he had so bravely and steadily resisted for four long years of fierce battle, yielding at last to the inevitable, recognizing the hand of Providence in it all, though so disastrous to all he loved best.

I never read Thackeray's "End of the Play" without thinking of General Lee, hardly keeping back the tears.

"Come wealth, come want, come good or ill,
Let young and old accept their part,
And bow before the awful will,
And bear it with an honest heart;
Who misses, or who wins the prize,
Go, lose or conquer as you can;
But if you fail or if you rise,
Be each, pray God, a gentleman!"

GRADING WINNSBORO GRANITE.

Vast as are the deposits of granite, only a very meagre percentage is available for monumental purposes. Even in great Anderson quarries of the Winnsboro Granite Corporation, Rion, S. C., though the granite mass is wonderfully uniform, surpassing most noted granite quarries in this particular, only about 50 per cent. of the granite quarried is considered sufficiently perfect to grade as "Winnsboro Granite".

A very simple test is used at the quarries. A block of stone is thoroughly wet with water. This brings out clearly any and all defects, regarded as defects by the trade. Blocks showing defects are graded as seconds, and are known as "Smith stock."

A third grade, with larger defects, is used for paving blocks; while blocks carrying stains are used only for ballast. Winnsboro Granite must be free from stains, white or black streaks, white or black splotches of size, and must be also free from waves (variation in mixtures of light and dark crystals) in the grain. The first grade product, known as "Winsboro Granite," must be even in texture, of straight grain, giving a uniformly beautiful, even-grained surface.

When buying a monument, be sure to impress your dealer that you do not wish Smith stock or second, but must have "Winnsboro Granite"—first grade granite of one of the very greatest granite quarries of the world.

Send for latest free booklet of designs to Winnsboro Granite Corporation, Rion, S. C., and insist on your dealer supplying you a quarry guarantee that the stone used in your monument is "Winnsboro Granite"—a guarantee signed by the management of the Winnsboro Granite Corporation.

THE HEALING MINISTRY OF JESUS

A HEALING HANDBOOK FOR BELIEVERS.

By Rev. Frank N. Riale, Ph. D., D. D.

There are few things that we know less about, yet sincerely desire to know more about, than the place of "the gift of healing" in the full Evangel of Jesus. It is this "more excellent," more rational and more universal way that this little volume aims to set forth.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

"The selfish man is always bored."

"No man can love his work who does not work."

We can see God without only when we have God within.

When he calls He endows with power. His sympathy never fails. Like the pillar of fire by night and cloud by day, His Presence ever goes with His servants; and always on their shoulder they may feel the touch of pressure of His right hand.—Canon V. F. Storr.

O'er me spreads the starry sky
Mirror of eternity
Boundless, endless, and sublime
Far above the things of time
Where a purpose deep, supreme
Is the grand eternal scheme,
Faith, and Hope and Reason say,
"God is not a child at play."

"I am an old man decayed from head to foot. My eyes are dim, my right hand shakes much, my mouth is hot and dry every morning. However, blessed be God, I do not slack my labor. I can still preach and write."—John Wesley, at 87.

If prayer was needed to end the last war, prayer is needed to maintain the present peace. National statesmen have not seemed to recognize this. In the desperation and agony of the spring and summer of that dark year 1918 the leaders of the Allies—military, civil, and Church— did indeed recognize their helplessness and peril, and they called upon their peoples to turn to God in confession and entreaty. Are the needs and perils of peace any less? Is there not a call to prayer when the destinies of nations are wrapped up in the possibilities of peace?—S. S. Times.

God is love, and in Him is no fear at all; and because God made man in His own image and likeness, fear is unconstitutional with mankind.—William Farwell.

"Live to do good: but not with thought to win
From man return of any kindness done.
Remember Him who died on cross for sin,
The Merciful, the Meek, rejected One.
When He was slain for crime of doing good,
Can'st thou expect return of gratitude?

DOES GOD CARE?

If God does not care, this world is the loneliest place in all creation. The light has gone out. There is perpetual shadow. The earth is cold, the heavens are brass, life has lost its wings. A vast vacancy remains, a deep homesickness of soul. It is appalling to lose faith in the care and providence of God. "The Great Companion Is Dead."

Does God Care? Nature is the first to answer—"Yes." The magnitudes of creation—do they seem to lack care? The cluster of the Pleiades, the bands of Orion—who but God is the Caretaker of them all? The infinitesimals of creation—molecules, atoms, electrons—not one of them can fall. Living things—Jesus gave two examples. Sparrow. "Not one of them shall fall on the ground." Men. "The very hairs of your head are all numbered." Eloquently nature proclaims the particular providence of God.

Human instincts and experience unite to say—"He cares." Our knowledge of God as a living and loving Person strengthens this faith. We cannot think of God as not caring. Earthly parents, imperfect, care for their children. Shall not God, the Perfect One, give good things to His children? Beautiful argument of One who knew. If you tell me that my God does not care when I am in trouble, then I must change all my ideas of His character. I must think of Him as far away and unconcerned. His arm is shortened—He cannot reach me. His will is weak—He cannot hold me up. His love is cold—He cannot warm me. If God does not care, everything is changed for me. Men and women do not care; they are far below God. Indifference sits at life's helm. God Himself is changed.

Strange how men—even wicked men—cling to God's care. Sin and unbelief may mar it. Still it shines like a jewel in the dust. A story used to be told in the West of a stranger who came to a mining camp. He was an atheist. The miners listened to him in silence. There came a day when one of them laid away his daughter—his one little ewe lamb. That evening there was serious talk in one of the saloons. The men were trying in their rude way to comfort the father. The atheist interrupted—"There is no God. If there be one He does not care." Then a strange thing occurred. Those godless men arose and thrust out the man who told them that God does not care.

We know God's care by experience. We have felt his everlasting arms beneath us. We have been conscious of a Presence nearer to us than hands and feet, closer than breathing. How many occasions have there been when our loneliness was cured, and our fears scattered, by divine companionship. A single personal experience of God's care lights up the whole of life.

Does God care? In ten thousand places and ways the Bible says—"Yes." It is full to running over with God's care. Three books out of sixty-six describe it in story form—Ruth, Esther, Philemon. Add another life story—Job. The Proverbs is almost a manual on the subject. Precepts, maxims, incidents, teachings, examples—everywhere. Abraham, singled out for his great work; Joseph, guided through peril to power; Moses, who might have died in infancy. Outstanding examples these!

The New Testament magnifies, illuminates, the Old. With what winsomeness the Master speaks of God. "Our Father!" O the eloquence, the far reach, of two such words. "Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith?" One moving sentence outreaches all the philosophies—God is love! Omit God's care and you would not recognize your Bible. It is saturated with providence. Here we see how near and tender our Heavenly Father is, how minute and inexhaustible His love. No, says the Book over and over again—we "cannot drift beyond His love and care."

Greatest of all answers is Christ Himself, beloved Son of His Father and ours. Enter with Him the shadows of Gethsemane. Stand alongside His cross on Calvary. Linger at the open tomb in the garden. Climb to the hill where He ascended. A thousand times, Yes! God cares!

Nature, instinct, faith, life itself, the Bible, prayer, the Christian experience of God, all tell us that God cares. From Bethlehem to Calvary, on to the Resurrection and the Ascension—the gospel proclaims that God cares.

All this is true. But why such bewilderment of sorrow? It is the man who has failed who speaks. It is the invalid on his bed with the world going by. It is another with shattered hopes lying at his feet. It is an agonized multitude who have lost loved ones. Such catastrophes, such "slings and arrows of outrageous fortune." Why? Oh, why?

Simply, lovingly, trustfully, led us believe that the 'ways' of this earth, so difficult for us, are not unanswerable. If we could see and know all that God sees and knows, what revelations would come. The shadowed side of sorrow is toward us. One other side must be—light!

More than ever God is a Father to souls in distress. Trust Him! This is the highway to peace. Trust is better than explanation. More than ever Christ is Saviour, Companion, Elder Brother, to burdened hearts. Our sufferings cannot be compared with His. Once even He asked —Why? How close He is to us in our blinding griefs—"touched with the feeling of our infirmities." More than ever to doubting spirits in their painful quests the Holy Spirit is Comforter, Teacher, Friend in the House of Interpreter. How rich toward God are the children of suffering.

Three simple yet wonderful things venture and do by faith. Be quiet and search earnestly for the softened meanings of life's shadows. Rest deeply in "the patience of unanswered prayer." Walk much in company with the Great Sufferer. And a fourth thing—carry life's perplexities bravely to the Bible and the altar of prayer.

Edgar Whitaker Work, D. D.,
American Tract Society Leaflet.

RT. REV. CHARLES PALMERSTON ANDERSON, D. D.

WITHIN the brief period of scarcely four months we mourn again the death of our Presiding Bishop.

The Most Reverend Charles Palmerston Anderson, D. D., was called home to God on Thursday, January 30, at 8:42 A. M.

Nine days previously Bishop Anderson was stricken with a severe heart attack and had to be carried to his residence from St. James' Cathedral, where he was attending a Council meeting of his Diocese of Chicago. Prayers were offered for him in churches throughout the country, and for a while it seemed as if he might recover. As late as Tuesday the report was given out that he was slightly better, in spite of the delirium from which he suffered. At times, when his mind was normal again, he even talked over the affairs of the Church. However, all hope for his recovery was abandoned Wednesday midnight, and the members of his family were summoned.

At his bedside, when he died were his wife, Mrs. Janet Glass Anderson; their four daughters, Mrs. Haven Requa of Lake Forest, Mrs. George Boyer of Toronto, Canada; Mrs. Lester E. Frankenthal of Chicago, and Miss Nancy Anderson; Dr. James B. Herrick, noted heart specialist; Dr. Lester E. Frankenthal, Jr., son-in-law of Bishop Anderson; Dr. Howard Wakefield, who was in constant attendance upon the Bishop for three days, and the Rt. Rev. Sheldon M. Griswold, Suffragan Bishop of Chicago.

Bishop Anderson's only son was killed while serving with the American forces overseas in the World War.

Bishop Anderson was born in Kemptville, Ont., near Ottawa, on September 8, 1864. His education was received at Trinity College School, Port Hope, Ont., and Trinity University, Toronto. At the completion of his divinity course in 1887 he was ordained a deacon in Christ Church, now the Cathedral at Ottawa, by Archbishop John Travers Lewis. He was advanced to the priesthood a year later and put in charge of a church at Beachburg, Ont. Under his leadership the church grew until it required the services of three clergymen.

While at Beachburg, Dr. Anderson was married to Miss Janet Glass of Belleville, Ont., on September 4, 1889.

In May, 1891, he received a call to Grace Church, Oak Park, Chicago. This congregation also grew under his direction, so that it became necessary to construct a new church. Before the new edifice was completed Dr. Anderson was chosen Bishop Coadjutor of Chicago at a special diocesan convention held at the Cathedral on January 9, 1900. He was elected by almost unanimous vote on the first ballot. Upon the death of Bishop William Edward McLaren, on February 19, 1905, Dr. Anderson became Bishop of the Diocese, which office he has held for the last twenty-five years.

As our readers will readily recall, on November 13, 1929, the House of Bishops elected Bishop Anderson Presiding Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States. This took place at a meeting specially called to elect a successor to fill out two years of the unexpired term of Bishop John Gardner Murray, who died suddenly October 3, 1929.

Bishop Anderson, at the time of the election, had been in somewhat bad health, suffering from heart disease from time to time for the last two years. For this reason, he was not even considered in the first ballots at the meeting in Washington Cathedral. It was only when a complete deadlock between two equally popular bishops seemed imminent, that his brother bishops called on him, as a man loved and admired by all who knew him, to assume the additional and heavy responsibility. This Bishop Anderson graciously and cheerfully consented to, even though at that time grave concern was expressed that this might impair his already weak health. He showed that he understood his Master's teaching: "He that findeth his life shall lose it; and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it."

And he has now been called to his reward to the higher, fuller life in the presence of his Lord.

At the time of his election Bishop Anderson said he had tried to be an "apostle of peace," and in his first public speech outside his own diocese after his election he made a plea for unity in the Protestant Episcopal Church. Ten years earlier, in 1919, as President of the Church's commission on faith and order, he had taken a leading part in the preparations then being made for a world conference of Christian Churches.

Although he once urged all the Churches of Chicago to unite in an effort for civic betterment and the elimination of "rotten politics, bad government and commercialized vice," Bishop Anderson took a firm stand against the intrusion of the Church into partisan politics. Speaking at the General Convention held in Washington during the Presidential campaign of 1928, he declared that "party politics pollute religion, but religion purifies politics."

Bishop Anderson also sought to reconcile the teachings of science and religion. The real conflict, he said, was not so much between science and religion as between the new science and the old science. Religion, he maintained, must not quarrel with demonstrated facts, but interpret these facts in terms of spiritual value.

Within the Protestant Episcopal Church, Bishop Anderson was regarded as a modified Anglo-Catholic, but he was preeminently a broadminded Churchman with a great love for his Saviour and for his fellow men.

In connection with his work in 1919, in preparation for the World Conference on Faith and Order, Bishop Anderson, with two other Bishops and two Episcopal clergymen, had an audience with the late Pope Benedict XV. The Pope, however, declined to comply with their request that the Roman Catholic Church be allowed to take part in the conference.

As Presiding Bishop, Bishop Anderson retained his position as Bishop of the Diocese of Chicago, dividing his time between the national headquarters of the Protestant Episcopal Church in New York and his own headquarters in Chicago. His formal assumption of the duties of Presiding Bishop took place on November 26, 1929, in the Church Missions House, 481 Fourth Avenue. On December 11, Bishop Anderson presided for the first time over a meeting of the National Council of the Church.

The Rt. Rev. William Andrew Leonard, of Cleveland, Bishop of Ohio, becomes the acting head of the Church following the death of Bishop Anderson, and to him falls the duty of calling a meeting of the House of Bishops to select a new Presiding Bishop. Bishop Griswold becomes the acting head of the Chicago diocese.

An election of Coadjutor Bishop of Chicago, who would succeed Bishop Anderson was called just the day before his death, and a meeting of the Diocesan Committee was called the day of his death to reform plans for the diocesan convention and election this week.

Bishop Leonard, Senior Bishop in order of consecration, had sailed for the West Indies, January 29, the day before Bishop Anderson's death. Bishop Burleson, who, as Bishop Anderson's assessor, had been in charge at Church Missions House, sent a radio message to Bishop Leonard, informing him and asking him to appoint an assessor, and authorize the calling of a meeting of the House of Bishops in accordance with the Constitution of the Church, Article I, Section 3, second paragraph.

Bishop Leonard replied, appointing Bishop Burleson as his assessor, and naming either Chicago or St. Louis as the place of meeting. Bishop Burleson and Dr. Lewis B. Franklin went to Chicago for the funeral, and the Bishop was to confer with other bishops in attendance there.

The funeral took place in St. James' Cathedral, Chicago, at ten-thirty, Saturday morning, February 1.

Among those attending the services were the Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman of Washington, D. C.; the Rt. Rev. Herman Page, of Detroit; the Rt. Rev. Benjamin F. P. Ivons, of Milwaukee, and the Rt. Rev. Hugh L. Burleson, Bishop of South Dakota and the assessor to Bishop Anderson.

Pending completion of the new Anderson Chapel of the Western Theological Seminary in Evanston, the body will rest in a vault at Rosehill Cemetery.

Writing just after Bishop Anderson's death on January 30, Bishop Burleson said:

"Twice within four months the Episcopal Church has been called upon to mourn the death of its Presiding Bishop. Charles Palmerston Anderson who, on the morning of January 30, passed into the larger life, was an outstanding figure in our own Communion and in the Christian Church of America. A man of fine physique and splendid presence, his personal qualities of mind and heart endeared him to all who came in contact with him. As a preacher, he ranged among the leading men in the pulpits of America. Called last November to take up the responsibilities of the Presiding Bishop of the whole Church, he had begun his administration with a vigor and wisdom which were already winning the confidence of his fellow workers. That an administration which gave such promise of success should be cut short by his lamented death is a tragic misfortune."

Bishop Anderson was active early and late, "endeavoring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace."

"I heard a voice from heaven, saying unto me, Write, From henceforth blessed are the dead who die in the Lord; even so, saith the Spirit: for they rest from their labours; and their works do follow them."

"I am the resurrection and the life, saith the Lord: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; whosoever liveth and believeth in me, shall never die."

CHRISTIAN UNITY

By John L. Williams

IN the eyes of the general world, the Protestant Episcopal Church is identified with the Book of Common Prayer. As a Church, it avows itself as one of the many households of faith that make up the family of our Lord Jesus Christ: the Universal, the Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church which is His Body—the Mother of us all.

The pious manual of our household proclaims the largeness of heart and all embracing love and honor of the Mother on its title page. It is Common Prayer. It aims to teach and order reverently and decently, praise and prayer, and set in order the "Administration of the Sacraments, and other rites and ceremonies of the Church (the Holy Mother), according to the use of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America"—which is our special household and family.

Our household acknowledges and honors all Churches which worship our Common Lord and Father in sincerity and truth. It acknowledges the right of all Churches to adopt different forms and usages, "provided only the substance of the Faith be kept entire."

Its spirit and principle is: In essentials unity; in non-essentials liberality; and in all things charity."

The very existence of distinct churches and households of faith, members of one body, contemplates divers governments, forms, usages, tastes, manners, institutions and observances and offices. So the Apostle compares the general Church to our physical system, with its limbs and organs.

The peace of society requires that the individual shall do his duty in that state of life in which God has placed him. And the health of the body requires the effectual working in the measure of each member and organ. The father shall rule well his own household; and each household shall "mind its own business" in the fear of God, and be careful not to regulate others.

No two of us are exactly alike. There are many men of many minds, and every household has its own institutions, and is happy in its own way. Customs and tastes and desires vary infinitely. God only can make men to be of one mind in a house. And we can be one only in the mind of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is Light and Love.

The Church of England is like its Common Law, the growth and perfection of ages of piety and trial. And the Book of Common Prayer is the common growth and embodiment of the devotion, piety and thought of the religious, God-fearing people of all time, tried as by fire, and formed by good and learned men.

Our own Prayer Book is, like the original, our Lord Jesus Christ in miniature: His walk and conversation; following the course and order of the Church year. Its Feasts and Fasts are like altars and stations along the journey of life. The Spirit of our Lord is the light over our tabernacle. Piety and good-breeding pervade the manual. It antagonizes only error and irreverence. It is full of grace and truth—the mind of the Lord and Master. Its fellowship is the Communion of Saints, the spirits of just men made perfect.

The Book of Common Prayer is a casket of crown jewels, and wardrobe of the gentle, wise and loving mother. Its truth and principles, on which it is built, realize the typical precious stones that make the foundations of the New Jerusalem. Its selections from Holy Scriptures are the vesture of pure gold wrought about with divers colors. And its anthems and collects in their beautiful language are as the raiment of finest needlework. Its simple and beautiful robes of office and ceremonials are meant to suggest the grace and purity that should clothe and characterize the worshippers and worship of God—the fine linen of the saints. Its rubrics are proprieties.

The pious care of our beloved mother is lovingly and reverently to magnify her Lord; rightly to distribute the pure milk of the Word, in all things; to make manifest and familiar His truth, meekness and righteousness; to feed His lambs and sheep; and scatter the divine fragrance and influence of His ever-abiding presence. The Testimony of Jesus is the Spirit of Prophecy; the Light and Life of our Prayer Book.

Our mother does not command conformity or obedience; nor is she jealous of her rights or honors. Her loving kindness and gentleness and respect bespeak her high birth and breeding. She only asks that every sincere Christian will regard her manual with a meek, candid and charitable frame of mind; without prejudice or prepossessions; seriously considering what Christianity is, and what the truths of the Gospel are: earnestly beseeching Almighty God to accompany with His blessing every endeavor for promulgating them to mankind in the clearest, plainest, most affecting and majestic manner for the sake of our blessed Lord and Saviour.

The Universal Church, with all her families, has but One Lord, One Faith, One Baptism, One God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in all.

The dying prayer of our Lord and Saviour was that all His followers, His little ones, might be one, as He and the Father are one. In that all diversities of human mind are absorbed and lost. Absolute Unity is realized in absolute love of Him; with all the heart and mind and soul and strength. Our Divine Lord is the Way, the Truth, the Life and by Him we are one with the Father. Our perfection is the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ.

In the House of God and in His Worship, we are to "keep the faith," and see that all things shall be "done decently and in order." All accept the instructions of the Apostles; all believe in reverence in the worship of Almighty God, in well considered words in our praises and our prayers. In common life there are good manners and ill-manners. There are proprieties and improprieties; and there are standards and conventionalities that measure and bespeak taste, breeding and cultivation, that make and mark good society. The disregard of these offends and antagonizes. And yet in the observance and application of these there are varieties and degrees. Rigid righteousness makes a fool. Too strict attention to social forms and fashion betrays indifferent and uncertain standing. There is such a thing as ecclesiastical snobbery and over-done goodness. And there is such a thing as ignorant and bold assurance. Between the extremes of exactness and vulgarity there are levels and diversities. The true gentleman is one > "Who vice in all its pomp and power,

> Can treat with just neglects,
> And piety, though clothed in rags,
> Religiously respects."

So devout members of Christ and children of God look to essentials, to sincere piety and fidelity. They love what is pure and right and decent and sensible and proper. They try to do their duty and be kind and considerate to all, the poorest and most unfavored, as well as the richest and most distinguished. They honor all men and regard it as a sin against God and man, and against their own self-respect to make any distinction between poor and rich. But they cannot adapt their ideas of truth or reverence or decency or propriety to popular notions and low ideas. In things of the highest importance the merchantable article will not suit them. They honor all good, but will not take bad for good, bitter for sweet, wrong for right. They do not approve compromises between right and wrong; between Christ and Belial.

The Book of Common Prayer contains matters of order as well as of essense; forms and usages that are variable, as well as great truths and principles that are invariable. Its essentials are the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments, and the Sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper. All Christians agree in the substance of these. But not only churches, but congregations and individuals, differ in the use and administration, and even the exact meaning of these. And yet all are One in worshipping their Crucified Lord.

The Book of Common Prayer, by the Church year, establishes stores of life-giving food at holy stations, and associates all the journey of life with the life of the Saviour; and makes Him our Companion; His inspiring comforts and teachings our vade mecum. Its whole Lectionary, the Lessons—its Gospels and Epistles, its Psalms and anthems and collects are common property of the Universal Church and of all Churches. Only its forms, usages and rubrics, and its Church government are its specialties. Its household ways are special, as every other household with its institutions and manners is special.

The absurdity of the Spartan lawgiver was to abolish families and make all feed at one table; and to abolish money by which only interchange of values can be carried on and honorable self-love preserved.

It would be just as absurd to bring all Christians down to one level, of manners and language and dress (as has been tried), and to wipe out all social differences and conventionalities and proprieties—to abolish all social currency, and personal property.

Birds of a feather flock together, and like tastes make associations. Mere sense of duty will not make people enjoy one another's company. To force uncongenial and different people together makes confusion and trouble.

We come together as we approach true standards. Peace and good will come of devotion to our Lord and Master.

The forty-second and sixty-first chapters of Isaiah are good places to come together in. The Lord's Prayer heartily offered is a good way to perfect Unity. Devout readers of the Gospel of the Beloved Disciple, who leaned on the bosom of his Lord, and felt His loving kindly look and breath, will find themselves very near in Christian Unity. Controversialists and professionals are going to keep apart. Their association is likely to be rather a mechanical mixture than a chemical combination; formal, but not essential.

Only the Spirit of the Saviour can cleanse the bosom of the perilous stuff of ambition, jealousy, envy, hatred, malice, prejudice, and the odium theologicum of varied strength and solution.

Dogmatic theology will never awaken love. Syllogisms are not the wings that lift the soul to God.

THE TRUE STONEWALL JACKSON

By the Reverend J. J. Clopton

LETTERS OF JACKSON.

COPY made October 5, 1909, by Louis Bennett, of a letter written by T. J. ("Stonewall") Jackson to Jonathan Bennett, then Auditor of the State of Virginia:

Jackson's committee of Brigadier General was secured, and this First Brigade of Virginia troops a month later was immortalized at First Manassas, and from the lamented Bee's burning words renamed after its leader, the "Stonewall Brigade." With the exception of a few weeks, Jackson commanded it until promoted to a corps commander. No more gallant soldiers ever followed leader than did some of his men recruited from Western Virginia in the gallant 25th Va., some of whose scarred veterans I know.

Through the courtesy of Hon. Lewis Bennett, son of one of the executors of his father, Hon. Jonathan M. Bennett, I am furnished with copies of two other letters. While these letters are of a personal nature, they at the same time not only show Jackson's high deep affection, but high opinion of his civilian friend, Hon. Jonathan M. Bennett, as splendid material for a soldier:

Winchester, Va., Feby. 28th, 1862.

My dear Colonel:

I telegraphed to you last week that Major Jackson had resigned from my staff, and requested you to say whether you would be willing to take his place with the rank of Major, but have not heard from you. You must not understand from my request that I desire you to give up your present position for the sake of coming into the field. But Captain Jackson told me that he would not be surprised should you decline a reelection. And should you do so, the thought struck me that you might desire active service with this army. The position of Adjutant-General is one of great labor and requires much study and an entire ignoring of personal ease. As it is the chief staff position, its head should be an example of military adherence to regulations. Please let me hear from you soon and either accept or decline. My opinion is that you would make an admirable Adjutant General. The letters written to you about Alfred please destroy. As you had been instrumental in getting him the position, it was proper that you should know the objection to him. Apart from the request made by me of you in the letter. Alfred expects to bring his old Company back into service, and I hope that he will secure distinction in the line.

Your most attached friend,

T. J. Jackson.

Copy of a letter to Hon. J. M. Bennett. The above copy was made by Lewis Bennett on March 20, 1907, and the original delivered to Hon. Virgil A. Lewis, as a loan for use at the Jamestown Exposition.

Shortly before the Chickahominy campaign, Jackson wrote the following letter to Hon. Jonathan M. Bennett. who was providing for joining Jackson, should McClellan be successful in his efforts to take Richmond:

Near Mt. Meridian, June 14th, 1862.

My dear Colonel:

Your letter respecting your joining me in the event of the fall of Richmond came safely to hand. I hope and trust that no hostile foot will in the Providence of God ever be permitted to enter our honored capital, but should that calamity befall us, I will be very glad to have you with us in the field. Colonel Jackson is with me, and I hope that he will so continue during the remainder of the war, as his services are very valuable.

Your most attached friend.

T. J. Jackson.

Copy made October 5, 1909, by Lewis Bennett of a letter written by T. J. ("Stonewall") Jackson to Jonathan M. Bennett, who was at that time Auditor of the State of Virginia.

JACKSON, THE SOLDIER.

The military achievements of "Stonewall" Jackson are not only the pride of the people for whose constitutional rights he offered his noble life on his country's bloody altar, but will remain lessons to be studied by soldiers until "war's rude alarms shall cease." His military creed, like his religious, was one of great brevity. It may be comprehended under three heads: first, Boldness of Design; second, Patience of Detail; third, Rapidity of Execution. From that bloody summer day when the fields of his beloved Virginia were bathed in the blood of her noblest sons and of the Southland, to that fateful eventide when he fell at Chancellorsville, these three rules were the rudiments of his stern art. At the opening of his brief career as "Lee's Right Hand," he thrust aside any other plan of a successful war but that of invasion. He was not a Fabian, but a Scipio Africanus. He was boldness personified, and he chafed under restraint. In all his great and uniformly successful campaigns his was the policy which men less bold would have deemed impossible. To double up McClellan's flank in 1862, to wedge himself into the rear of Pope at Second Manassas, with the gallant legions of Longstreet and A. P. Hill on the further side of Bull Run Mountain and interpose thirty miles between himself and Lee in his gallant flank movement on Hooker's flank at Chancellorsville, a less bold spirit would never have considered. Like the eagle, disdaining to soar along the verdant meadows, his great soul mounted where strife and danger were boon companions, striking from his high vantage with irresistible sweep. Every detail of armament, commissary and movement was patiently mastered and not left to subordinates. An old soldier has told me of this habit of his great chieftain, in and out at all times among his men, knowing every detail. Moving like an unchained bolt, he struck his adversaries when least expecting it. After defeating the converging columns of Banks, Fremont and Shields in the Valley of Virginia, and the Washington authorities thinking he was in the Valley, he surprised McClellan in the swamps of Chickahominy. His plans, once made, brooked no delay nor crossing. To the student of his campaign nothing is more striking than how unvaryingly he combined boldness, preparedness and swiftness as the cardinal laws of his conduct of war.

That he would have handled a great army with the same unerring principles that he handled a regiment, a brigade, a corps, may be safely predicted.

With Jackson at Fort Donelson there would have been no surrender.

With Jackson at Gettysburg there would have been no three days' fighting, no need of the undying glory with which Pickett immortalized his division on Little Round Top, as he threw his immortals against the mountains gleaming with steel and trembling under the deafening shocks of hundreds of guns, turning the air into flaming meteors of destruction. If the past, while he lived, may be taken as a prophecy of the future, who can measure what may have been the sequel of that great strife had he lived to see its end?

Jackson's military career in the great Civil War is measured by two brief years. In that short time by strategy, swiftness of movement and dogged fighting, he made campaigns which entitle him to stand as one of the greatest Captains of all time.

The famous stand at First Manassas, when he earned his immortal name of "Stonewall"; the wonderful Valley campaign, when outnumbered, he prevented combination of three converging columns: the bloody Seven Days Battles around beautiful Richmond; the crushing defeat of his enemies at Cedar Mountains, the glorious achievements at Sharpsburg; the two battles around ancient Fredericksburg; and Chancellorsville, that sheathed forever his victorious sword, were all fought in two years. In none of the campaigns of Napoleon, of Wellington, of Marlborough, or the great Captain of ancient times, will there be found parallels.

Truly the achievements of Stonewall Jackson have earned the well-known prophecy, "In coming time you will be proud to have been a member of this (The Stonewall Brigade) brigade," reflecting not on himself, but his soldiers.

In some future American Westminster Abbey, when history, unblinded by prejudice and unmeasured by success as the standard of right, Jackson will be enthroned as one of America's greatest Patriots and Soldiers. To us of the South, nothing can rob him of his high place. The uniformity of his success, the glories of his arms, the immortality of his veterans, place him by himself. It is no conjecture of prejudice, it is no robbing our beloved Lee of his matchless glory to give his great lieutenant so high praise.

PRESENT YOUR BODIES.

By Mrs. Mary G. Wray, Chicago, Illinois.

My hands? Could His dear will,
Their fragile strength employ?
Master, I lay them now in Thine,
For servile task, or deed benign—
Thy bidding all my joy—
To toil, or to be still.

My feet? Their stumbling tread
The heav'nly way pursue?
Ah, dearest joy to follow Thee,
The path or strait or rugged be,
Or, by the waters blue—
So by Thy hand I'm led.

My tongue? His praise reveal?
The kingly mercies of my Lord?
That falt'ring lips, at such behest,
Persuasive speak the message blest
With glowing coal, O Living World,
Upon them put the seal!

Prostrate before the Cross, at last,
My hands, my feet, myself I cast—
To speak, to go, to act for One,
So much for me hath borne, hath done.

Or gnarled rod, or golden pen,
Unto the altar bringing then,
Off'ring acceptable will be,
So God hath wrought His will in me.

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSE.

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice, eternal treasures, indeed. "Thy word have I hid in my heart, that I might not sin against thee." Ps. 119:11.)

This week the following verse was submitted by

Mrs. F. Montz, of Buffalo, New York:

"Be ye kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you" (Eph. 4:32).

Who will send one from the far-away places as well as very near us?

Book Reviews

THE MIND OF ST. PAUL: By Arthur Holmes, A. M., Ph. D., Professor of Psychology, University of Pennsylvania. Cloth. Pp. 257 with Index. Published by The Macmillan Company, New York. Price, $2.00.

This study in the Mind of St. Paul is based upon the conviction that modern psychology can do a vast deal to enlighten the ignorance of many religious leaders concerning the human soul. The subject matter divides itself naturally into three parts: First, a character analysis of Saul the Hebrew; second, the analysis and description, in terms of mental processes, of his notable conversion, and demonstrating the inadequacy of the scientific explanations of that event; and third, the processes by which St. Paul built his new faith, and especially the place of reason in this development. His experience, it is concluded, demonstrates the insufficiency of scientific description and the naturalness of his religion in the light of the newest philosophy and latest interpretations of nature. Dr. F. J. Foakes-Jackson, himself a leading American writer on St. Paul, contributes the Introduction which concludes with the forecast: "I confess that I should be in no wise surprised if this book proved itself to be an epoch-making attempt towards a true estimate of the Apostle to the Gentiles. E. L. W.

THE GOSPEL OF DIVINE PERSONALITY. The Self-Revelation of Christ in the Gospel of St. John: By William Samuel Bishop, D. D. Cloth. Pp. 123. Published by The Faith Press, London. American Agents: The Morehouse Publishing Company, Milwaukee. Price, $1.

The Gospel, which St. John presents, is a personal Gospel—a Gospel of the Divine Person, and not primarily a Gospel of the Kingdom. Apart from two passages (to Nicodemus and Pilate—both outsiders) there is no direct mention of the "kingdom." It is Christ in His uniqueness as the eternal Word of Life—the Word who "became flesh"—who is in this Gospel presented to our minds for recognition, and, above all, to our hearts for acceptance and self-surrender of faith. This little book presents a deeply spiritual and illuminating expository commentary on St. John's Gospel through Chapter 17—Christ's great "high-priestly prayer." E. L. W.

BIBLE QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

(Our readers are invited to send in their questions from time to time concerning Scriptural subjects in which they are perplexed or desire light. Our limited space necessitates brevity in questions, as well as in the answers which we will endeavor to maintain in strict accord with the Word of the Lord, which, after all, settles all argument. This column is therefore not for controversy, but for a testimony.)

Question No. 21.—What parts of the Bible should a young convert read first?—L. E. E.

Answer.—We would recommend: (1) The Gospel of John, followed by each of the other Gospels, Luke, Mark, and Matthew; (2) Acts of the Apostles; (3) Romans, after which the remainder of the New Testament should be read in regular order, bearing in mind that the rejected Kingdom of our Lord on Earth as recorded in Matthew, is yet to be established when He returns in great power and glory. See Matt. 24; Rev. 19, and numerous other Scriptures.

Question No. 22.—Please explain Acts 13:48: "And as many as were ordained to eternal life believed."—L. E. M.

Answer.—God knows in advance those who are going to accept or reject His plan of redemption for a lost world (Rom. 8:29, 30). Those who receive Christ as their Saviour are ordained to Eternal Life for that reason. Whosoever will, may come, Rev. 22:17, and all who come will be received (John 6:37). But many will not come and receive so wonderful a salvation, John 5:40. Dear Reader, how is it with you?

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letters to the Editor" will appear in our columns except those coming to us signed by writer.

"DADDY" HALL.

Mr. Editor:

I am writing for two reasons. First, to thank you for inserting my article on Wall Street preaching, etc. One sentence has caused a good deal of stir—about Lounge Lizards, etc., but that was not said of the present clergy, but of those who sought the ministry from such reasons. No doubt we have many in now who came in for no higher reasons than a living and an easy life. True. One lady in Virginia wrote me thanking me for the article and sent a check for literature for use in Wall Street. It is much needed, but it never occurred to me to say so in the article. I am compelled to print or buy thousands of tracts—more than 100,000 last year and must get more constantly. I am not allowed to appeal for offerings there. If I were, the needed funds would be easily raised. Everybody thinks I am supported by Trinity, but not so. A gentleman paid a small sum the first year and one-third of the amount last year and through small business failures has not been able to offer anything this year. I certainly do enjoy your smashing into the Modernists as you do constantly. There is no telling what influence the paper has. I speak of it wherever I go. There should be some way to get the ear of the laymen in the Church, so thy would back it.

A CORRECTION.

Mr. Editor:

In reference to the Editorial in your issue of February 1, while not entering at this time into the discussion, may I call your attention to the fact that you are in error in your statement that Andrew Carnegie left an endowment of two million dollars to the Federal Council.

The Federal Council has never received any money from Mr. Carnegie and does not have any of the income from any such endowment.

In fact, the Federal Council is supported by the churches and their members and has no endowment, its invested funds being only about $50,000.

PRIESTHOOD.

Mr. Editor:

In a letter, appearing in your issue of December 7, the writer classes a "sacrificing Priesthood" as something which is "Roman Catholic, but not truly Catholic." I had to rub my eyes and read this again. For thirty years I have been laboring under the delusion that as a Priest of the Church I had been appointed by our Lord to stand at His altar and offer sacrifice. I should like to ask what other kind of Priesthood there is?

Now, a "non-sacrificing Priesthood" is an absurdity; if the second order of the ministry does not offer sacrifice, then that order is not a Priesthood at all. And if we are in that sad case, then we have been robbed of one of the most beautiful and spiritually-uplifting phases of our ministry.

I would remind my brother that in the preface to the ordinal, in his favorite Second Prayer Book of Edward VI, as well as in the First, the English Church declared that she had no other thought than to "continue, reverently use and esteem" the three orders of the ministry which had been in the Church from the time of the Apostles. This gives me hope that after all I am a real Priest.

I sympathize with the desire to keep our Church free from certain importations from the Roman Communion; there is much in the teaching and in the devotional atmosphere of that communion which is foreign to the genius of the Anglican Communion. But in giving expression to this desire it were well to know what is truly Catholic and what is merely Roman, because this Church is not a sect which took its origin in the sixteenth century, it is an integral part of the Holy Catholic Church of the Creeds with a continuous history of more than nineteen centuries. And the real spiritual treasures of all those centuries, whether in the realm of doctrine or of the devotional life, belong to us by right. We do not have to borrow them from anybody.

Now, the doctrine of the Eucharistic sacrifice is no monopoly of the Roman Communion. It is truly Catholic, in the fullest sense of that word. Certainly my brother would not accuse Irenaeus of being a "Romanizer." Listen to him: "Took the bread which is of this (lower) creation and gave thanks, saying: 'This is my body'; and likewise the cup—and confessed it to be His blood, and taught new oblation of the new covenant which the Church receiving from the Apostles offers to God over the whole world." Surely we need not fear that we shall fall into doctrinal error if we follow the broad lines of theology as taught in that period of the Church's history upon which we have to depend for our very knowledge of what constitutes the Canon of the Holy Scriptures.

Yes, I believe I shall go on thinking I am a real Priest, and that I offer sacrifice every time I stand at the altar and celebrate the Holy Communion, a sacrifice far more real than any offered by the Aaronic priesthood: their sacrifices were but figures of the sacrifice which I offer for that which I offer is "the one true, pure, immortal sacrifice." And I do not have to go to any Roman ritual to find out that fact, nor even to the First Prayer Book of Edward VI. I simply open the Prayer Book of "The Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States" and turn to the Prayer of Consecration in the service of the Holy Communion. In the second section of that prayer I find that we Episcopalians really do have an Oblation; this word sounds quite sacrificial to me. An oblation of what? of "these thy holy gifts, which we now offer (another sacrificial word) unto Thee." Now, whatever opinion we may hold as to the exact moment when the consecration of the bread and wine are effected, we are here engaged in a sacrificial action of uniting the sacrament to that which was accomplished upon the Cross; we are memorially enacting, before our Heavenly Father and our earthly brethren, the great and glorious drama of the Cross of Love. Personally, I do not try to differentiate between the various acts of the drama because I know that since the Holy Communion is our "Peace Offering" the sacrificial action can not be complete until we have feasted upon the Lamb of God by making our communion. But I am very sure that in that complete sacrificial action we are doing on earth what our great High Priest is doing in Heaven. The sacrifice of Christ is timeless. He is the Lamb of God, "Slain from the foundation of the world," and while the suffering of death was confined to the Cross He still bears in His resurrection body the wound prints of the Passion. And in that resurrection body He is present with us in every celebration of the Holy Communion, present as our Peace Offering that we, in union with Him, may offer His perfect Sacrifice to God and associate ourselves with that sacrifice by feeding upon Him. In our consecration of the bread and the wine we use His own omnipotent words, words which are "spirit and life" (St. John 6:63), and, therefore able to effect what He said they would effect. We are not like those who said "this is an hard saying; who can hear it?" and followed no more with Him; rather are we like St. Thomas, who, though he could not fathom the mystery of the resurrection, yet could not deny the presence of Eternal Love, but cried, "My Lord and my God."

The whole doctrine of our Lord's sacramental presence and the sacrificial character of the Holy Communion is so consonant with the Incarnation! Our Lord, as God, is everywhere, of course; but as Man He would be only in heaven were it not that by that same miraculous power which multiplied the loaves and the fishes He makes Himself present to us, in His humanity no less than in His divinity, upon a thousand altars at once. One has but to read the sixth chapter of St. John in its evident association with the institution of the Lord's Supper to grasp this beautiful and satisfying truth of our holy religion. And were it not for the Holy Communion the sacrifice of Calvary would be in danger of fading into the dim realm of remote history; but now the mystic glow of the Cross sheds its radiance from every altar, be it in a great Cathedral or some humble wayside Chapel. Let us make our own the words of that beautiful hymn 333:

"And now, O Father, mindful of the love
That bought us once for all on Calvary's tree,
And having with us Him that pleads above,
We here present, we here spread forth to thee,
That only offering perfect in thine eyes,
The one true, pure, immortal sacrifice."

PROTESTANTS.

Mr. Editor:

Why is it the Protestants do not unite and leave the Roman Catholics to go their way alone?

No true Protestant would serve two masters; therefore, if we are to have Unity of Religion, it is up to those Protestants who recognize only God.

Why call St. Mary the Virgin, New York, a Protestant Episcopal Church?

"On the payment of the sum of $25 the name of a departed relative or friend will be inscribed in the chantry book, of that church, and Masses will be said for the souls of those whose names are written in this book, four times during the year, and also at the Masses on All Souls' Day."

What are these Masses claimed to accomplish?

Numskulls, ninnyhammers and nincompoops can be fooled by such nonsense, the same as Pope Stephens III fooled the people of the Franks with the letter that the Pope claimed to have received from Heaven.

CONVENTIONS, COUNCILS, CONVOCATIONS

FLORIDA.

The keynote of the eighty-seventh annual council of the Diocese of Florida, held in the Church of the Good Shepherd, Jacksonville, January 23-24, was given by the Rev. Samuel M. Shoemaker, Jr., rector of Calvary Church, New York, and his associates, who prepared the clergy and the laity of the diocese for the deep note of personal evangelism, sounded throughout its sessions, by the holding of a Clinic in Personal Evangelism, in St. John's Parish, Jacksonville, on the day previous to the opening of the Council. The Rev. Mr. Shoemaker, the Rev. and Mrs. Ray F. Purdy, the Rev. Norman Schwab and Miss Helen Smith were the chief speakers throughout the day of the twenty-second, when the clergy met in all-day conference with them and talked intimately of effective methods of winning souls to Christ. The ladies of the Shoemaker party spoke to the Twenty-second Diocesan Assembly of the Daughters of the King, in session at the Church of the Good Shepherd on the same day; the laymen of the diocese gathered with the men of the party on the afternoon of the twenty-second and the evening was devoted to a men's meeting in the Church of the Good Shepherd. Again on the twenty-third the Rev. Mr. Shoemaker brought his message to the women of the diocese, assembled in the fortieth annual meeting of the Florida Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary to the National Council. The Auxiliary meets annually in Florida in conjunction with the Council of the Diocese.

Opening the sessions of the Council and the Auxiliary meeting with a celebration of the Holy Communion, in the Church of the Good Shepherd, at ten o'clock on the twenty-third, the Bishop, the Rt. Rev. Frank A. Juhan, D. D., delivered his address in the place of a sermon and touched on the high lights as well as the clouds of the year past, while he had his men and his women assembled together.

Of outstanding interest in the Bishop's report for this Council are the following facts: Four postulants and three candidates for Holy Orders are preparing to carry on the Church's work; Student workers at the University of Florida and the Florida State College for Women, are at work constantly with the young men and women of the diocese and are creating a fine spirit of loyalty and devotion among them; a permanent camp site, situated on St. Andrew's Bay, within a few miles of the Gulf of Mexico, has been purchased at a cost of $7,000. The first payment of $700 was made by the Diocesan Young People's Service League in recognition of their appreciation of their annual summer conference which will be held at this point. Already it is planned to hold a series of conferences during 1930 on this property, and it is looked upon by the diocesan authorities as the educational and recreational centre of diocese, not only for the young people, but also for the clergy and adult members of the Church in Florida. An unusual building program has been completed during the past year: the splendid Church of the Good Shepherd has been completed in Jacksonville; the church and rectory of St. Paul's, Quincy, have been remodeled and an addition placed at the rear of the church to serve as a parish house; an up-to-date and comfortable rectory has been built for the Negro Archdeacon, resident in St. Cyprian's Mission, Saint Augustine, and a new church is in process of building for the Negro congregation of St. Cyprian's, Pensacola; the rectory at Christ Church, Monticello, has been completely renovated and a parish house built and equipped at St. Luke's Mission, Live Oak. In connection with this building program, Bishop Juhan said in his address: "All of this work has been done through the bold efforts of groups of enthusiastic men and women here and there, who are determined that the Church in their vicinity shall go forward. In some instances these undertakings have thrown these congregations into debt, but there are worse things than debt—better debt than to be dead. Better to have a growing sense of responsibility than a dwarfing sense of self-satisfaction."

Despite financial depression throughout the diocese, forty-three parishes and missions met their full assessment and quota, this being the largest number ever reaching this goal in a single year. For the fourth year in succession, the Diocese of Florida has paid its full quota to the National Church and again it pledges the full amount asked for the general work of the Church for the year 1930. In spite of a slight deficit in the operating expenses of the diocese for 1929, and the outlook of a similar shortage for 1930, Florida says authoritatively that she will not be responsible for a single backward step in the world program of the Church.

In connection with his report that the confirmations had fallen off during the past year, Bishop Juhan called the laity of his diocese to the realization that they, as well as the clergy of the church, are called to be "fishers of men," and urged upon them a sense of responsibility to win souls for the Christ and to bring them into His Church through this service of His Body.

The closing words of the Bishop's address were addressed to his clergy in what he called his "Diocesan Pastoral". Stirring words called his clergy to be "Messengers, Watchmen, Stewards" of their flocks, and a deep impression of the sacredness of their calling was impressed upon them.

The first night of the Council was given over to the Rev. Mr. Shoemaker, who was the only speaker at a mass meeting for the public of Jacksonville and who spoke earnestly and convincingly to a Church literally crowded to capacity.

Altogether the eighty-seventh annual council was marked with a spirit of sincere gratitude for the year that had just passed and of renewed hope for the year that lies ahead.

The eighty-eighth council will meet in St. Mark's Parish, Palatka, in January, 1931. The Rev. Francis B. Wakefield, Jr., the rector of St. Mark's presented the invitation for his congregation.

The Standing Committee consists of the Rev. L. Fitz-James Hindry, President: the Rev. Harris Mallinckrodt and the Rev. George E. Benedict, the Messrs. George C. Bedell, George W. Thames, Jr., and Judge S. D. Clarke.

INDIANAPOLIS.

The ninety-third annual convention of the Diocese of Indianapolis was held in the Church of the Advent, Indianapolis, January 22-23. The House of Churchwomen of the Diocese met at the same time.

The Standing Committee elected includes the Ven. William Burrows, the Rev. Messrs. G. C. Burbanck and E. Ainger Powell, and Messrs. Louis Howland, William W. Hammond and Charles E. Judson. The Trustees of the Diocese are Messrs. George B. Schley, U. H. Smith, R. H. Sherwood, A. L. Rabb and Frederick D. Rose.

The annual diocesan dinner, in spite of floods and inclement weather, was attended by more than two hundred from all parts of the diocese. The Bishop delivered his annual address at the dinner, which was followed by impressions of the diocese from six of the clergy who have come into the diocese since the last annual dinner. The work among the college students at the State University and the need for an endowment for this work were presented by Professor Frank G. Bates, of Indian University.

The principle matters of general interest were the appointment of a committee to raise $250,000 for diocesan endowment, a committee to assure adequate and uniform fire insurance on all church property, and a committee for the revision of the canons of the diocese. The Department of Church Extension reported the statistics showing a gradual and consistent growth in all assisted congregations.

OKLAHOMA.

Severe weather prevented a full attendance at the annual convocation of Oklahoma meeting at St. Paul's Cathedral, Oklahoma City, but despite a curtailment of program it was felt that new records were set. The Rt. Rev. Harry T. Moore, Bishop of Dallas, preached the convocation sermon, his text being Matt. 17:20.

The convocation accepted the quota assigned by the National Council for the Church Program. Treasurer Bruce McClelland announced that for the first time in the many years he has been treasurer the quota for a previous year was paid before convocation.

Mr. H. H. Diamond, of Holdenville, was elected treasurer of the district. Other members of the finance committee are the Rev. H. L. Virden, the Rev. E. H. Eckel, Jr., Messrs. Owen Owens and W. S. Cochrane of Tulsa, and E. E. Million of Muskogee.

Tulsa was chosen as the place of next meeting. The house of women voted to raise a thousand dollars to be presented to Mrs. Casady, so that she may accompany the Bishop to the Lambeth Conference.

Delegates elected to provincial synod: the Very Rev. James Mills, the Rev. Charles L. Widney, the Rev. A. S. Hock, and Messrs. James B. Diggs, M. L. Bragdon and J. E. Kalb. Trustees of the University of the South: the Rev. Charles L. Widney, Robert E. Lee and Alleyne Toothaker.

The Council of Advice: the Rev. H. J. Llwyd, the Very Rev. James Mills, Mr. Bruce McClelland and Mr. Walter Lybrand.

Church Program Committee: the Rev. H. B. Smith, the Ven. L. W. Doud, the Rev. Thomas Mabley, Bruce McClelland and W. S. Cochrane.

Pension Fund: The Rev. H. E. Toothaker, the Rev. Wm. T. Capers, Jr., M. L. Bragdon, C. P. Gotwals, E. E. Million.

Religious Education: The Rev. E. H. Eckel, Jr., the Rev. Thomas Mabley, the Rev. A. S. Hock, J. W. Currey, Mrs. S.

L. Hagan, Mrs. Roy Dodd.

Social Service: The Rev. H. L. Virden, the Ven. H. B. Morris, the Rev. W. L. Witmer, the Rev. James B. Ward, William Holden, Mrs. Trigg Lesueur, Mrs. Joseph Huckins, the Rev. Eric Montizambert, the Ven. H. B. Morris, Mrs. J. George Wright.

Evangelism: The Rev. J. N. MacKenzie, the Rev. John M. Evans, Mrs. Roy Hoffman.

SOUTH FLORIDA.

Marked by a large attendance of both clergy and laity, the eighth annual convention of the Diocese of South Florida was held in Holy Cross Church Sanford, January 21-23.

Encouragement as to present work and optimism for the continued advance of that work sounded through the addresses of the two Bishops and in the various diocesan reports, reflecting the general opinion that a return to normal conditions will soon be realized, both for this diocese and for the state.

Dr. Frederick C. Morehouse, Editor of The Living Church, was a most welcome guest of this convention, his presence in response to a special invitation from Bishop Wing, being warmly appreciated. Dr. Morehouse gave a strong, thoughtful address on ideals of church unity, on the contribution which the Episcopal Church is making toward that unity, and set forth briefly the activities and conclusions of the Lausanne Conference.

The Rev. James G. Glass, D. D., was unanimously reelected as diocesan secretary, and was also reelected as actuary of the diocese. Hon. F. L. Knight, of Miami, was reappointed chancellor.

Report of the nominating committee was accepted, the nominees thus elected including the following: Diocesan Treasurer, John W. Claussen. Standing Committee: the Rev. Messrs. Glover, Clark, Hiller and Messrs. Bethea and Whitner. Executive Board: the Rev. E. A. Edwards, the Rev. H. G. Walker, the Rev. R. T. Phillips, T. L. Howell, C. H. Martin and R. B. Fuller. Trustees, University of South: the Rev. James G. Glauss, D. D., F. L. Knight and Charles M. Gray. Deputies to Provincial Synod: the Rev. Messrs. Brunton, Weller, Scriven, Taylor, Jamison, Louttit and Messrs. Hankins, Tylander, Slater, Jacobs, Clement and Merritt. Alternate Deputies: the Rev. Messrs. Glass, Walker, Hiller, Phillips, Clark, Lander, and Messrs. Jennings, Bancroft, Jewett, Boyd, Singletary and Street.

Bishop Wing reported that every piece of church property which had been either damaged or destroyed by the storm of 1928 had been restored. This included building new churches at St. Patrick's, West Palm Beach; St. Cuthbert's, Boynton; St. Mary's, Deerfield; St. Paul's, Delray Beach; St. Matthew's, Delray Beach; and St. Andrew's, Lake Worth. Eight other churches which were badly damaged by that storm have been completely restored. In addition to this work of restoration, a new church was erected for St. Agnes, Sebring, and Christ Church, Miami, was completed within the past year—a total of twenty-nine church building projects in this diocese during 1929.

Reports showing excellent work among students were given by Chaplain M. E. Johnston, University of Florida, and by Miss Hope Paskett, Church representative at the State College for Women, Tallahassee.

Holy Trinity Church, West Palm Beach, was selected as the place for holding the next convention, the opening date to be January 20, 1931. This choice conforms with the ten-year schedule of convention parishes as adopted two years ago.

SOUTHERN OHIO.

The fifty-sixth annual convention of the Diocese of Southern Ohio met at St. Paul's Church, Columbus, the Rev. Sidney E. Sweet, rector, January 28-29.

The continued illness of Bishop Reese prevented his attendance and the Rev. J. Hollister Lynch of the Church of Our Saviour, Cincinnati, president of the Standing Committee, took the chair and acquitted himself most acceptably.

The Bishop's Address reminded the assembly that Bishop Vincent, retired, celebrated last St. Paul's Day the forty-first anniversary of his consecration and is not only the Senior Bishop of the Church in the United States, but also in the whole Anglican Communion. Grateful acknowledgment of the help of Bishop Paul Jones and Archdeacon Reinheimer and the fact that there were no vacancies in the diocese were features of the document.

Elections resulted as follows: Treasurer of the Diocese, Wilbur LaRue, Cincinnati; Registrar, the Rev. J. D. Herron, D. D. Standing Committee: the Rev. J. H. Lynch and the Rev. Dr. Frank H. Nelson of Cincinnati, and the Rev. E. F. Chauncey of Columbus, J. B. McGrue of Springfield, Morrison R. Waite and J. M. Richardson of Cincinnati.

Mr. Charles D. Jones of Cincinnati was chosen a Trustee of the Diocese, and Mr. Ralph Hollenbeck of Springfield a Trustee of the Church Foundation.

The Rev. Messrs. Frank H. Nelson, G. P. Lymons, E. J. Chauncey and Charles G. Reade and Messrs. J. Albert Schoedinger, Stanley Matthews, Province Pogue, J. M. Richardson and Oscar E. Rupp were elected for a term of three years as members of the Bishop and Chapter.

Deputies to the Provincial Synod chosen were: Clerical: the Rev. Messrs. Maurice Clarke, Charles G. Reade, Thos. Donaldson and Gilbert P. Symons. Lay —Messrs. W. S. Killer, M. D., Wm. T. Magruder, M. E., George S. Dunbar and Herbert G. Gore.

The convention committed the Diocese to raise $66,000 for the Church's program, $58,000 for diocesan needs and $35,000 for advanced work of the General Church, being $25,000 for a Children's and Maternity Wards in St. Luke's Hospital, Manila, P. I., and $5,000 for a church at Hawthorne, Nevada, for Bishop Junkins, once a missionary in this diocese. The sum of nearly $37,000 is also to be raised as a Diocesan Budget.

The most important feature of the convention was the election of a Bishop Coadjutor.

The convention went into session as a committee of the whole and the names presented for consideration were: The Rev. Sidney E. Sweet, rector St. Paul's, Columbus, Ohio; the Rev. Theodore R. Ludlow, secretary for Adult Education of the National Council; the Very Rev. Dean Charles E. Byrer, of Bexley Theological Seminary, Gambier, Ohio; the Rt. Rev. Paul Jones, D. D.; the Very Rev. G. P. I. Sargent, Dean of Garden City Cathedral, Long Island; the Ven. Archdeacon B. H. Reinheimer, Executive Secretary of the Diocese; the Very Rev. Philemon V. Sturges, Dean of St. Paul's Cathedral, Boston; the Rev. Henry Wise Hobson, rector of All Saints, Worcester, Mass.

Three ballots were cast and, on the third, the Rev. Henry Wise Hobson was elected by both orders and the election made unanimous on motion of the Rev. Sidney E. Sweet, seconded by Archdeacon Reinheimer.

A Committee of Notification, consisting of Dr. Lynch, chairman of the convention; Archdeacon Reinheimer and Mr. F. O. Schoedinger, of Columbus, and Hon. Morrison R. Waite, of Cincinnati, will wait upon the Bishop-Coadjutor-elect.

During the proceedings telegrams of sympathy to the Presiding Bishop at Chicago and of congratulations to Dean Scarlett, of St. Louis, formerly of Columbus, just elected Bishop-Coadjutor of Missouri, and of sympathy to the Diocesan, Bishop Reese, ill in Cincinnati, were dispatched.

The whole proceedings were marked by harmony and the spirit of Christian fellowship. Bishop Vincent made a fine address in preparation for the Corporate Communion of the convention and officiated at that service as celebrant, assisted in the Eucharist by Dr. Clarke, Dr. Lynch, Archdeacon Reinheimer, Dr. Sweet and Bishop Jones.

TEXAS.

The eighty-first council met January 17-22, in Beaumont, at St. Mark's Church, the Rev. George F. Cameron, rector.

"The first part of the Council was given over to the young people, who had a big banquet on Friday night to open the Council with a service in St. Mark's Church, following immediately. The fun and frolic of the banquet changed into seriousness and thoughtfulness as the Rev. John R. Hart, Jr., Ph. D., Chaplain of the University of Pennsylvania, spoke on 'Life.' Perhaps the most significant and cheering phase of the whole of the young people's work is the ability to change from the idea of the banquet to the idea of the service and get a tremendous amount of 'Life' from each. It was great to hear a man face facts and go to the fundamental implications of those facts to give the necessary principles to make the change where such was needed. One young person said, "I didn't know a man could preach like that. He made religion attractive and interesting.' Another said, 'I could listen to him all night.' Saturday for the young people was given over to their business meeting, which was conducted in an able, dignified, serious way. Those young people get things, fine things, too, done in a fine way. The frolic of the afternoon with the dance Saturday night marked the end of a perfect day. They all attended the service on Sunday morning and the closing vesper service Sunday afternoon. The council for those young people means a good time, yes, but a good time because their good time is on the foundation stones of consecration, of duty, of service, of prayer, of open-mindedness, of fair play, and of those other things which make of religion a 'thing of beauty and a joy forever'."

"The students' council, attended by the students of Rice Institute, Texas A. and M. College, University of Texas, and some of the other colleges of Texas, really began on Saturday, but a good many of the students came to the banquet. The problems of students are thought to be mostly intellectual, but in reality their problems are for the most part the same as all of ours are —Moral ones. We all pray: 'Make me a Christian—but not yet'."

The work of the Council was largely along routine lines. The Rev. Messrs. C. W. Sprouse, Peter Gray Sears, E. H. Gibson and Messrs. M. H. Royston and W. H. Hogue were elected as the Standing Committee of the Diocese. The Rev. Messrs. G. C. Montgomery, T. W. Sumners, E. D. Butt, G. F. Cameron, and Messrs. Kemp, Hart, Hess, and Adsit were elected delegates to the Provincial Synod, meeting this fall in Little Rock, Arkansas. The Rev. John R. Hart, Jr., Ph. D., and Miss Edna Eastwood, in charge of the work for the isolated under the direction of the National Council, were the guests of and principal speakers at the Council. The Rev. DuBose Murphy, of Austin, was reelected secretary. The Woman's Auxiliary met at the same place and time.

The report of the committee on the State of the Church covered ten years in the life of the diocese and was most searching.

The Bishop discussed recruiting for the ministry; a gift made to help out, financially, clergymen, who, because of small salaries, are "up against it"; placement of the clergy; the matter of diocesan assessments and quotas; and various financial matters.

The hospitality of the people of Beaumont was wonderful, although the weather was cold for Texas; but come to Texas and you will be glad you came.

WEST TEXAS.

Addresses by the Rev. John R. Hart, Jr., Ph. D., Chaplain of the University of Pennsylvania, and the Rev. Hulbert A. Woolfall, rector of St. Mark's Church, Washington, D. C., were features of the twenty-sixth annual council of the Diocese of West Texas, held at St. Mark's Church, San Antonio, January 21-23, 1930. The council sessions were presided over by the Rt. Rev. William Theodotus Capers, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese, and delegates were the guests of St. Mark's, and Christ Church, San Antonio. The Rev. Rolfe P. Crum, rector of St. Mark's Church, and Colonel Guy Carleton, were in charge of arrangements.

A conference on Religious Education was held January 21, in advance of the council. Leaders in this conference were Arthur Muir, Superintendent of St. Mark's Church School; Mrs. J. H. Moore, of San Antonio; J. T. Canales, of Brownsville, and the Rev. Henry N. Herndon, of Uvalde. This was followed by the inspirational service at night, at which the preacher was the Rev. Mr. Woolfall. The Council Sermon was heard on the morning of January 22 from Dr. Hart. This was followed by the Bishop's Address, which was a plea for a new appreciation of the place of the cross in the life of the diocese. This address was ordered to be printed at once and to be read in every church of the diocese on the following Sunday.

During the business sessions an appropriation of $1,000 was made for St. Philip's Junior College for Negroes, located in San Antonio. The work of this school was highly praised before the Council by Dean Harry W. Green, of the Prairie View State College for Negroes. The report of the Committee on the State of the Church, the Rev. Henry N. Herndon, chairman, stressed the need for a constructive program in the diocese, emphasizing work with young people and education along missionary lines.

It was voted to meet next in Christ Church, San Antonio, in May, 1931.

Announcement was made of the appointment of the Rev. L. B. Richards, formerly rector of Christ Church, San Antonio, as financial secretary for the diocese.

Elections during the council resulted as follows: Officers of the Council—Secretary, the Rev. L. B. Richards; Treasurer, Walter A. Springall; Chancellor, J. Croswell Hall. Standing Committee: the Rev. L. B. Richards, the Rev. Rolfe P. Crum, the Ven. B. S. McKenzie, Walter A. Springall, Dr. Harry Keany, and Judge S. G. Tayloe.

Clerical delegates to the Provincial Synod to be held in Little Rock, Ark., in October, are: the Rev. John W. Sykes, Corpus Christi; the Rev. J. S. Budlong, McAllen; the Rev. Samuel Capers, and the Rev. E. M. Pennell, San Antonio; the Rev. Kenneth Houlder, Kingsville, and the Rev. Henry Herndon, Uvalde.

Lay delegates are: John DuPre, Raleigh Colston, Frank Glimpse, John E. Mitchell, Herbert Adams and Colonel Guy Carleton.

Members of the Diocesan Executive Board were elected as follows: the Rev. M. A. McKeogh, the Rev. K. L. Houlder, Dr. E. Galbraith, and Arthur E. Carter.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND NEWS.

(S. C. London Correspondent.)

South Indian Church Scheme.

Lord Hugh Cecil in the "Guardian" has set forth views on the subject of the South India Church Scheme which are marked by that narrowness of mind which his type of Anglican associates with Catholicism. He appears to have no use for the proposed scheme of union, but to regard it as a departure from the position which the Church of England has ever held. He proposes to judge the matter from the point of view of "ordinary theological and ecclesiastical standards," and proceeds to assert that when a non-episcopalian administers the Lord's Supper he exceeds his function and does "really, though without intention, transgress the ordinaries of God." How can he reconcile this with the acknowledged Anglican statement that the True Church ministries (non-Episcopalian) are "real ministries of Christ's Word and Sacraments in the Universal Church," it is difficult to see. The truth is that with him, as with so many who have High Anglican views, the Episcopal office is unduly magnified. It is not sufficient for them that in the proposed South India Scheme Episcopacy should be recognized and practiced, for it is provided that during the next thirty years non-Episcopal orders should be equally recognized and non-Episcopal ministers be regarded as in status equal with those Episcopally ordained. If the Lambeth Conference will do as Lord Hugh Cecil advises it will listen to what the South India Church Scheme supporters have to say and then move the previous question, or take some such step which will save it from having to express an opinion one way or the other. Who will benefit by this non-committal attitude does not appear.

The Islington Clerical Conference is the recognized gathering of Evangelical clergymen who meet on the basis of Evangelization without any hyphenated limitations. It was started in 1827 by the then Vicar of Islington, the jurist Daniel Wilson who afterwards became Bishop of Calcutta, and has met annually ever since, except one year during the great war. Its gatherings are not now held in Islington for lack of a suitable hall large enough, but in Westminster in the Church House. Last week for the one hundred and third annual conference there assembled several hundred of clergymen drawn from all parts of England, representatives of a larger number who due to the cost of traveling and a night or two in London, would also be present. For many years past there has been no open conference, but speakers chosen before have filled all the time available. Experience has shown that this is the more profitable way. The subject chosen this year was "The Anglican Communion and Its Task." The chairman, the present Vicar of Islington, drew attention to the grave responsibility resting on the Christian forces in the Anglo-Saxon race, and primarily, as he thought, on the Churches of the Anglican Communion. He said that where God called on a nation to be His peculiar people and provided for them a country, it was with a view to making known His Truth among all nations. He gave them as their country a position which was admittedly suited for that purpose. Palestine was situated at the junction of the two great continents of Africa and Asia, and almost within sight of Europe, with, on the one hand, the ancient world, and on the other hand, the Mediterranean, the gateway to the modern and western world. He soordered their circumstances that when in the fulness of time atonement could be made, and the Commission to Evangelize the world could be issued, they would be in the position best suited for the purpose.

But as a people they became self-centered and exclusive. They had no ambition to make God known to the heathen, and indeed allowed them no hope of any place in His Kingdom except as one of themselves. The Temple which was to be a house of prayer for all nations became a den of thieves, and when the supreme test came, and the moment of decisive crisis arose, they rejected the Christ of God and lost their position and opportunity. God, we may reverently say, turned then to another people to be His agents for making known His Truth to the world. The mantle passed to the Latin race, at first in the Roman Empire and then in the Roman Church. Christianity at first spread rapidly, but of necessity was at first weak in its grasp of the life of the people. No doubt men often said then, as too often now, Christianity is a failure, but by 500 A. D. pagan Rome had passed, and no devotee remained to worship the "great goddess Diana" of the Ephesians, "whom all Asia and the world worshippeth." But there was little zeal to propagate the Faith, and the inward corruption in the unconverted State was unchecked. The Empire fell, but the Faith survived in the Roman Church which spread further and further. Spain and France under the full sway and influence of that Church became dominant in the known world and proceeded to discover the unknown hemisphere. Theirs was now the great opportunity to make known the Truth and to proclaim the Gospel to every creature. The world lay open to the Church, and the Church was well set in these great countries with world-wide power. But the Faith became clouded and obscure. Things "vainly invented and grounded upon no warranty of Scripture, but rather repugnant to the Word of God," were substituted for true doctrine, and the propaganda of the Church, a corrupt Church, became the aim and not the propagation of the Faith of Jesus Christ. Thus having failed concerning the purpose for which it was raised to so high a position in the world, the Latin race lost its position and opportunity.

Again, it seems, God prepared another great race to accomplish His purpose, and the Anglo-Saxon race slowly rose to immense power. Great Britain held no single overseas possession when the Reformation reached her shores. From that time in material and in spiritual things the blessings of God has rested upon us. Today, to the Anglo-Saxon race, whether you think of it as concerning only the British Empire, or in its wider and truer aspect, the world lies open. She is so placed that if she is faithful to God, she can by His grace win the world for Him. Christianity is not confined to the Anglican Communion, but first and foremost responsibility must rest on that Communion. The period of crisis, the time of testing, is upon us. The World Call to the Christian Church was, as I humbly believe, the call of God to His people. Will she take the opportunity and rise to the occasion, or will she fail as did the Jewish race and the Latin race? If we allow exclusiveness and selfishness to intervene, or if we substitute "another Gospel" for that committed to us, or if we turn a deaf ear as the easier course, we too will be "cast away" and another called to take our place as chief agents of God's purposes of love and mercy. Hence the importance of our subject today, and the responsibility which rests upon us all to pray for the leaders of our Church, and especially when assembled at Lambeth, that they and we may see the way of the Lord and follow it.

Prebendary H. W. Hinde,
Vicar of Islington.

The House of Bishops will meet in Chicago, March 26, to elect a Presiding Bishop.

The New Year Conference.

One hundred and forty college men from thirty institutions were privileged to enter the sanctum sanctorium of the Christian Ministry at the recent conference at St. Paul's School, Concord, N. H., January 3-6. This sanctum constituted not only an adequate and challenging objective picture of the needs and opportunities for the minister, but also the personal experience and hopes of more than thirty leaders, ranging from the Rev. A. Herbert Gray to the representatives of the Eastern seminaries.

The figure of Dr. Gray, well-known English Presbyterian divine, and author of "With Christ as Guide," "Men, Women and God," "The Christian Adventure," etc., set the highest tone for the conference. Three splendid addresses portrayed as many sides of the Ministry, setting it forth as a living profession—the greatest of all callings. All this was only strengthened by his frank facing of many supposed disqualifications for the office, as well as certain real drawbacks.

The atmosphere of St. Paul's School, personified in the Christian cordiality of Dr. Samuel S. Drury, contributed richly to the conference. A spirit of informality, of a time of friendship rather than conference, predominated; and the alternation between comradeship on the ice and along the New Hampshire roads to the actual meetings seemed almost unnoticed.

It was a time when God was being revealed through the mediation of certain personalities, so that a hasty word about the part of certain leading figures is the best way into the genius of the conference.

On Friday evening, after several young clergymen and theological students had told of their reasons for entering the ministry, the Rt. Rev. John Dallas, Bishop of New Hampshire, struck at the heart of the matter. He posited as the central foundations of the Ministry two: conviction of the need of the world, and of Christ's adequacy to meet them. He then drew word pictures of many lives of the present and immediate past which had been used in the task. This talk alone completely placed the Ministry in a position above mere profession.

The Rev. Henry Hobson, Dr. Samuel Tyler, D. D., and Mr. Coleman Jennings were the dominant figures Saturday. Mr. Hobson in his own address and the session which he chaired presented forcefully "The Will of God" as the ideal universal factor in the decision of life-work. Dr. Tyler presented a challenging picture of the call of the current social, economic, and political situations for Christian leadership. Mr. Jennings told of his experiences as a "lay minister," and of his conviction of the desirability of opening one's whole life to full-time Christian service.

The Sunday morning program contained an address by the Rev. Appleton Lawrence on actual parish experiences; by the Rev. Angus Dun on seminary life; and a very provocative delineation of current missionary needs by Dr. Gray.

The closing Vesper service, in the beautiful school chapel, was conducted by the Rev. Alexander Zabriskie. The Rev. C. Leslie Glenn delivered the sermon, which was really no sermon, but an appeal for men. None, from the most experienced cleric to the most casual lad who came for the trip, left without an enriched conception of a great calling and its unexcelled opportunities for rich living.

The fact that Sir Wilfred Grenfell could not be present was of course deeply regretted by delegates and by those who arranged the conference.

Although it was felt that the conference would be almost entirely New England, the following list reveals that it proved to be of wider representation: Amherst, Bowdoin, Brown, Carnegie Tech, Columbia, Cornell, Dartmouth, Harvard, George Washington, Hobart, Maryland, Michigan, New England Conservatory, Northeastern, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, Princeton, Sewanee, St. Stephen's, Trinity, Tufts, Vermont, Virginia, Washington and Lee, West Virginia, Williams, Yale. Seminaries: Berkeley, Cambridge, General, Virginia.

Archbishop Assails Shotgun Enforcement.

Washington, January 22.—Shot-gun law enforcement was bitterly denounced by Archbishop Michael J. Curley, of Baltimore, as a climax to his address in the Mayflower Hotel before one thousand Roman Catholic laymen last night.

Chief speaker at a dinner in his honor by the League of Laymen Retreatants, the Archbishop declared:

"The Catholic Church has never believed and never will believe in shotgun morality.

"You cannot make men moral by force."

Archbishop Curley said frankly that he was in favor of introducing religion into politics. Prefacing his remarks with the observation that he was speaking "on a ticklish subject in a ticklish place," he said:

"When I say that I am in favor of introducing religion into politics I do not mean I am in favor of discriminating against Protestant or Jews or any man. No.

"But if in public life, in politics, by which I mean the science of government, we had more of the ideals taught by Christ, we would not see as much selfishness and corruption as we do now in political life.

"I suppose for saying this I will get a hundred letters tomorrow. Believe me, I get them."—Washington Star.

THANKS!

For loyalty, energy, devotion and sacrifice—the record made by the Episcopal Church in the closing days of 1929 cannot easily be equalled.

We notified you on December 5 that there was due in the final month of the year, on the amounts the dioceses told us to expect, the enormous sum of $895,263, or more than thirty per cent of the yearly total.

The Church collected and sent to us every cent of the $895,263, and $10,853 over for good measure. For the first time under the "Pay-as-you-go Plan," we have had a 100 per cent collection record. This was the Church's magnificent response in the face of financial difficulties and business depression, an affirmative answer to our Lord's command, "Seek ye first the Kingdom of Heaven."

Out of ninety-eight dioceses and districts to which quotas were allotted, thirty-eight paid 100 per cent or more of the quota and eighty paid all or more than they told us to expect. The deficiencies of the other eighteen were more than made up by the fine over-payment of many.

As a result of this glorious achievement our books for 1929 will be closed with all bills paid and a substantial balance carried over into 1930 to help prevent any cut in appropriations to the mission fields.

Thankfully yours,
Lewis B. Franklin,
Treasurer.

Hundredth Anniversary.

Readers of the Southern Churchman will rejoice to know that St. Paul's Church, Haymarket, plans to celebrate its one hundredth anniversary in June next. The program is almost entirely arranged and an appeal has been issued by the Memorial Committee asking for the establishment of a Memorial Endowment Fund and other suitable gifts of a memorial character. Readers who can supply relevant, historical items, or loan photographs, can assist by communicating with the rector, the Rev. W. F. Carpenter.

Church Army in Lynnwood Parish.

It was surely a disappointment to my companion and me when we had to leave the church at Lynnwood in the midst of a bright Christmas service, especially as Santa was expected to arrive any moment, but misfortune is not always without its recompense, for the happy Christmas spirit we gained there helped us to laugh and regard lightly the drawbacks and obstacles which hindered our progress as we "plowed" our way through the snow to the little stone church at Rocky Bar.

Arriving there a little off time, but certainly not "off" color (as our noses and cheeks could testify), we proceeded to make our way into the church.

Swinging the door on its hinges, which in turn turned the heads of the PEACE.

There can be no peace in this age of bloodshed
Of strife and hatred and deep distrust;
The bow and the spear shall not be broken,
The sword in the scabbard shall never rust.
Though kings take counsel and statesmen promise,
Though people with people a pact shall make;
They can sign no truce they will not sunder,
And swear no oath they will not break.

There can be no peace till the King of Glory
Comes down to earth from the heavens above;
To rule the world with a rod of iron,
To judge in justice, to reign in love.
Till the throne of David is set in Zion,
And all the kingdoms of earth are one—
No peace till His righteousness shall flourish,
No peace till the will of God is done.

The Church Has One Task Alone.

While the Church lends a helping hand in many directions, it has one task which it alone must accomplish, or it will be a task undone. This task is that of preaching the Gospel of the Son of God to those who haven't that Gospel. When our Lord Christ gave the great commission, "Go ye into all the world and preach," He seems to have entrusted that stupendous task to the Church alone, of all institutions or enterprises on earth. When the Church undertakes a task of benevolence and philanthropy, it finds allies and helpers in orders, lodges, fraternities around about. The various fraternal orders and agencies lend themselves readily to the benevolent task of caring for the helpless and the needy, the poor and the distressed. When the Church undertakes to educate its youth, it will find allies and coworkers in the State and in the generosity of philanthropists. When the Church undertakes to publish journals and books of human uplift and progress, it will find allies in a willing press and nameless agencies, individuals and corporations in giving to the world the printed page. But when the Church undertakes to carry the Gospel to remote places, to preach the Gospel in fields afar, and to bear the banner of the cross of Christ into unconquered territory and out on to uncharted seas of human depravity and pagan darkness, the Church finds itself without allies and, in this world task, finds itself alone. The Church is the only organization on earth that has sought and is seeking to penetrate the gloom and the darkness of the unreached and unsaved portions of mankind and to carry the light, the lift and the love of the Son of God to those who know Him not.

Human society shares in the beneficent results and fruits of the Gospel, and benevolent societies and States take up the task of human uplift, human protection, and human betterment, and unite their forces with the forces of the Church in building up the waste places of Zion; but the heralds of Zion, the preachers of the Gospel, the harbingers of light and life, like their Lord Christ, must tread the wine-press alone, for only the Church of the living God undertakes to carry out the commission of their Lord, which commission is the missionary dynamic and motive.

It is the life and the love, not of man for man that is to reach and to lift man, but the love of our Lord for man that breaks down the middle wall of partition, and thus makes of one all nations of the earth. We seek to give the Gospel to others—certainly the others who are far, far away, not out of love for them, whom we have never seen and do not know, but out of love for our Lord. It is His love that constrains us, His life that woos us, His gospel that wins us, and in His name, His strength, His love, we set ourselves to the task He assigned to the Church, and which the Church alone of all institutions and enterprises on this earth must accomplish, or it will never be accomplished. The Church has many tasks, and her interest, in saving the world and uplifting man, run in many directions, and for those tasks and in those various directions, she has her allies and helpers in the world; but in performing the one task of carrying the Gospel of preaching righteousness and salvation to a lost world through the power of the cross, the Church stands alone and works alone, and alone occupies that field, and will occupy it till the task is finished. Preaching the Gospel of the Son of God till the nations and the peoples of the earth shall hear that gospel is a task that the Church alone of all institutions has so far undertaken and until the Church shall perform that task this will be the unfinished work of God in the world.—Christian Sun.

Let in the Sunlight.

Two twigs rest before me as I write.

One was cut from an oak bush. It is covered with a thick drab bark. The points where the buds should be are brown and hard. There is no sign of life either in the bark or the buds. Even the wood under the bark is brown and lifeless.

The twig is a dead thing.

Beside it lies another twig cut from a pear tree.

Its bark has a lustrous greenish cast and the buds are showing dots of white. An examination of these buds shows that the little brown jackets which held them during the cold weeks of winter have been pushed asunder by the expanding life within. The old brown jackets were too small for the growing buds. Soon even the remaining brown scales which still cling to the outer surface of the buds will fall off and the pear bloom will come forth on the living trees in all the glory and fullness of life.

This twig is a living thing.

But—

If it is to live, to grow, to expand and to fill the mission for which its Creator designed it, it must have sunlight and room. It cannot grow without bursting its old winter jacket—it can not grow in a bleak, hostile atmosphere in which there is not the sympathy and helpfulness of sunlight.

IN COMMON THINGS.

Seek not afar for beauty. Lo! it glows
In dew-wet grasses all about thy feet;
In birds, in sunshine, childish faces sweet,
In stars and mountain summits topped with snows.

Go not abroad for happiness. For see!
It is a flower that blossoms by thy door.
Bring love and justice home; and then, no more,
Thou'lt wonder in what dwelling joy may be.

Dream not of noble service elsewhere wrought;
The simple duty that awaits thy hand
Is God's voice uttering a divine command;
Life's common deeds build all that saints have thought.

In wonder-workings, or some bush aflame,
Men look for God, and fancy Him concealed;
But in earth's common things He stands revealed;
While grass and flowers and stars spell out His name.

The paradise men seek the city bright
That gleams beyond the stars for longing eyes,
Is only human goodness in the skies,
Earth's deeds, well done, glow into heavenly light.

A Prayer for Christian Union.

O God, our Father, our help in ages past, our hope in years to come, our ever-present inspiration and guide, give us, we pray, a new vision and a new sense of our privilege as brothers and sisters in Christ, in whom bond and free, in whom Greek and barbarian, in whom male and female, in whom High Church and Low Church, in whom apostolic succession and free grace, in whom every race and kindred and people and tongue, in whom every creed and confession and sect find their full and complete fruition—give us, we beseech Thee, a new sense of our privilege as brothers and sisters in Christ.

Give us a new wisdom, a fresh understanding, a new insight, that we may comprehend the brotherhood our Master came to establish, and a new will that we may exemplify it in personal, social, and institutional relations. May this eternal message of brotherhood, undefiled by the traditions of men, undarkened by our sectarian or other divisions, revive our hearts and inspire us to work for the renewal of the Church's unity. Help us to make brotherhood in Christ the good news of our day; help us to make Thy Church the haven of all peoples of whatever condition or circumstance, that the world may believe through our unity, through our oneness, our loving fellowship, that Thou didst send Him to become the Saviour of the nations and the Unifier of men's hearts.

O God, we pray for the nations. Thou hast made of one blood all the nations of mankind, so that they were knit together in unity, even as the members of our bodies are knit together. Help us to see in all peoples our brothers and sisters. Help us to trace the family likeness and to proclaim our common kinship by blood and in the spirit. Make the nations speedily one in Christ, we pray. Unite the followers of Christ, we beseech Thee, broken, scattered, dismembered though we be, unite us, we pray, as those who follow our Lord and hold a common faith. Purge us of our vanity, of our intolerance, of our bigotry, of our sectarianism, of our unforgiving spirit, of our divisive and narrow interpretations of Thy truth and Thy Church. May these hindering causes, these petty loyalties, these unhallowed scandals, not keep us further separated one from another and from the fullness of Thy love. Grant Thy Church, we beseech Thee, denominational disarmament, that, following her example, the nations of the world may beat their spears into pruning hooks and their swords into plowshares, and know war no more in what is greater and better that "a parliament of mankind, a federation of the world," in which shall be the spiritual brotherhood of the human race.

Help us to repent for the pain, the suffering, the continual crucifixion and humiliation to which we have subjected our Lord, in our unwillingness to answer His prayer for the oneness of His followers. May we not bruise His broken body further. We have learned, O Lord, to cooperate and work together on the lower levels. Forbid that in our highest interests, on the highest levels, we should find fellowship and brotherhood far removed. May the spirit of Christ, expressing itself in our love for Thee and for Him and for one another, break down every barrier and bring us into that sense of unity and spiritual solidarity for which our hearts now so eagerly yearn.

O God, Thou Giver of life and of every good gift, we pray for union, union so deep, so abiding, so universal that it shall gather all within one fold; a union that shall truly represent in one inclusive spiritual brotherhood the kingdom of heaven on earth. May we never be content so long as any group of Thy children anywhere entertain aught that excludes another from the fullness of Thy grace, that erects a barrier to keep a single soul from the welcome of Thy heart. May no legal entanglements be too difficult, no ecclesiastical customs too deeply fixed, no sentiments too precious to yield, no ambitions or personal commitments too intense, to prevent our traveling for ourselves and making plain to all the joyous road to united fellowship in Christ.

And now abideth faith, hope, love and unity—faith, hope, and love fulfilling themselves in Christian unity—these four, but the greatest of these and the all-inclusive, is unity. So may it ever be, world without end. Amen.—Dr. W. A. Harper.

The Mission of Service.

There does not need to be a cloud of ignorance that darkens life's outlook. Nor ought any to be in distress because they have less than enough to eat or drink or put on. As long as there is ignorance and moral disability and physical need Jesus calls us to the mission service. Are there any who would work but can't get work—there is a demand for Christian service. And if there are any who can't work worthily because they have never learned, can we be satisfied with our system of education? If none of us can do what a "king" might do we can each of us do what a man and a woman of sympathy and understanding and earnest desire can do for those about us who need enlightenment, encouragement, assistance that they may have a vision of life and may enter into it and enjoy it and explore it and find it delightful.—Hunter McMillan.

"Makes the Whole World Kin."

H. H. Smith.

Religion is the greatest of all levelers. It can bring together, as nothing else can, the most inveterate foes, and the battlefield, with all its horrors, has often been the scene of noble Christian acts. Major Stiles, in his book, "Four Years Under Marse Robert," relates an impressive incident connected with the battle of Spotsylvania Court House that well illustrates the thought just stated.

Major Stiles says: "It was almost dark, but as we drew near we saw a wounded Federal soldier clutch the pantaloons of Captain Hunter, who at that moment was passing by, frying pan in hand, and heard him ask, with intense eagerness, 'Can you pray, sir? Can you pray?' The old captain looked down at him with a peculiar expression, and pulled away, saying, 'No, my friend, I don't wish you any harm now, but praying's not exactly my trade.'

"I said to the chaplain, 'Let's go to that man.' As we came up he caught my pants in the same way and uttered the same words: 'Can you pray, sir? Can you pray?' I bent over the poor fellow turned back his blouse, and saw that a large canister shot had passed through his chest at such a point that the wound must necessarily prove mortal, and that soon. We both knelt down by him, and I took his hand in mine, and said: 'My friend, you haven't much time left for prayer, but if you will say after me just those simple words, with heart as well as lips, all will be well with you: "God have mercy on me a sinner, for Jesus Christ's sake."'

"I never saw such intensity in human gaze, nor ever heard such intensity in human voice, as in the gaze and voice of that dying man as he held my hand and looked into my face, repeating the simple, awful, yet reassuring words I had dictated. He uttered them again and again, with the death rattle in his throat and the death tremor in his frame, until some one shouted, 'They are coming again,' and we broke away and ran down to the guns. It proved to be a false alarm, and we returned immediately—but he was dead, yes, dead and half stripped; but I managed to get my hand upon his blouse a moment and looked at the buttons. He was from the far-off State of Maine.

"It was long before I slept that night," says Major Stiles. "It had been an unparalleled day. The last hour, especially, had brought together elements so diverse and so tremendous, that heart and brain were overstrained in attempting to harmonize and assimilate them. This was the first time in all my career as a soldier that I had heard from a dying man on the battlefield any expression that indicated even so much as a belief in the existence of any other world than this.

"What did it all mean? When that Federal soldier and I had our brief conference and prayer on the dividing line between the two worlds, neither of us felt the slightest tremor of uncertainty about it. To both of us the other world was as certainly existing as this, and infinitely greater. Would I ever see him again? If so, would both of us realize that our few moments of communion and of prayer had meant more perhaps than all the struggles, that day, of the great embattled armies? I went to sleep at last that night, as I shall go this night, feeling that it all was and is too much for me, and committing myself and all my perplexities to the One being who is 'sufficient for these things,' and able to lead us safely through such a world and such experience."

Missionary Sayings.

"I prayed the Lord, if it was His will that I should be the first instrument of carrying that old, old story to this people, to open the way for me, which He did at Ft. Wrangell, where the first mission was established."—Mrs. A. R. McFarland.

"We feel that the good Father has blessed us beyond our most sanguine expectations. It is good to feel that He is all I want, and if I had ten thousand lives I would give them all to Him."—Narcissa Whitman.

"I will go . . . I like the command just as it stands, go ye into all the world, without any exceptions for poor health."—Mrs. A. H. Spaulding.

"I am not afraid of death. I am not even afraid of the devil. He cannot hurt me . . . I am immortal, until my work is done."—Sue McBeth.

"Poor Heathen."

If your father left in his will an inheritance for you and your brother, and your brother, being at a distance, could receive his inheritance only if you sent it to him, would you feel free to decide whether to send it to him or not? And if you did send it to him, would you take considerable credit to yourself for doing so? That is like foreign missions. People talk complacently about the "poor heathen." "Why "poor"? Because the heathen have not received their share of the inheritance which the Father left us to give them.—Christian Sun.

"In Him We Live."

I have ascended higher than myself, and lo! I have found the Word above me still. My curiosity has led me to descend below myself also, and yet I have found Him at a still lower depth. If I have looked without myself I have found that He is beyond that which is outside of me; and if within, He was at an inner depth still. And thus I have learned the truth of the words I have read, "In Him we live and move and have our being," but blessed is the man in whom He is, who lives for Him, and is moved by Him.—St. Bernard.

The best compliment you can pay your preacher is to live some of his sermons.

For the Young People

You Who Are Young.

You who are young, it is you, it is you,
Who must make the dreams of the world come true.
You who are young have a world to build,
The future shall be what you have willed.
Learn and practice, plan and do;
Hold to a vision and shape it true;
And you'll find at last that a dream or two,
Because of you, because of you,
Has out of the mist and the dark come true.
Heed what you build with hand and tongue,
You who are young you who are young.

The Four Valentines.

There once lived in a village a certain rich young girl, the Lady Louella Lapidee, who was very fond of sweets and pastries. Twice a year she had her huge pantry stored with supplies for making them; but several times the flour had run short.

When the St. Valentine season came round Lady Louella made up her mind that that should not happen again. So without saying anything to her cook, and without knowing anything herself about weights and measures, she sent a large order to the mills.

She wondered very much when a wagon loaded with sacks of flour drew up before the door.

"Oh, dear, dear me!" she said to herself. "What shall I do with it all?"

But she had ordered the flour, and so there was nothing to do except take it.

Forty large sacks were carried into the storeroom.

"My stars!" said Lady Louella. "I must take a long walk and try to think what to do with all that flour."

As she strolled down the road the first house that she passed was a paper-hanger's shop; the windows were full of wall-paper of all patterns. The second building belonging to a banker; there was a pile of gold coins in each window. The third belonged to a dry goods merchant; in the windows there were wax figures of ladies in velvet gowns. The fourth building was a bakery and in the windows of that there was nothing at all.

All at once an idea occurred to her. She turned round and went home and wrote four notes and sent them to the houses that she had just passed. In each note she said, "I have more flour than I know what to do with and shall be glad to give away thirty sacks at five o'clock tonight."

The notes made a great stir when they were delivered.

"The paste that I can make!" said the paper-hanger.

"I can sell those thirty sacks and have more gold pieces for my windows," said the banker.

"I will give away a pound of flour to every customer and so increase my trade," said the merchant.

The baker was the most excited of all, for he had almost run out of flour. "But now," he said, as he caught his little daughter, Irene, and whirled her round and round "I can get more flour."

At five o'clock Lady Louella sat waiting in her parlor. She wondered which of the four men would come in response to her letter.

There was a knock at the door, and a few minutes later the servant showed in five visitors—the paper-hanger, the merchant, the banker, the baker and little Irene, the baker's daughter, who had begged to come, too.

Lady Louella was astonished: she had no idea that so many people wanted flour. "Could you really use thirty sacks of flour?" she said timidly to them.

"I could, indeed," said the paper-hanger, the banker, the merchant, and the baker almost with one voice.

"Oh, dear, dear me!" said Lady Louella.

Here was a pretty state of affairs! The lady looked in a troubled way at her guests, and her guests looked at her and at one another. No one knew what to do.

Then little Irene stepped forward and raised her hand. "Please, Lady Louella," she said.

"What is it, little girl?" said Lady Louella.

"Day after tomorrow will be St. Valentine's Day," said the little girl. "Suppose you say that you will give the flour to the person who sends you the best valentine?"

Lady Louella was delighted. "Just the thing!" she said. "I will give the thirty sacks of flour to the person who sends me the sweetest—yes, the very sweetest—valentine on St. Valentine's Day."

The four men agreed readily to that. Each of them was perfectly sure that he should succeed.

Late the next afternoon, they came again, but this time little Irene was not with her father. The men laid their offerings before Lady Louella.

With a pink spot in each cheek she began to unwrap the packages.

The paper-hanger's valentine came first. It was made of layers and layers of delicate silver paper, and on each layer was painted a tiny wreath of flying birds, rose and green and turquoise. "How lovely!" said the lady.

The merchant's valentine was made of ivory-colored lace as thin as a cob-web, and gilt threads were woven through it. It was decorated with clusters of little velvet violets, white and lavender, purple and gold. Lady Louella was charmed with it.

The banker's offering was very handsome. The foundation was a piece of heavy gold cloth as large as a plate; in the center was a perfumed rose with golden petals, and at the heart of the rose lay a milk-white pearl. Lady Louella clasped her hands in wonder and delight.

The baker's valentine was in a white box. When Lady Louella had taken off the cover she sat and stared. Then her eyes began to twinkle.

"How sweet!" she said. Then she picked up the contents of the box and took a big bite. For the baker's valentine was very sweet indeed; it was a heart-shaped chocolate cake covered all over with trailing vines of green and with little frosty pink-and-white flowers of cocoanut.

"Oh, how delicious!" said Lady Lapidee. "Dear me, how rude I am to begin eating it right away. But I could not help myself." Then she added, "You will have to admit, gentlemen, that this is the sweetest valentine of the lot."

The baker beamed, but the three other men looked terribly disappointed.

"We didn't know you meant that kind of sweet," said the merchant, the banker, and the paper-hanger all together.

"I didn't know it, either," said a voice at the door, and little Irene came running in. She had not been able to stay at home any longer.

"Well, I didn't mean that kind of sweet," said Lady Louella. "But somehow this valentine seems the sweetest in every way."

Irene's face shone. "I just knew that nothing could be better than one of father's good cakes," she said.

So the long and the short of it was that Lady Louella sent for a knife and then cut out the bitten piece and sliced the cake and passed it round. The banker, and merchant, and the paper-hanger had to admit that it was a wonderful cake.

So the baker, aided by his little Irene, won the prize. He offered to share it with the other men, but they shook their heads and declared as they finished the chocolate and cocoanut crumbs that he had won it fairly.

Then they all went home, and the baker and little Irene spent many happy hours turning those thirty sacks of flour into loaves and cakes and puddings and pies.—Clara Peterson, in The Youth's Companion.

YOU.

Maude Forrest Mumma.

Is the world any better,
For you having lived—
O you, who are treading this sphere?
Are hearts made lighter,
And lives made brighter,
Because you are journeying here
Are others cheered and made more glad
By the smile upon your face;
Or do you frown and look cast down
As you go from place to place?
Send out the sunshine,
Scatter the fear;
Take only love
As you journey here.

The Best Scholar.

Kips was a new dog, and not yet acquainted with the ways of the household. Every morning after breakfast he went for a little run in the big field back of the house, and when he came home again the children were nowhere to be found; not until four o'clock would he see them again. One morning, however, he came back early from his run and found them just setting off for wherever it was they went.

"Aha!" said he to himself. "I shall keep my eyes on them and follow along, too. Then I shall find out."

They went down the road to a large building with rows of windows a mile away. It was the schoolhouse, and as soon as the children entered the door, Kips rushed in behind them and found Ted.

"See, here I am!" he wig-wagged with eager tail. "It's perfectly easy. I just kept back out of sight and smelled my way along until I found you. Please don't make me go home again; it's so lonesome when you're gone."

"He may stay," said Miss Jennings, the teacher. "I'm sure he'll be good. We'll let him have the mat outside the classroom door. Take him out and tell him to lie down on it, Ted."

All the morning Kips lay quietly, except for once, when Ted was called on to read, and at the sound of his master's voice inside, the little dog outside barked, which amused everybody very much. When Ted stopped, he stopped, too. Recess came and Kips joined in the children's games, having earned a playtime through good behavior; at noon he shared their lunch, and joyfully he raced home with them after dismissal.

Kips always went to school after that. No amount of coaxing could keep him home, and as the children loved to have him, he was allowed to go. Then one night a great snowstorm came. The children looked out of the window next morning, shook their heads and decided that nobody would go to school that day; they couldn't get through the drifts. Why, the kitchen door was snowed over clear to the top, and father had to shovel other huge piles away from the windows before the light could come in.

Kips looked at the children after breakfast, and as they seemed rather slow about getting ready, he thought he might as well start off first. He sometimes did this and nobody noticed his going at the time.

The snow was piled so high that it covered the fences and lay in a succession of smooth, white waves that completely covered the beaten track of the road. The teacher had to be driven by Mr. Elkins, at whose house she boarded, and their sled was the first on the road. They started early, because they knew it would take a long time to break through. Some time after nine o'clock, they reached the schoolhouse. The teacher got out at the door and stepped inside. There was Kips waiting for her on his mat. He had arrived just behind the furnace man and had slipped in and lain down as usual.

He thumped his tail on the mat and rose politely. "I'm so glad to see you," he wagged. "I was just beginning to think something must be wrong. Sometimes there are two Saturdays in one week."

Miss Jennings shook her head. "No, Kips, it isn't holiday," she said. "It's an honest and true school day, but I am very much afraid there aren't going to be any scholars. Come inside where it's warm and keep me company."

She brushed off her coat, hung it on a hook, and took off her overshoes. In short time they were perfectly at home. While she was busy at the blackboard or among her books and papers, Kips lay comfortably snoozing on the rug, nose on his outstretched paws, now and then opening his eyes and turning his head to watch her movements.

Then at ten o'clock three children came!

"Late—it's awful! But it took such a long time to come. Nearly an hour. We just swam through some of the biggest drifts," they laughed, shaking off the snow that had thickly powdered them from head to foot. "But when we found Kips had come, we simply had to try to come, too. You can't let yourself be beaten by a dog."

"Better late than never, I'm sure," smiled Miss Jennings, looking into their fresh, rosy-red faces. "You did well to come at all a morning like this, and I'm proud of you."

Then somebody looked out of the window and saw two more coming up the road.

"Good!" praised Miss Jennings. "You're plucky children, all of you. Five will make quite a school. And then we have Kips. He's the best scholar I have, for snowstorm or sunshine, he always gets here just the same, and exactly on time. He has never been absent or tardy yet, so I think he deserves a prize, and he's going to have it."

She went to the drawer of her big desk and took a large, luscious chocolate from a box. It was dropped, plump, into the little dog's waiting mouth, and Kips' conclusion as he lay down on his mat, was that school was getting nicer every day.—Girls' World.

THE HOUSE INSIDE.

I have a house inside of me;
A house that people never see;
It has a door through which none pass
And windows, but they're not of glass.

"Where do you live?" ask folks I meet,
And then I say "on such a street";
But still I know what's really me
Lives in a house folks never see.

Sometimes I like to go inside
And hide and hide, and hide and hide;
And "doctor up" my wounded pride
When I've been "treated rough" outside.

And sometimes when I've been to blame
I go indoors and blush for shame;
And get my mind in better frame,
And get my tongue and temper tame.

I meet my heavenly Father there;
For He stoops down to hear my prayer,
To smoothe my brow and cure my care,
And make me brave to do and dare.

Then, after I have been made strong,
And have things right that were all wrong,
I come outside, where I belong,
To sing a new and happy song.

Then I can hear the people say,
"You're bright and bonnie, good and gay",
And it's because I feel that way;
But they don't know the price I pay.

You have a house inside of you,
Where you may fight your battles, too,
And God will tell you what to do
And make your heart both kind and true.

Valentine Hash.

The candy man laid the last of the Valentine candies on the board to harden, and breathed a sigh of relief as he put things away for the night.

"Say, everybody," said the fat candy boy, when they were all alone. He had a red and white peppermint striped muffler, and fat red cheeks, and he held a big red heart in his hand."

"Say," he repeated, "do you all know that it is only two more days till the Big Day?"

"Yes, only two more days," the murmur went around, as they all fluttered their red candy hearts expectantly at the thought of the pleasures to come.

"We go into the showcase tomorrow," continued the fat candy boy. "Of course, I shall be sold right away. I shall go to some rich little girl who has beautiful toys, and a grand big house, and silk dresses and maids. No doubt she will give me some French candies to be my servants."

"Oh dear I wonder who will get me" sighed the little old-fashioned candy lady in the hoop skirts and she blushed a pretty Valentine pink.

"She will like me better than any toy she has ever had, I'm sure," went on the fat boy, paying no attention.

Over in a corner a wee doggie with a stubby tail looked at him, admiringly. "I suppose she will," he thought wistfully. "He is such a handsome fat boy!"

He was made of the left-over candies, the wee doggie was. He had a pink gumdrop nose, and white peppermint ears, and black licorice eyes. He had a white nougat body, and on his ears, and his stub of a tail, and his fat little body, he was spotted with sweetened chocolate.

But best of all he had a beautiful red fondant heart, right inside where it showed! He knew he was a wee left-over doggie, but he didn't mind that, so long as he had been given such a beautiful sweet heart.

Oh, how he did hope some one would get him who would love him!

Sure enough, next day they were all laid carefully in the big glass case. How the fat boy did puff out his chest and strut! How the little old-fashioned lady did blush and fan! And how the wee left-over doggie did beam on everybody, from very happiness!

And then two men came in and were looking at them. Just didn't their candy hearts beat?

"Give me something you think appropriate for my little niece. She is nine years old," said the fat prosperous looking one to the pretty clerk.

"Here is the very thing," said the girl. "Two dollars," and she wrapped up the bulky big fat boy, nearly a foot long."

"Oh, he will have everything he wished for," said the wee left-over doggie to himself, as the man carried the fat boy away.

"I want just some cheap little piece—something funny, perhaps. How much for the dog?" asked the other man, resting his lunch box on the show case.

"He's only a dime. He was left-over bits in making," answered the girl carelessly.

"I'll take him, please," said the man, and waited.

Oh, how the wee doggie's grandest red candy heart did pound! It was a wonder they didn't notice.

His little black licorice eyes just twinkled and danced, shut away in the little box. Twice during the day the man opened the box and looked at him. Once he had spoken to him.

"Why, you queer little fellow! You look almost human," he said. "You're left-overs, eh? Well, I guess we'd better call you hash." And the wee doggie giggled to himself after the lid was back on his box.

That evening when the man went home he carried Hash to his pretty little daughter, Miriam, who was seven years old, and rather lonely.

"Oh, daddy," she cried, as he bounced her up for her come-home kiss. "Daddy, he's the loveliest doggie ever. But I can't eat him. He's too real."

And so the wee left-over doggie came to be the fondest possession of Miriam in her little home where she and Daddy and Hash kept house very happily.

Then one afternoon, as they hung on the gate and waited for Daddy to come, a boy trundled down the walk on his bicycle, with a load of papers on the carrier. A stack of them blew off the top, as he passed the gate. He looked back, frowned a little, and then rode on.

Soon after Miriam went inside to get her sweater, and the wee doggie sat just where she had left him—upright in his box on the bottom board of the old wooden gate.

"Little Doggie! Little Doggie," called a voice, and Hash looked around, startled to see the bulky fat candy boy lying right out there among those papers!

Oh, dear! Oh, dear! Whatever could have happened? "Tell me, quick, before my little mistress comes back!" he told the fat boy.

"Well, you see, the man who bought me gave me to his little niece. She owned so many things. Goodness me! I wish you could see one-half of them. And she had boxes and boxes of candy for Valentine's Day."

"But you are so beautiful," said the wee doggie. "She must have liked you better than anything else."

"Like me? She scarcely even saw me. She thanked her uncle dutifully, and opened the box. Then she said I was 'sweet.'. Huh, what Valentine candy isn't sweet? Then she set me away, and I never saw another thing until four days later, when her nurse opened my box, and cried, 'Oh, what horrid red candy! Little Mistress must not eat this!' And she threw me into the trash."

"You," cried the wee left-over doggie, hardly able to believe his two peppermint ears.

"Yes, me," answered the fat boy. "And there I've been, among old papers in the basement, until today I was carried away by that boy who is the cook's son, and who didn't know I was in the bunch of old papers he had been given to sell."

"Oh, I'm so sorry," said the wee left-over doggie sadly.

"Oh, if only I could be eaten, as candy Valentine boys were meant to be," sobbed the fat boy, sandy tears in his eyes.

"Maybe you can," exclaimed the left-over doggie, excitedly. "I know my little mistress would love you. Many times I am sure she has wanted to eat me, only she hasn't any other playthings. Leave the lid off your box. Hush! Here she comes!"

I wish you could have seen how excited Miriam was when she found the fat boy there. But did she eat him? Well, I should say she did not! In the first place, she wasn't sure just how clean he was. And then he was a grand toy.

"But he won't ever be one-half so dear to me as you are," she whispered in the left-over doggie's ear, as she tucked him, box and all, under her pillow that night. "He just never could compare at all with you."

And so they all had a happy home forever after.—Child Life.

The Three Hearts.

Three little princesses sat in front of the fireplace looking at the lovely, lacey valentines which had come to them that day from all over the kingdom. It was very quiet in the great room.

Suddenly there came a noise which sounded three times at the castle door.

"What was that?" asked Princess Esther.

"Let's ask the guard," suggested Princess Julia.

When the three princesses reached the hall-way, they found the guard fast asleep. Again came the knocking.

"We will open the door," declared Princess Ada.

When she flung open the door, all that she could see was a puff of snow at first. Then she noticed three little packages on the threshold. She picked them up and found on each one the name of one of the princesses.

The girls hurried to unwrap them. The three were exactly alike, and were heart-sharped wooden boxes with heart-shaped covers.

"How strange," said Princess Esther. "The boxes are empty. I wonder what they are for?"

"I think that they are meant to keep things in," declared Princess Ada.

As time went on, it began to be noticed that a queer change had come over the three girls. Day by day Princess Esther seemed to become more and more sad. Princess Julia was glad part of the time and sad part of the time, but Princess Ada was growing more and more happy.

"This is all very strange," declared the king. "We must find the cause."

He called the royal butler to him. "I think," he said, "that it must be what the princesses eat that makes them act so queerly."

"Your Majesty," replied the butler, "the three girls eat breakfast, lunch, and dinner just alike!"

Next, the king called the royal chamber-maid to him. "I think what makes my daughters seem so strange is where and how they sleep."

"Please, Your Majesty," answered the maid, "the princesses sleep in the same kind of beds. They go to bed at the same time and rise at the same time."

"If it isn't what they eat or where they sleep, it must be what they study," decided the king.

But when he called the royal tutor, that man answered, "Ah, but, Your Majesty, the princesses study the same length of time from the same kind of books."

The king was more puzzled than before. But suddenly he declared, "I know! The trouble started with those three heart-shaped boxes on Valentine night."

So everybody in the castle was asked about that strange night, everybody except the guard, and he was found asleep.

"The more reason that we should ask him," cried the king crossly. "He should not have been asleep."

So the man was sent for.

"Your Majesty," replied the guard, "I was not asleep! It was Valentine night, and it is then that one may put Valentine on door steps and slip away. I put those hearts there; then I played I was asleep to watch the princesses find them."

"There was magic in those hearts," whispered one of the princesses, who were now in the room.

"No," said the guard, "but show me what you have done with them; then I can tell you why it seems like magic."

So each princess showed him her box. Then the guard turned to the king.

"Your Majesty," he said, "Princess Esther has kept her box empty. She was afraid to put anything in it for fear of spoiling it. You see, an empty heart is what makes her so sad. Princess Julia put all manner of keepsakes into her box. Some of them were lovely, and some were only trash. That kind of heart makes her sometimes glad and sometimes sad. Princess Ada thought her heart would make a nice flower pot. So she planted a rose of love in it. That is why she is happy."

"Great!" cried the king. "You are the finest guard that ever stood at the castle door, for you are a guard of hearts. We should each guard carefully our hearts and fill them well with love."—Dew Drops.

"This is the sum which must be collected in December by the Dioceses for the Work of the General Church in order to balance the Budget"

This was the statement we made to you early in December. Alarming, was it not, and yet

Here Is Your Answer---

$906,116

Yes, this was the sum poured into the Church Missions House from Dioceses and Districts in December.

Some of the Results

A Record:

For the first time under the "Pas-As-You-Go" plan we have collected 100% of what the Dioceses told us to expect. This achievement came immediately after one of the gravest financial crises which America has faced in a generation and is a tribute to the loyalty of this Church to its missionary enterprise at home and abroad.

Balanced Budget:

The books for 1929 have been balanced with all bills paid in accord with the spirit of the "Pay-As-You-Go Plan" endorsed by General Convention.

Something Over:

Yes, there will be a balance to help our present effort to avoid cuts in missionary work in 1930.

BERKELEY MINOR.

A rare and beautiful character has just been called from us to his heavenly home. Mr. Minor was the son of Lucius H. and Catherine Berkeley Minor, of "Edgewood", Hanover county, Va., born October 6, 1842, passed away Sunday morning, January 26, 1930, at "The Grove", University of Virginia, after an illness of about twelve hours. Pneumonia was the cause of his death, which was sudden and peaceful. He is survived by his wife and two sons, James Fontaine Minor, of Charlottesville, Va., and Berkeley Minor, Jr., of Charleston, W. Va.; a brother, Judge Robert B. Minor, of San Antonio, Texas, and a sister, Miss Mary Willis Minor, of Washington, D. C.

He spent two years at the University of Virginia, 1859-60 and 1860-61, leaving to enlist in the Confederate Army, but winning six diplomas for the M. A. degree while there. He married Miss Susan Watson Fontaine, of "Rock Castle", Hanover county, Va., who was his constant beloved helpmeet to the end, always cheering and sustaining him.

He first taught as a master at the Episcopal High School, with his near and dear kinsman, Dr. Launcelot M. Blackford; then conducted a school in Lynchburg for two years, going thence to Stuart Hall at Staunton, Va. (then the Virginia Female Institute) in 1880, when Mrs. J. E. B. Stuart took charge. He taught there for thirty-five years, until he retired in 1915. Many of the articles which have appeared in the Southern Churchman under his name were composed for his Bible class in Stuart Hall.

He wrote to a friend: "I was a private in the Rockbridge Artillery for three years—then in 1864-5 in Engineer Troops—a sergeant in Company I (First Regiment), then second lieutenant in Company H of Second Regiment. In absence of senior officers I led the company to Appomattox, and surrendered it there April 9, 1865. I have my parole still and value it much, as showing that I was one of the eight or ten thousand who stood by Lee to the last—as glorious as Zenophon's 10,000."

But the great devotion of his later years was, as he expressed it:

First, to the gospel cause; second, to our grand old cause, the fight in defense of us old Confederates whom the world blames now for resisting the coercion of the South.

With slowly failing eyes and hearing, he sought some work he could do. He would select hymns, Bible verses or religious thoughts, and typewrite them on slips of paper pasting them on strips of pasteboard, adding a few gentle words of his own on the reverse side. These he placed in public places where they might catch the eye. Sometimes he would personally present his "silent appeals" as he went his daily rounds. Poor people and the colored race were drawn to him by his sympathy and courtesy.

One Sunday morning he met an acquaintance who asked him, "Where are you going" He replied, "To the early communion—won't you go with me"? The answer was, "I would like to go, but I am not good enough".

Mr. Minor said, "I am not good enough either, but I am going because it will help me to be better." Soon afterwards this acquaintance became a communicant, and Mr. Minor confided the incident to a friend, modestly saying he hoped his words might have had some influence.

He often spoke of an old poem, "It Was You Who Invited Me Here", and said how glad he would be if in heaven some one would say that to him. Perhaps even now he is listening to some such redeemed one's words.

His pupils, now mothers and fathers themselves, still speak with tenderness and reverence of his influence and instruction, his entire unselfishness.

His body rests in River View Cemetery, at Charlottesville, on a hillside facing the Rivanna and Monticello, home of Thomas Jefferson, for whose principles of freedom and devotion to the rights of his beloved State he unswervingly, unceasingly worked and wrote to the last day of his life.

REV. G. OTIS MEAD.

The REV. GEORGE OTIS MEAD, one of the most prominent clergymen in the Diocese of Southwestern Virginia, died suddenly in Danville, Va., at 3 P. M. on Wednesday, January 29. He was in Danville as a visitor at the Council of the Diocese of Southern Virginia, meeting at Epiphany Church. He had attended the morning session, became ill during the lunch hour at the church and was taken to the home of his friend, Mr. Frank McFall, where he was a guest, and passed away shortly after reaching there.

Mr. Mead was born in Albemarle county, Va., May 15, 1870, the son of Edward Campbell and Emily (Burgoyne) Mead. Mr. Mead received his ministerial training at the Virginia Theological Seminary, Alexandria, where he graduated in 1895. He was ordained deacon in 1895 by Bishop Whittle and priest in 1896 by Bishop Newton. His first charge was in Cedar Run Parish, Fauquier county, Va., from 1895 to 1898. He was then rector of Roanoke Parish, in Halifax county, Va., from 1898 to 1901; Christ Church, Richmond, from 1901 to 1910; St. Thomas' Church, Christiansburg, from 1911 to 1913. Also from 1910 to 1913 he was Secretary of the Church Extension Commission in the Diocese of Southern Virginia and was a member of the Board of Missions in that Diocese 1913 and 1914. Mr. Mead was one of those most active in the organization of the Diocese of Southwestern Virginia, which was cut off in 1919 from the Diocese of Southern Virginia.

With the exception of one year, Mr. Mead was a member of the Executive Board of the Diocese of Southwestern Virginia from December, 1919, until May, 1929, and at various times during that period was Chairman of Departments of Missions, Religious Education and Publicity, and the Field Department. He was a Deputy to the Synod of the Province of Washington in 1920, and was a Deputy to the General Convention in 1922 and 1925. He has been a member of the Trustees of the Boys' Home at Covington since 1921, and Trustee of the Virginia Theological Seminary since 1920.

Mr. Mead was married in 1897 to Miss Lilian Minty, of Chicago, and one child of that union survives, the Rev. Lynne Burgoyne Mead, of Huntington, W. Va. Mrs. Mead died in 1898, and in 1911 Mr. Mead was married to Miss Lilie B. Jennings, of Danville, Va., who survives him. He also leaves two brothers, Messrs. Ernest Mead, of Richmond, and William Mead, of Baltimore, and three sisters, Mrs. Benjamin Moseley Jones and Mrs. Frank Hewitt, of Asheville, N. C., and Miss Mary Rossiter Mead, of Roanoke.

During his rectorship in Roanoke Mr. Mead was one of the most popular clergymen in the city, not only in his own congregation, but in the community at large. He was a member of the Rotary Club, and was identified with many welfare and philanthropic movements. Mr. Mead and was an indefatigable worker, possessed of boundless energy and enthusiasm. His ministry will be remembered with the deepest appreciation and a host of personal friends will mourn his loss.

Services were conducted at noon on Friday, January 31, in Grace and Holy Trinity Church, Richmond, Va., by the Rt. Rev. Robert Carter Jett, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese of Southwestern Virginia. The Bishop was assisted by the Rev. Dr. Churchill J. Gibson, rector of St. James' Church, Richmond; the Rev. Charles W. Sheerin, rector of Grace and Holy Trinity Church, Richmond, and the Rev. George P. Gunn, student minister at St. Peter's Church, Altavista. The Rev. Beverley D. Tucker, D. D., rector of St. Paul's Church, Richmond, assisted in the service at the grave in Hollywood Cemetery. Two of Mr. Mead's former vestrymen in Christ Church, Roanoke, Messrs. C. Edwin Michael and James H. Gibboney, were pallbearers. The large number of floral tributes attested the wide popularity of Mr. Mead.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

curious, a most lovely sight met our gaze. There in one corner of the church stood a tall fir tree, whose branches were adorned with interesting gifts as well as being covered from head to foot with small, fragile trinklets, and paper icicles which glittered and sparkled when the electric light shone upon them in an effort to "show off" the beauty of the tree. Each window frame was decorated simply with evergreens and as one allowed the eyes to rove to the chancel rails, now hidden from view by branches of fir tree, and then to the altar which was trimmed neatly and beautifully with other products from nature's garden, one could not help but silently praise those who had labored to give the church such an artistic effect.

Glancing hurriedly over the large gathering of men, women and children (and I was amazed to see such a number), I wondered just how far some of them had traveled and I pictured them in my imagination trudging through the woods in the deep snow, suffering both hardship and inconvenience in order to be present. The tidy appearance of the children, with their shining faces and well groomed hair, pretty frocks and neatly patched suits, all gave evidence that special preparation and care had been taken to have them looking their best for this Christmas festival.

A very reverent atmosphere pervaded the building which soon penetrated to the soul and unconsciously, almost, the words of Peter rose to my lips, "Master, it is good for us to be here."

One felt that even a complete stranger to the inside of a church would on entering soon be conscious that "the Lord is in this place.'

The preacher has many duties to perform and here it is soon made clear to him that he must keep the attention of the children until all is in order for the pageant to begin. Everything is ready at last, however; the lights are dimmed, the choir begins to peal out the glorious message which came "While Shepherds Watched Their Flocks by Night," and to make the remembrance of scene more clear in our mind's eye, three shepherds now make their appearance and walk slowly down the chancel steps, finally squatting in real shepherd style before a campfire. The pageant, "The Highway of Life," has begun.

The doubting world, played beautifully by a young girl, rejects the good news of the Christ Child foretold by the Prophet and confirmed by Faith and Obedience (other characters in the pageant), whose friendly and good advice the World also scorns.

The World learns by hard experience, however (but, unfortunately not until she has drained the cup of pleasure to the dregs), that the things which the Prophet, Faith and Obedience had said were true and that real Peace can only be obtained by exercising Faith in God and carrying the good news to others in Obedience to His will.

The pageant closed with the soft playing and singing of "Peace, Perfect Peace," and as the lights flashed on we all felt indebted to the one behind the scenes who had worked so hard and been so patient with every one in order that the good-will message might reach the heart through the eye as well as the ear. Her efforts were amply rewarded, for as one man expressed it, "It would be hard to beat."

It would be a difficult matter to measure the good accomplished, but I cannot help but feel, by the splendid way in which the children represented the different truths and characters, that some lasting impression was made on many hearts for the sincere and earnest tones in their voices told the story of how they themselves were trying to live according to the high ideals of the Master Jesus.

Surely this could not fail to leave its mark on the interested listeners. I know the heart of one father "leaped with joy" as he witnessed his daughter, in the role of an angel, proclaiming the blessed news that a Saviour was born. for being unable to suppress his inward excitement he whispered to his neighbor (the writer), "That's My girl, Cap'n," and the words were uttered with a feeling of pride.

Other parents must have experienced this same feeling of joy and, after the distribution of gifts, wended their way homeward, proud and happy, their hearts being knitted closer to their children, and not only to them, but also to the church and to God the Father.

As we drove home to Yancey that night we felt that the work amongst our mountain people is not done in vain. We ourselves were spiritually refreshed and the next day we were ready to follow out the lesson which the pageant had taught us, by imparting the good news' message to our people at Yancey, where eighty-three people faced a snowstorm in order to be present for the Christmas service.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., Bishop

Noted Churchman Dies.

Lieut.-Col. John H. Finney, affectionately known by his friends as "Jack Finney," a prominent and valuable layman of the Diocese of Washington, died suddenly of a heart attack on Wednesday, January 29, at his residence on Oregon Avenue. At the time of his death he held the position of curator of Washington Cathedral. Col. Finney was a member of St. Paul's Church, Twenty-third Street, and had been an active member of the Laymen's Service Association and Brotherhood of St. Andrew. Funeral services were held at St. Paul's Church and interment was in Arlington.

Colonel Finney was for twenty-five years Southern representative of the Aluminum Company of America, with headquarters in Washington. He served during the World War with the Thirtieth Division, One Hundred and Fifth Engineers, and was a member of the A. P. Gardiner Post of the American Legion, and the B. B. French Masonic Lodge.

Colonel Finney, who was born in Amelia County, Va., was the son of Louis Harvey and Minna Booker Finney. He is survived by his widow, Mary Eveleth Whiting Finney, and two daughters, Minna Booker Finney and Mrs. Paul W. Evans, wife of Maj. Evans, assistant military attache at London.

LONG ISLAND.

Rt. Rev. E. M. Stires, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. J. I. B. Larned, Suffragan Bishop.

Quota.

The January issue of "The Church Militant," our diocesan paper, gives a table of the contributions received from all our parishes and missions on the quota for 1929, the year's accounts being closed. Ninety-five congregations have paid the quota in full—the best result ever attained. Long Island has sent $110,000 to the National Council, which is $10,000 more than was promised a year ago. Furthermore, the National Council office has complimented Long Island on the fact that our diocese was the first diocese to remit final payment on the whole sum which we promised after our last year's canvass While thankful for this advance in our status, Long Island is not unconscious of the fact that the amount we promised and paid is considerably short of the amount which the National Council asked of us.

Bishop Creighton Preaches in His Former Parish.

The Rt. Rev. Frank W. Creighton, D. D., Bishop of Mexico, preached on Sunday morning, January 12, in St. Ann's Church, Brooklyn, where he was formerly rector. The sermon was a justification of missionary work as an essential part of the Church's program, and an exposition in particular of the function of our mission in Mexico. Friends of Mrs. Creighton in Brooklyn were much concerned at the news of her injury in a fall from a horse, and relieved to know that she is making progress toward recovery.

The Rev. C. Ronald Garmey, rector of St. Gabriel's, Hollis, was instituted by Bishop Larned at a special service Sunday afternoon, January 19.

Personal Notes

The Rev. R. W. Eastman, formerly in charge of St. Mary's Church, Gatesville, North Carolina, has accepted a call to be rector of Galilee Church, Virginia Beach, Virginia, with address at Galilee Rectory, Nineteenth Street, Virginia Beach.

The Rev. Arthur P. Gray, formerly rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Richmond, Virginia, has accepted a call to be rector of St. John's, St. David's, and St. Stephen's Parishes, Virginia, with address at West Point, Virginia; the change to be effective February 1.

The Rev. Frederic S. Fleming, rector of St. Stephen's Church, Providence, Rhode Island, has accepted the call to the Chapel of the Intercession, New York City, to fill the place left vacant by Dean Milo Gates, of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine. The change will be effected shortly before Easter.

The Rev. J. Lindsay Patton, formerly rector of St. Mark's Church, Mesa, and the Church of the Ascension, Chandler, Arizona, has accepted the call to St. Andrew's Church, Nogales, Arizona, the change having become effective February 1. His new address is 559 Crawford Street, Nogales.

ORDINATIONS.

The Rev. Edward G. Mullen was ordained to the priesthood on January 25, in St. Paul's Church, Waco, Texas, by the Rt. Rev. Clinton S. Quin, D. D., Bishop of Texas.

Mr. Mullen was presented by the Rev. S. Moylan Bird, rector of St. Peter's Church, Brenham, Texas, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. F. P. Goddard, rector of St. John's Church, Marlin, Texas.

Mr. Mullen will remain at St. Paul's, Waco, as associate rector of that parish.

DR. SQUIRES' HISTORY OF VIRGINIA.

President Joseph D. Eggleston, of Hampden-Sydney, formerly of the Virginia Polytechnic Institute at Blacksburg, volunteers the following estimate of THROUGH CENTURIES THREE, the history of Virginia recently published by Dr. W. H. T. Squires. Dr. Eggleston is himself a noted historian and educator, having served Virginia as State Superintendent of Education for seven years.

"Virginia is proud of her authors when they make good. Among those now coming to the front and are attracting favorable attention is Dr. W. H. T. Squires, of Norfolk. Last year his 'Days of Yester-Year' attracted, and continued to attract, favorable attention. It was written with great charm, and one loves to go back and re-read some of his delightful touches.

"During the recent holidays appeared 'Through Centuries Three', by the same author—a fresh, comprehensive, individual, independent treatment of many of the salient features of Virginia history from 1607 to the present. There is not an uninteresting page in the book; there is not a bitter note in it; and no weak sentimentality. There are times in one's reading when it is hard to keep back tears there are other times when one has a hearty chuckle over some golden gleam of humor; there are times when one questions the accuracy of a statement, and then looks it up, to find that the author has been exceedingly careful.

"This book brings out well what Virginia did in making America. It could not have been stated better. One of the striking features of 'Through Centuries Three' is the cumulative statements. The author does not repeat, but he adds statement to statement, thus deepening the impression he wishes to make."

MINUTES OF RICHMOND CLERICUS ON THE DEATH OF BISHOP TUCKER OF SOUTHERN VIRGINIA, JANUARY, 1930

The members of the Richmond Clericus one and all do hereby express their appreciation of the life and work of the late Bishop of the Diocese of Southern Virginia. Many eulogies have been published concerning Bishop Tucker which have given him deservedly high praise. We, his brethren, desire to add our word. The Church in the Commonwealth of Virginia has had a remarkable experience in the Bishops who have been her chief shepherds. Certain of them were ecclesiastical statesmen, others men of great learning, others again outstanding pulpit orators, and all of them possessing in an unusual degree the characteristic of wise leadership.

While Bishop Tucker had his full share of all these abilities and powers, yet none of Virginia's bishops or any other surpassed him in measuring up to the qualifications laid down by St. Paul in his epistle to Timothy as necessary to one holding the office of Bishop: "This is a true saying. If a man desire the office of a bishop, he desireth a good work. A bishop then must be blameless." It is not necessary to comment upon this beyond the statement that few if any bishops ever entered heaven with a more "blameless" life.

As to his being "given to hospitality," certain of us can speak from personal experience when we remember his "open house," his words of welcome, his crowded table whereat, in some incomprehensible way, there was always a seat for another and yet again for one more. When, too, St. Paul warns Timothy against a bishop being "lifted up with pride," we remember how free Bishop Tucker was from this. There never lived a more affable, gracious, approachable bishop. In his presence one had a practical demonstration of the truth of our Lord's words, "One is your master, even Christ, and all ye are brethren." Bishop Tucker sometimes visited the clericus. When he did so he was one of us, he called us by our first name, and blessed the meeting with his radiant cheerfulness, his easy simple manner, and his heartfelt Godspeed.

On the cover of the January 25th issue of the Southern Churchman there is a photograph of Bishop Tucker and underneath are these words of Holy Scripture, "He fought a good fight, he finished his course, HE KEPT THE FAITH." These last four words are in capital letters. It is most significant. Many a man has fought a good fight and finished his course to no real purpose.

It all depends. Viewing the charge of the Light Brigade at Balaklava, the French General Bosquet exclaimed, "It is magnificent, but it is not war,"—But to have "kept the faith." That's the thing. That's the supreme duty of every clergyman. Everything else by comparison sinks to a lower and a still lower place. Here is where Bishop Tucker shines as a Christian man, as a minister of the gospel and as a bishop in the church of God. In an age when the spiritual life of the church is on the decline and so many clergyman are showing their moral weakness and an eclipse of faith, here was one who stood for the truth "as the truth is in Jesus."

Unmoved by the isms here and there and yonder, and the rampant advocates of "science falsely so called," this wise, noble, affable, human, Apostolic Bishop, never ceased to "earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered unto the saints." After a long and "blameless and efficient" ministry he has "fallen on sleep." HE KEPT THE FAITH.

Stereopticon Motion Picture Equipment

Bible teaching supplemented by stereopticon slides is doubled in value. The Old Testament descriptions of the desert wanderings of the patriarchs and the children of Israel will become more vivid when pictures of Bedouin tents, camel caravans, and monotonous stretches of desert sand are shown on the screen. How much clearer will be the scene described in John 4, where the Lord Jesus talked with the woman at the well, after one has seen a picture of Oriental women drawing water at a well! Then tenth chapter John, the Shepherd chapter, is dear to most Christians. Wouldn't it mean even more to them if they could see clear slides of a sheepfold in the Palestine hills, and a shepherd caring for his flock? One would not soon forget the story of the miraculous draft of fish, found in John 21, if he had seen it illustrated with pictures of fishermen and their nets and boats on Galilee.

Several concerns are making motion picture machines especially designed for church and Sabbath-school use. This does not mean that plays and comedies produced by professional actors need alone be shown. But films showing the life of the people in Palestine and other valuable travel pictures are available today, and these may well be used to supplemement Bible study. If a pastor or superintendent who goes on a tour to the Holy Land is fortunate enough to possess a motion picture camera, how glad he would be to show the folks at home a completed record of his trip.

A valuable and important part of church and Sabbath-school equipment today is the stereopticon or motion picture outfit. Information will gladly be furnished if requests are addressed to Church Equipment Service, in care Southern Church, Richmond, Va.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

The works of God's machines are all hidden.

In times of crisis the demand is not for men of genius nor men of world-wide fame, but for those who are true. —Chapman.

Sympathy for the lower animals is one of the noblest virtues with which man is endowed.—Darwin.

Whenever our judgments and our feelings lack patience they also lack wisdom and virtue.—R. W. Emerson.

In the largest sense the Church is the depository of sacred methods and sacred experience, and it exists so that no one need start at the beginning, in the dark, alone, to find God.—Winifred Kirkland.

There is no doubt that we live in a new day—a day that shall bring together the scattered followers of Christ in answer to His prayer "that they all may be one."—W. A. Harper.

"Dark are Thy ways! O who can find them?
O Lord of distance, and yet we see
The dayspring a wisp of Thy glory behind them,
The nightfall a step on the path to Thee."
—Edmond Flak.

As for me, the earthly tent house is becoming unsteady. My face is toward life's setting, but the sky is radiant and my heart is glad. The seventy-eighth milestone on life's winding highway is not far ahead. Beyond that, the road is straight and smooth, for it leads directly to the celestial city.—From a letter written by an old minister.

Today among the American Indian youth there is a growing conviction that the future of the Indian people will be determined pretty much by the way they use their opportunities, not only in securing an education, but in their attitude toward the Gospel of Jesus Christ.—Lindquist.

Let the world tell you a hundred ways that your life is for; but say you ever and only, "Lo, I come to do Thy will, O my God. Out of that dutiful root grows the beautiful life, the life radically and radiantly true to God—the only life that can be lived in both worlds."—Rev. M. D. Babcock.

A WORD OF PROTEST

The Protestant Episcopal Church of the South is by tradition, inheritance and habit conservative. It holds to fundamental and essential principles. Its governing theory is to deal with the soul, to keep conscience and faith awake and potent, guided by the teachings of the Holy Scriptures. The vast majority of its clergy find that in endeavor to do this by exhortation, example, persuasion, reasoning, and prayer there is abundant occupation for their time and thought and effort. They believe in beginning at the beginning, with the inward spirit, knowing that when it is stirred to high and holy aspiration and to communion with God its influence will be manifest in outward conduct. Therefore, they abstain from meddling in politics and secular affairs, except on the rare occasions when local conditions make issues of right and wrong too clear and plain for doubt and demand the attention and activities of every good citizen. The wisdom of this course is exemplified by the painful and disastrous blunders into which clergymen who may be well-meaning, wander when they depart from the plain, straight path made for them in their ordination vows and undertake to intrude on the functions of the statesmen, economists and sociologists.

An instance is given by the Rev. Karl M. Block, rector of the Church of St. Michael and All Angels, St. Louis. He has written and the field department of the National Council has published a book of 155 pages, "Our Common Life." The author tells us, in his preface, that it is written as a study book, especially for men's classes. Much of it is distinctly communistic. Whether intentionally or not, truth and error, right and wrong, sense and nonsense, are mingled insidiously. The endorsement of the National Council tends to commit the Church, to the comprehension of the thoughtless, to Mr. Block's dangerous and foggy opinions.

To begin, Mr. Block seems to forget that we have in this country forty-eight States, each self-governing. He advocates "socialization of the industrial order by an informed Christian Church," which seems to mean abolition of the constitution and establishment of a fixed standard of wages, working hours and conditions, regardless of climate, stages of development and character and employment of labor. He goes further. He demands "the principle of cooperation, with an avoidance of selfish competition, based primarily on private gain," and, then, "provision of continuity of employment or social insurance against forced unemployment." If private gain is to be eliminated, he does not suggest how this insurance is to be provided. He appears to think—if he thinks—that wealth somehow creates itself from and in the air—owned by nobody, with profit eliminated. Not only is the constitution to be abolished, but if competition is to be banished, we must either make a world revolution or exclude all other nations from access to our markets and, therefore, from buying what we make or produce. That is the essence of the Russian policy, everybody living alike, standardized wages, nobody to accumulate anything beyond the comforts of life, no inducement or stimulation of necessity or ambition. A dreadful, dreary, monotony of humanity. Absolutely contrary to the purposes and meaning of our government, which is to provide equality of opportunity and stimulate individuality.

Nobody will contend that present conditions are perfect, or that humanity has attained its highest purposes. All thoughtful observers must concede that we are moving forward to the time when man to man shall brithers be, as Burns sang. Generation after generation we improve and move forward. We take no backward step. The Almighty entrusts us with spiritual and mental power to learn from experience and puts on us responsibility for our individual and mass conduct. He does no miracles for us. The advancement is hastening constantly, as we gather wisdom from lessons and disasters of the past. We have gained more in the last hundred years than in three hundred years before and more in the last fifty years than in two centuries before. In the relations of labor and capital, we have made vast strides. Arbitrations, conferences, are the first thought now, when disputes develop. They used to be the last. In 1924 two hundred and four differences were settled by arbitration, satisfactorily to both sides, and one hundred and forty were disposed of in conference. Those of us who remember or have read of the railroad strikes of 1877 and the mine strikes since realize how great the improvement has been. Probably conditions will be as much happier a century hence as those of the present are than those of a century ago.

In this work the Church will have, as it has had, strong part, by silent influence moving men to seek and find what is the right thing to do. The Power of God working through the spirit of man with slowly and painfully acquired human wisdom will bring peace, not only between labor and capital, but among the nations. When the Church undertakes to interfere, the inevitable result is confusion and resentment against religion. Clashing and conflict of minds equally honest and able, compromises, mutual surrenders, bring agreements. Divergences develop in the Church as outside. Attempts to use the Church, or all churches, to force social revolution inevitably result in failure and disaster.

Mr. Block seems to be urging that the Church apply the methods of the French Revolution, of Russia, of a score of unsuccessful schemes—usually under atheistic directions—to establish communities of equality and property in common at various places in this country. The demise of one of them, the Shakers, in Kentucky, was chronicled a few days ago. Man is an individual animal. He wants something of his own. We need not expect him to change in that respect. The race would stagnate if he did. Those willing to work from purely altruistic motives and to discover, invent, create, purely for others and for love of their fellows are comparatively few, aside from the earnest clergy and an occasional doctor. Perhaps it will be different some time in the near future, but we must deal with the men and conditions of now.

As one Southern Churchman, and speaking, I believe, for the great body of us, I record my dissent from Mr. Block's teachings and my protest against them as representing the spirit and purpose of our Church. We march forward, but in orderly fashion and respecting the constitution of the country and realizing the facts of human nature.

A LORD'S DAY STUDY BOOK

The Lord's Day Alliance of Maryland is planning to offer the Christian public a detailed study of the observance of the Lord's Day, the Christian Sabbath, our very precious Sunday. To this end it is issuing in book form a series of essays by distinguished scholars, covering all phases of the subject. This book will be awaited with interest by all whose hearts are deeply troubled by the present disregard of the Day.

It would seem that the pressing need is to bring all Christian people to see, what was once generally accepted, that the honoring and hallowing of the Lord's Day has distinct and definite sanction of God Himself. For it appears to be widely held now by Christians that the obligation of Sunday as a holy day is based upon ecclesiastical authority, the sort of authority that the season of Lent, for example has, or fasting on Fridays, or the observance of holy days, such as Christmas, Epiphany and others. Now, the holy days of the Church year, however helpful and appropriate, cannot claim direct divine command. It may not be held that their neglect violates a law of God; though, of course, such days, set aside by long usage and by almost universal Church order, will be honored and thankfully and legally observed by every loyal son of the Church. We should not forget, however, that the Holy Day of God's direct institution and command stands upon an entirely different footing.

The command, "Remember the Sabbath Day to keep it holy," surely still stands. It is made prominent in the brief ten words, which have ever been received as the heart of the law. It is one of the four commandments relating to our duty toward God. It is declared by Moses to have been heard out of the flaming mountain and written by God's hand on the stones. It is, therefore, not one of the least but one of the greatest of God's Commandments. Besides, this law goes back of Moses and Sinai. It stands as one of the two primeval institutions that the Creator in the beginning ordained for our first parents (Genesis 2:3 and 24).

Shall it be said that all this concerns Saturday only? That is cannot apply to our Sunday? All because the Fourth Commandment related to the Seventh Day of the week, while our Sunday is the first? Is the great Fourth Commandment to use our Lord's word "destroyed" by His Coming? Is not our Sunday a real and reasonable fulfilling of that law? Does it not take up into the new dispensation all the significance and sanction that lay hidden in the Jewish Sabbath? Does not our Lord Himself guarantee directly this application of this solemn law of God at Matt. 5:17, 18, 19?

The hallowing of one day in seven fulfills the spirit and purpose of the law, and it is worth while noting that nobody can say that our Saturday in America is the same portion of time that the Jews kept and now keep in Palestine. While we are having Sundays here in America, there are parts of Asia that are still in the midst of Saturday. So that the Commandment cannot be tied in its observance to any fixed set of hours in time.

The Church Universal, therefore, in observing the day of the Lord's Resurrection and of the Holy Spirit's descent is carrying out the demand of the ancient Sabbath law. One day in Seven is the divine requirement, the particular day of the week not being absolutely essential to its fulfillment. This accords with our Lord's teaching that entire abrogation of God's law is not possible without flagrant impiety; but that its fulfilment in all that concerns its true import must ever abide.

So soon as Christians come to realize the fact that Sunday observance as a holy day rather than as a holiday, is in obedience to a very solemn command of God and that in consequence of God's explicit requirement, the neglect or misuse or desecration of the day is a dishonor to His Name and authority, all other matters in regard to the day should not be difficult to settle.

WHY I BELIEVE IN THE VIRGIN BIRTH.

By the Rev. James de Hart Bruen.

It stands in the oldest copies of the Gospels.

It stands in the old creed.

It is so consistent in style with the rest of the two gospels that it can hardly have been written by another.

It is absolutely in keeping with the character of Christ. He is presented throughout the New Testament as divine, the incarnation of God.

It is but one of many miracles perhaps the least difficult to accept.

It is a fitting beginning of a life that ends in a resurrection from the dead, and ascension into Heaven.

It is one end of the glorious rainbow that extends from the manger in Bethlehem to the Mount of Ascension.

When the deity of Christ was fully understood and accepted by His followers the time came to announce this miracle. There are multitudes of witnesses for the other miracles, but only one of this. For years it lay treasured in the heart of the Virgin.

Its premature revelation would have been rejected with scorn. What wonder that the Epistles say nothing of it?

It is not uncommon for an author to write the introductory chapter of his book last of all. So it seems to me that these two writers waited until they had given to the Church the other facts of the life of our Lord. Then when the Virgin had opened the inner treasure of her memory and given this supreme truth to them they added it to the gospel history.

What is there in the Virgin Birth that should challenge our belief? An acorn lies in your hand. Within it there is unseen—unaccountable a mysterious something that will gather from earth and air and sunlight material and shape it into a mighty oak; every line in every leaf of the oak lay predicted in the acorn. Here is a mystery beyond the reach of the greatest human intellect. Why, then, stumble at the birth of the Tree of Life, or that a sign given to a King of Judah, should be filled full of a higher meaning—the diamond of history in a gold setting of ancient prophecy.

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSE.

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice, eternal treasures, indeed. "Thy word have I hid in my heart, that I might not sin against thee." Ps. 119:11.)

This week the following verse was submitted by

Miss Mary B. Heyer, of Wilmington, North Carolina:

> "And he laid his right hand upon me, saying unto me, Fear not; I am the first and the last; I am He that liveth, and was dead, and, behold, I am alive for evermore. Amen; and have the keys of hell and of death" (Revelation 1:17, 18).

Who will send one from the far-away places as well as very near us?

REASON AND FAITH

By Frederick W. Neve

REASON has had its own way for a long time, so far as religion is concerned, and many have wondered when the swing of the pendulum would reach the inevitable limit and begin to turn. Perhaps the following may throw some light upon this interesting subject.

Bertrand Russell, in an article, entitled "The Twilight of Science", in the Century Magazine for July, 1929, makes this significant statement: "It is a curious fact that just when the man in the street has begun to believe thoroughly in science, the man in the laboratory has begun to lose his faith." After some reference to the past, he continues as follows: "The new philosophy of physics is humble and stammering, where the old philosophy was proud and dictatorial. It is, I suppose, natural to every man to fill the vacuum left by the disappearance of belief in laws as best he may.' And a little farther on he says, "Whoever wishes to know how and why scientific faith is decaying cannot do better than read Eddington's Gifford Lectures, entitled, "The Nature of the Physical World."

The use of these quotations is not intended to discredit reason, as properly understood, nor to minimize the great debt which man owes to natural science, they are simply used as a necessary and much called for reminder that reason is not infallible, but that it can be, and often has been, a source of error as well as truth.

The statements above quoted, if true, necessarily affect the authority of natural science with reference to religion, for although they have to do with the department of physics, one cannot but feel that science as a whole cannot speak with the same assurance as has been customary in the past. If it is true, too, that there is a disappearance of belief in physical laws among scientists, this would necessarily affect one of the standing arguments against miracles; that many of them contradict physical laws. For it is obvious that they cannot well be said to contradict that which has no existence. This is an important point, since a good deal of criticism of the Gospels starts out with the assumption that miracles are impossible. To take but one instance, it is said that St. John's Gospel is not historical because of the miraculous character of its contents. It would seem, too, that those who wish to reconstruct religion upon a scientific basis had better wait for a more propitious time to undertake that task.

Whether or not we have come to the long delayed turn in the swing of the pendulum, it would seem, at any rate that faith has an opportunity to make itself heard and to plead its cause in a more open field than for a long time.

For faith in the early Church was one of the great dynamic forces, which made Christianity forge ahead until it became the dominant power in the Roman Empire.

This almost inconceivable achievement had been foreshadowed by Christ Himself, when He crowned faith with almost limitless possibilities. To the father of the demoniac child He said, "If thou canst believe, all things are possible to him that believeth." And this truth He still more emphatically confirmed when He said, on a later occasion, "Have faith in God. For verily I say unto you that whosoever shall say unto this mountain, 'be thou removed and be thou cast into the sea,' and shall not doubt in his heart but shall believe that those things which he saith shall come to pass, he shall have whatsoever he saith." (St. Mark 11: 22-23.)

There is no question that it was Christ's intention to impress upon the minds of His followers the supreme importance of faith as a means of overcoming the stupendous difficulties which would confront them in setting forward the Kingdom of God. And just as the presence of faith and the presence of power went together in the early days of Christianity, so may it be said that the weakening of faith in God in the present day is one of the main causes of the absence of power to so large an extent among the followers of Christ. A revival of faith will inevitably bring with it a revival of power.

And perhaps the most illuminating fact about natural science, though it has been strangely overlooked, is that its great and wonderful triumphs have been brought about by an almost absolute faith in nature. Men of science believe that all things are possible along these lines, and this faith in nature has inspired them to follow new and unknown paths, till they have reached heights of achievement which seem almost miraculous, as in the case of the Radio.

Science says, "Have faith in Nature and all things are possible to you." This coincides exactly with the words of Christ: "Have faith in God" and you can remove mountains; only the object of faith is different; in the one case Nature, in the other God Himself, the Lord and Creator of Nature. And if faith in the creature works wonders we may be sure that faith in the Creator will be of a far higher kind and more wonderful in its results.

For St. Paul says (1 Cor. 2:9-10): "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for those that love Him. But God hath revealed them unto us by His Spirit."

Science has brought to light, or has been the instrument through which God has revealed to us, what He has prepared for us in the natural world through past ages, and has given to us of this age the privileges of entering upon an inheritance unrevealed to those who have come before us.

What could be more clear than that faith in God's power, and willingness to admit us to the higher and greater blessings which He has prepared for His children will be even more wonderfully rewarded than that faith in nature which has brought us so many natural blessings?

And this reminds us of the words of St. Paul (1 Cor. 15: 46), "Howbeit, that was not first which was spiritual but that which is natural, and afterward that which is spiritual." Nature, like the law, is our schoolmaster, to lead us to Christ; the lower leads to the higher. For if faith in nature has brought us such great blessings, how much more will faith in God?

If we are really to experience a turn in the swing of the pendulum and an age of Faith is to take the place of the age of reason, through which we are passing, then the mighty power of faith may once more be made manifest by that which He has prepared for those who in faith wait for the rewards which it will bring in the revelation by God, of Him.

Christianity has shown what faith can do in its own First Days when it conquered the world. Science has shown what she can do in her own particular sphere of nature.

It is Christianity's turn now to show that faith in God is the supreme factor in human progress, since, as in its First Days, it will once more conquer the world and bring it to the feet of Christ.

There can be no true reconciliation between Science and Religion till religion has had, as it were, its day in court; till it can meet science on more even terms by having shown that where the same absolute faith in God is present, as has been shown by science in nature, it can raise men to far higher and more glorious heights than science has ever been able to attain to.

We stand within the Halls of Time,
The Gates of Gold are opening wide,
A clarion call to tasks sublime
Is echoing forth on every side.

No time like this hath ever been,
No time like this will come again.
O know ye not what it doth mean
Faith shall the utmost heights attain.

OUR BELOVED BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER.

(Cut from the Southern Churchman of February 19, 1880.)

The Church Messenger of North Carolina has received from an authentic source the following remarks of John Randolph of Roanoke, written in the Prayer Book of his nephew, August 8, 1818: "Your parents were born members of the Church of England. All your forefathers have been of that persuasion. You can have no good reason to desert it. Keep this book, and consider it as next to the Bible (from which it is, for the most part extracted) entitled to your reverence. If any charge you with formality, ask them if there be more form in reading prose than in singing verse, given out, too, by another. This all seek but the Quakers. Ask them to read our Litany, if they can, with unmoved hearts or uncurdled blood. He that refuses to go along with a devout reader of this service, may suspect himself of a want of "vital religion." If form be again objected and the coldness of our service, tell them the coldness is not in the book, but in the bosoms of men. Here is something, which, out of the Bible we shall seek elsewhere in vain, to suit every rank and condition of life. I am rarely affected by extempore prayer—often in pain for the person praying—but in whatever mood I find my feelings, whether of penitence or thanksgiving, I respond to the supplication and prayers of our venerable Church."

A CANADIAN CHURCH LEADER

PRINCIPAL O'MEARA—AN APPRECIATION.

By Dr. Dyson Hague, Toronto

A PRINCE and a great man has fallen in the Israel of our Church, for Canon O'Meara, the Principal of Wycliffe College, Toronto, who passed from us on January 10, was a man whose name was a tower of strength throughout the Church of England in Canada. One of the outstanding leaders of the Evangelical party, he championed, in season and out of season, in public and in private, those great principles which the Anglican Church achieved at the Reformation: the absolute supremacy of the Holy Scriptures, justification by faith only, Jesus Christ as the only Priest and Mediator, the Catholic Church as the blessed company of all faithful people. Wycliffe College, of which he was the second Principal, has been one of the remarkable features of our Canadian Church life. From its beginning in 1887, with half a dozen students and no college, it has grown year by year until it has become one of the largest theological colleges of the Church of England in the Empire. Nearly four hundred men during its brief history have gone from its walls to propagate Evangelical Church principles and its graduates are found in every part of the globe, not only in Canada and the United States, but in China, India, Japan, South America, and nine of its graduates have become Bishops in the home and in the mission field. As a direct result of Wycliffe's Evangelical energy, schools and colleges have sprung up in almost every part of Canada; Havergal College, with its branches, for girls; Ridley College in St. Catharine for boys; Latimer Hall in Vancouver; Emmanuel College in Saskatoon. The reason of the amazing growth of Wycliffe and its world-wide influence is not far to seek. It stands for the Bible, the Gospel and the simple service of the Church of England. And from its beginning its leadership has been well defined and strong. The first Principal, Dr. Sheraton, was a theologian of no mean power and on his death in 1906, the Reverend T. R. O'Meara, the youngest son of a beloved Canadian Churchman, Canon O'Meara, was appointed Principal. He brought to Wycliffe first of all, the charm and attraction of a winsome personality. He was a man full of the love of God and, therefore, full of the love of man, with a genuine sympathy for the poor, the weak and the ignorant and able to sympathize with the bruised reed and the smoking flax. He was not a mere "dry-as-dust" theologian or a spectacle professor, absent-minded and immersed in philosophic or theologic thought. He came to the College as a greatly beloved pastor, whose joy in life was the winning of souls, a master of evangelistic work, a successful organizer, an able administrator, and a man able to evoke the loyalty of workers and elicit the generosity of supporters; in fact, he was just the man to create enthusiasm for a great cause. In the next place, he brought to the College a fine missionary spirit. His view was world-wide. He regarded, as Wesley, the world as his parish, and during his time man after man went out, not to the parochialism of a narrow ministry, but to the east and the west and the north and the south to win the world for Christ, and, if not in person, by prayer and missionary zeal to send out workers and gifts and pioneers for the Church's missionary work. In the third place, he brought to the College a fine spirit of sympathetic Christianity. He hated with a perfect hatred that ecclesiastical austerity that has been the curse of our Church in so many quarters, and that haughty unsympathy that has tended to alienate so many Canadian people from the Church of Englnd. The policy of the College from its inception has been like that early recommendation of the S. P. G. to its missionaries: "To recommend and promote brotherly love and Christian charity among ministers of Protestants wherever you exercise your ministry." Under Principal O'Meara this principle of Christian charity has been sedulously pursued for years, and the main objective of the institution is not to produce a mere generation of scholastics or ecclesiastics, but to send forth into the growing life of the Canadian Church, a body of men who will meet the spiritual necessities of the day by exhibiting the fulness of the Gospel, and conducting simple and congregational services. But, above all, Principal O'Meara was a trusted Evangelical, a man who knew not only Whom he believed but what he believed and carried, with high sense of stewardship and loyalty, the true principles of the Anglican Church. As a Churchman he was widely trusted, and both in the Diocesan and General Synod, he stood very high in the esteem of the Bishops, the clergy and his fellow Churchmen. He was an Evangelical Churchman, unashamed and unwavering convinced that Wycliffe and Wycliffe principles were the teaching of the Bible and the Prayer Book. He believed bravely in the principles of the Reformation, and received as a sacred trust the torch lighted by the martyred bodies of Cranmer, Ridley and Latimer. But while he held to his principles with earnest conviction, and never halted between two opinions, he was remarkably free from envy, hatred, malice and all uncharitableness. Because he was a true Churchman he was a great believer in the Bible. To him it was the Law of the Lord, perfect, converting the soul; the testimony of the Lord, sure, making wise the simple; throughout his life, and to the end, the Scriptures to him were more to be desired than gold, yea, than much fine gold; sweeter also than honey, and the honeycomb. He believed in the Bible entirely, absolutely, with a faith as strong and clear as that of our two greatest Canadian scholars, Sir Wm. Dawson of McGill, and Sir Daniel Wilson of Toronto. It was to him the Living Word of the Living God, supernatural in origin, eternal in duration, inexpressible in value, infinite in scope, divine in authorship, human in penmanship, regenerative in power, infallible in authority, universal in interest, personal in application, and as St. Paul declares, inspired in totality. And these things, his love of the Bible, his love of the Church, his love of Christ made him what he was, not only a respected but a beloved leader. It could be said of him what was said of Lord Shaftsbury, that he inspired universal confidence by the purity of his character, the dignity of his bearing, the accuracy of his knowledge. From first to last he was a reliable man. His whole life was a call to others to stand fast, to quit themselves like men, to be strong. But though he was so helpful, and sincere, so bright and true, so honored and so loved, he was most humble. There was in him a strong deprecation of personal praise; a modest shrinking from the limelight. If he had aught of honor and of praise, of goodness and of power, he laid it all at the feet of his Lord, with the lowly cry: By the grace of God I am what I am. If he could have said at the end fervently and truly, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith," he would also have gratefully added: and to Him be the glory. Non mihi, Domine, non mihi. Suddenly, almost in a moment, he passed from us in the Principal's residence on Friday, January 10, but the work that he inspired, the missionaries that he enlisted will stand as his perpetual monument and our hope and prayer is that more and more as the years go on new leaders will be raised up with courage as indomitable, with faith as invincible, with love for the Bible, the Gospel and the Christ as pure and warm as our great leaders in the past.

BIBLE QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

(Our readers are invited to send in their questions from time to time concerning Scriptural subjects in which they are perplexed or desire light. Our limited space necessitates brevity in questions, as well as in the answers which we will endeavor to maintain in strict accord with the Word of the Lord, which, after all, settles all argument. This column is therefore not for controversy, but for a testimony.)

Question No. 23.—What is the Southern Churchman's explanation of the fact that in some churches neither the pastor nor the members appear interested in the return of the Lord, while in other churches they seem to just long for His appearing?—L. L. Young.

Answer.—Your question brings out a sad truth, and might well be answered by asking another, viz.: What kind of a bride would she be who manfested no interest in the returning of him to whom she is espoused?

The union of true believers with Christ is beautifully referred to as "bride and Bridegroom", the marriage covenant being made in this world, but the final celebration to take place in Heaven. See 2 Cor. 11:2 and Rev. 19:7.

We believe, however, there are many sincere Christians whose indifference to the return of our Lord is due to lack of instruction as to just what such wonderful event in the Divine plan means for them; and should they once grasp its significance, they, too, would enter into the joy of "that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ, who gave Himself for us" Titus 2:13, 14. The word of God tells us to comfort one another with this glorious expectation (1 Thess. 4:13-18).

Question No. 24.—Where can I obtain an inexpensive book or pamphlet giving Bible references, collectively concerning the future life?—A Reader.

Answer.—The Southern Churchman will be glad to mail you a free copy of "The Everlasting Habitations," by J. T. Bougher, which we trust will meet your purpose. In view of the importance of this subject, and the vital message this little pamphlet carries, we are pleased to make this offer open to any of our readers. (A two-cent stamp to defray postage would be acceptable in view of the large number who may desire a free copy.)

GLEANINGS HERE AND THERE.

The Oldest Church Editor.

Both in years and length of service John Redpath Dougall, editor of the Northern Messenger, Montreal, Canada, probably is the oldest editor of a religious publication in the world, and certainly is one of the oldest editors in active service of any magazine or newspaper. He recently celebrated completion of his sixtieth year as editor of The Messenger.

Mr. Dougall is eighty-eight years old. Although The Messenger has circulation averaging about 30,000, it has lost hundreds of thousands of dollars in annual deficits, Mr. Dougall paying the losses from his own fortune, part inherited, part made from successful business ventures. The Messenger was founded in1845 by Mr. Dougall's father, who edited it until 1870, when he gave place for his son, who, in turn, has sons ready to take up and carry on his work.

A Catholic Priest's Tribute.

When the Rev. W. J. Cantey Johnson, nineteen years rector of St. Mark's Church, Gastonia, N. C., died in October, the Rev. Walter O'Brien, priest of the local Roman Catholic Church, wrote of him these verses, published in the local newspapers:

"No blare of trumpet went before;
No pageantry behind;
His face a look of kindness wore,
That spoke a heart entwined
In strands of love for God and all mankind.

"He knew the humble walks of life;
Between the high and low he trod.
His gentle eye bespoke not strife,
His was a pure and blameless life—
He was a man of God."

Twenty-eight Chapters of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew were organized in this country from October 16 to November 15, but one of which was in Virginia, that at Brook Hill, Emmanuel Church, near Richmond, B. D. Campbell Thirteen of the twenty-eight were in Eastern North Carolina. Texas, Western Texas and Louisiana reported one each.

According to the Baptist Record, "The Protestant population of France is now estimated to be approximately one million. The number of Protestant parishes is 1,038, of which 261 are Lutheran, 164 Reformed, 381 Evangelical Reformed, 29 Baptist, 23 Methodist, and a few small groups."

War Service Work for the disabled and the men still in the service called for an expenditure by the National Red Cross of $1.963,000 during the year ending June 30, 1929, and Chapters expended an additional $1,137,000.

Finishing the Kernahan evangelizing campaign, in which thirty-two Protestant Churches of Charleston, S. C., participated, reports were received showing 490 decisions of non-church members to seek membership and 475 letters telling of interest in the movement and of readiness to discuss the subject.

Church Work in Porto Rico.

New buildings were being completed in December for St. John's Church and St. Catherine's School, in San Juan, Porto Rico. These are the first two units in a new Church center. St. John's is to house three congregations, Porto Rican, West Indian and American; St. Katherine's is training Porto Rican girls to do Church work among their own people.

Next to Roman Catholics, Episcopalians are the strongest numerically of all Christians denominations in Greater New York, having 94,591 communicants. Total annual contributions for Church purposes exceed five million dollars.

Greater New York Diocese has more Negro communicants than any other diocese in the country.

Helen Keller, famous blind and deaf woman, who became a Swedenborgian in 1927, having become more and more modernist and humanist, now announces her conversion to the mystic Persian cult of Baha-U-Llah, the declared purpose of which is to abolish all strife and evil.

One of the oldest and smallest parishes in Great Britain is that of Abergavenny, claiming record of thirteen centuries. The village has but one hundred population, of whom half are dissenters, many of the Church people old, invalid or children. The stipend of the rector, the Rev. E. Mansel, is $1,400, from which he must pay $400 for fixed charges and expenses.

Despite disturbances, China is showing wonderful interest in the Bible. The British and Foreign Bible Society has 900 colporteurs in the country—two of whom were murdered by Communists last year—and has issued and sold over 5,000,000 Bibles and portions of Scripture in twelve months.

Church Loss in Great Britain.

Discouragement is found in the Year Book of the Church of England. Baptisms and confirmations show heavy decrease in 1929 from the previous year and the number of children on the books of the Sundays school is 30,345 less than a year ago. While the communicants Easter Day of 1928 were 2,339,283, showing decrease of over 51,000, the qualified voters, 3,641,000, had increased 5,000. One bright spot was the increase of fifty-four in the number of ordinations to the ministry.

"I will be sorry for my sin." Ps. 38:18.
"I will heal their backsliding, I will love them freely." Hos. 14:4.

SECRET OF WEAKNESS.

The world is not given up; you comply in this thing or in that, in the hope of avoiding unpleasantness and living an easier life; and so you lose the sense of God's presence, the experience of Christ's love.

John Bunyan, with his wondrous knowledge and experience of the Christian life, places the turn into "By-Path Meadow before the arrival at Doubting Castle." If Christian and Hopeful had not left the right path, they would not have fallen into Giant Despair's clutches. And it was only after they had spent some time in prayer and humbling themselves before God, that Christian remembered the key—Promise—by which the gates were opened, and they made their escape.—Canon Harford Battersbuy.

Book Reviews

TEXTS THAT HAVE TOUCHED ME: By W. S. Bruce, D. D., F. R. S. E. Cloth. Pp. 128. Published by Marshall, Morgan and Scott, Ltd., London, England. Price, $1.40.

Every devout life is impregnated with the punctuation marks of Scripture passages, which have either challenged a stop or inspired a jubilant step onward.

Dr. Bruce opens his heart and discovers to us how the Lord has dealt with him in the culture of his spiritual life. The very frankness he thus displays wins us to his message. For it is when a writer can say to us who read, "I have tasted it; and it is good," we must respond to the ideals he would offer us. That, indeed, is the secret of true preaching. The indifferent message that implies that we may "take it or leave it" gets nowhere in the life of the hearer or the reader.

As you peruse this book, you will wonder if the author has found any of your special texts to be a blessing and a stay. Very likely he will surprise you by omitting what you most treasure. But such is the voluminous character of the Word of God, as is, as well, the manifold differences in us come to it for help and strength.

HIS GOSPEL OF LIFE, LOVE AND LIGHT: By the Rev. Norman B. Harrison, D. D. Cloth. Pp. 96. Published by the Bible Institute Colportage Association, Chicago, Ill. Price 75c net; paper, 50c net.

This is one of a series being produced by Dr. Harrison on the "His" elements of our Lord's unique provision for our spiritual culture, the present issue being on the gospel of the beloved disciple and the first epistle of that name.

It will prove of value as a Lenten manual for study and thought. Bible students are familiar with the trend of these two portions of the New Testament to magnify our Lord Jesus' office as Light, Love and Life. And the author has displayed commendable acumen in tracing these phases of Christian illumination and inspiration. The fourteen chapters are so divided as to suggest brief and pointed meditations and study connected with the daily periods of prayer. Dr. Harrison writes as one personally familiar with the ground over which he guides the reader; and that in itself is a well worthwhile commendation.

Kenneth Mackenzie.

BY MY SPIRIT: By the Rev. Jonathan Goforth, D. D., Cloth. Pp. 189. Published by Harper and Brothers, New York City. Price, $1.75.

Not every man so completely fulfills his name as this universally known missionary. He has truly gone forth to set the Word of life, as a light in a dark place. His missionary triumphs are the marvel of his day. And here he brings to us the rich cream of experience in his dealings with the people of China for whom he has an unquenchable love.

We shall all feel the impulse of his testimony, as a counter current resisting the popular ideal that all things reside in the personality of man. This tide of self-sufficiency is so marked that men have almost come to worship humanity. Dr. Goforth proves to us by these convincing pages, throbbing with vital realization of the presence and power of God that the Lord still holds to the ideal of the Scriptures, exemplified by all of God's servants that "not by might nor by power but by my Spirit" can the works of lasting value be accomplished. Indeed, we may all guage our spiritual condition by this infallible standard. "Not unto us, O Lord," "Without me ye can do nothing," are suggestive statements. The willingness to be nothing that He may be all things is the secret of Dr. Goforth's wonderful record as herein disclosed.

For years, his friends, who have known the depths of his walk with God, have longed to possess a volume from his pen that would renew in their minds and hearts this surpassing career of missionary living and service. He has at last by a providential ordering, presented to the world the cherished volume. May it have millions of readers.

TO INCREASE THE MINISTRY.

Mr. Editor:

I read with a great deal of interest in your issue of the twenty-fifth instant, the letter from Mr. William Allmand Robertson, on the difficulties in the way of an increase of the ministry. It is the more gratifying as coming from an intelligent layman.

He wrote what I have wanted to write a long time, but being an old man on the retired list, I waited for a readier writer, and one more "up-to-date.' My inspiration, in large part, came from the consecrated lives of such servants of God as the Rev. N. C. Hughes, a man of intellect, culture, and learning; all crowned with that God-given gift—humility; and a passion for souls, whose influence led more young men into the ministry than any one I ever knew. Then came the Rev. Israel Harding, whose name in the several counties in which he labored, was the synonym for self-sacrifice and consecration to the services of God and man. A man who went from house to house, bearing messages of love and encouragement to the stricken hearts of the war period of sixty-one to sixty-five, and the trying years that followed, not only did he minister to spiritual wants, but many a soldier's wife and widow blessed him as with his own hands he ploughed their gardens and repaired their fences and door-steps. The last time I saw him was at the death-bed of a man twenty-five miles from his home.

I recall, too, the life of "Uncle" Nathan Hooker, an itinerant Methodist preacher, who told his Conference in 1894 that he had walked ten thousand miles carrying the Gospel to the homes of God's people. Then comes the Rev. Nathaniel Harding, the boy hero of the sixties, and later a hero of the Cross, who in his last years declared that he never had taken a vacation because most of his flock were unable to do so, and it was his duty to serve them in summer as well as in winter. While I recall other faithful clergyman who knew nothing of vacations, summer campings, nor pilgrimages to "shrines"; whose names nor pictures ever got into the papers, but whose lives shine in homes that know them only in name from parents, who were blessed by their loving service. But my list would be incomplete did I not mention that giant of Christian manhood, of whom General McGruder said, when he saw him, as chaplain, go down into the thickest of the battle then raging, to minister to the wounded and dying, "Call that man back here to take command of this army, he is a braver man than I am." And that same spirit of courage, devotion to duty, and utter disregard of self, went with him through the whole of his consecrated life, until, at the age of eighty-six years, he went to receive the crown of rejoicing "the righteous Judge had in store for him." And that was the saintly, first Bishop of East Carolina, the Rt. Rev. A. A. Watson, who of all the men I ever knew, seemed to live nearest to Christ and walk most steadily in His steps.

With such exemplars, and ideals drawn from the Life of Christ and the Apostles, at the age of thirty-four I turned my back on worldly prospects to devote my life to His service, and for forty years have tried to do what I could to lead souls to Christ with what little success will be revealed at the Last Day. However, in those years I have had varied experiences, some of which might help some younger clergy. I agree with Mr. Robertson, and aver that what I see and read now would never have drawn me from prospects that seemed to beckon me on in the world. I can sympathize, too, with Mr. Robertson in the loss of morning Prayer and Litany. It seemed remarkable, too, that last summer, when our President had called a special session of Congress to take counsel and legislate for the discouraged farmers, and that horde of cormorant had besieged that body with demands for laws by which they could add millions to the millions already piled up, thereby diverting the minds of the Congress from the main issue, I never heard a prayer offered for "the people of these United States," and for "their Senate and representatives in Congress." And when the President was struggling under the weight of his heavy responsibilities, and being criticized most severely, and when my own State was in great distress over the conflict between labor and capital, in which human lives were sacrificed, and our noble Governor and his able counsel were laboring day and night to avert blood-shed, I never heard the prayer offered for "The President of the United States, the Governor of this State, and all others in authority." The average sermon that we get is a poor substitute for that for which the exhortion at beginning of Morning and Evening Prayer tells us is the purpose of going to church. And the reiteration of the importance of the Holy Communion does not supply the place of the pastoral office, which implies obedience to Christ's command to "preach the Gospel to every creature." And because there are hordes of people who do not go to the Lord's House for prayer and praise, nor yet to the feasts in parish houses, let them "go into the streets and lanes of the cities and bring in the poor and maimed and the halt," and the (spiritually) blind; and failing then to fill the Lord's house "go out into the highways and hedges and constrain them to come in." Many in the country districts are hungering for the Word of Life and even yet as "sheep without a Shepherd." If any should ask me, did you do that? I would answer, let the four or five hundred souls I have consecrated to Christ in Baptism, among whom are numbers of whole families, testify. I would never call in others to do what I would not undertake to do myself.

RURAL SCHOOLS FOR THE COLORED.

Mr. Editor:

I feel sure that you would not mind knowing of the cause I am advocating for the Church, that in a large measure has made the Colored work of Southern Virginia, the largest rural work in these United States, with the largest number of clergy. And that was the rural parish day schools, some twelve or more.

These schools, one by one, were closed for one thing or another, until there were just three left.

In 1928, for lack of means to pay our large number of clergy, the Board said they would have to be closed. To sacrifice the last remnant of the children's friend in Southern Virginia's rural Church Schools, came as a bolt from a clear sky. My whole life, I have been associated with the Church day schools. Then came the question, Could I sit quietly by and see the schools closed without making an effort to save them?

No, I would not, came the reply. I would rely on God to guide me in the effort, and raise up friends for these rural schools, in out of way places that through these schools the beauty of the Church service might be daily rendered.

This is the second year's work. God has smiled through a beclouded sky, "Thy will be done."

I am trying to show up the important part they bear to the rural church, and how imperative it is that they go on. "Yet nothing in my hand I bring." Each month seems the last, I would to God some one may help to bear the message in prayers that these children shall rise up in the days to come and call your name blessed.

Mrs. Cordelia P. Smith,
Chairman of Colored Woman's Auxiliary of Southern Virginia.

ANGLICAN IMMIGRANTS.

Mr. Editor:

In the January issue of "The Spirit of Missions," I read what I can quite believe to be true, that thousands of Anglicans from the Old Country are lost to our Church on their arrival in the United States, because they do not know that the Protestant Episcopal Church is their Church. They do not, of course, find the Church of England in the States, and not being made acquainted with the fact that the Protestant Episcopal is of the Anglican Communion, they conclude that they must associate themselves with some Dissenting Denomination. This is a deplorable condition, with which, perhaps, very few Church people in America are familiar. I do trust that publicity may be given the matter, that the exodus from our Communion may be lessened. I thank you in anticipation of your opening your columns for prominent mention of it.

CONVENTIONS, COUNCILS, CONVOCATIONS

DULUTH.

One of the outstanding events of the thirty-fifth annual convention of the Diocese of Duluth, attended by a larger number of delegates than ever before in its history and which met in St. Paul's Church, Duluth, January 28-29, was the request of the Rt. Rev. G. G. Bennett, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese, for a Coadjutor to assist him in his work. In making the request, which followed his annual address, the Bishop stated:

"For four years I have asked for help at each convention—help in the form of a general missionary. Last year the amount of money raised was insufficient for this purpose. Now I am asking for help in another way. This is no sudden decision, as I have had this in my mind for the past two years and am not throwing it into convention as a matter for debate. Through a source that I am not at liberty to disclose the salary for the proposed coadjutor is provided for at no extra expense to the diocese."

This request was made on the ground of the extent of the territory covered in the Diocese of Duluth, which is far flung, covering an area of 57,000 square miles.

Before the close of the convention a committee was appointed to act on Bishop Bennett's request for the election of a Coadjutor at special convention next June.

In his address the Bishop cited the recent stock market crash as an example of the present-day condition of mental and industrial unrest, stating that the Church has ever been a stabilizing factor in the progress of the civilization of the world, appealing to his hearers to hold on to its fundamental principles. He also mentioned the hopes and fears for the disarmament conference now meeting, and the politics at play with the Eighteenth Amendment.

"In all this welter of change and conflicting opinions," said the Bishop, "the Church feels the reaction in two ways: first, there arises in the minds of many, doubts as to the real value and effectiveness of that which the Church is teaching, and they absent themselves from services and become lukewarm in their interest, forgetting, of course, that through many changes, like in character, but differing in cause and background, the Church has come. That her message has always dealt with fundamentals which remain true, no matter how the varying organizations of life may seem for a time to obscure them. Of course such people, largely, lack perspective and the judgment that grows from it.

"The church feels the reaction in her financial life. Her income is curtailed anxious days follow lean receipts, and those in charge are prone to permit—and most naturally—the uncertainties to assume significance out of proportion to their worth.

"The pulpit today should be a place from which sounds the fundamental worth of life because of the unquenchable love of God. Men forget their own value in their own valuation of things. God through His Son has given a worth to human beings far above all things. The world today seems to reverse their value and pays a bitter cost.

"We must now, as never before, lift high the love of God, the value of man, yea, his supreme and undying worth."

Indian Work: Speaking during his address of the Indian work in the diocese, second largest in Church, Bishop Bennett stated that it is in the best condition since his coming here as Bishop. The spirit most excellent and the growth by confirmation most encouraging. The band of Indian clergy one to be proud of, and the Bishop expressed the wish that the Church at large might know more of what is being accomplished in this field.

Convention Dinner: One of the unusual events of this convention was the dinner for delegates and local church people in the beautiful dining hall of St. Paul's new parish house, attended by about three hundred people. The rector of the parish, the Rev. B. T. Kemerer, gave the address of welcome, responded to by the Rev. E. C. Biller, of St. Cloud.

The Evening Service: A very large assemblage crowded the church for the evening service. Evening Prayer was read by three Indian priests—the Rev. W. K. Boyle, General Missionary in the Indian field; the Rev. E. C. Kah-o-Sed, who, a number of years ago, translated portions of the Prayer Book and well-known hymns into the language of the Ojibway Indians, and the Rev. Julius H. Brown, in charge of the Redby and Red Lake Missions. The procession of clergy was led by combined choirs of Trinity Cathedral and St. Paul's Church, singing as a processional, "Stand Up, Stand Up For Jesus." Bishop Bennett preached a sermon of great power and appeal in the cause of missions.

Elections for 1930 were as follows:

Standing Committee: Clergy—Rev. H. J. Wolner, Rev. B. T. Kemerer, Very Rev. G. K. Good, Rev. E. C. Biller. Lay—J. W. Lyder, F. W. Paine, Wm. H. L'Estrange, all of Duluth; W. H. Gemmell, Brainerd.

Board of Trustees: F. W. Paine, Duluth; Edwin Adams, Proctor; E. A. Forsyth, Duluth.

Executive Council: Clergy—Dean G. K. Good, Rev. E. B. Jewell. Lay—D. C. Wakeman and A. W. King, Duluth.

Provincial Synod: Clergy—Very Rev. G. K. Good, Rev. H. J. Wolner, Rev. D. G. Smith, Rev. E. C. Biller, Rev. S. J. Hedelund, Rev. E. B. Jewell. Lay—W. H. Gemmell, Brainerd; Dr. W. B. Richards, St. Cloud; F. W. Wilhelmi, Duluth; F. Rodney Paine, Duluth; J. P. Gordon, Duluth; V. V. Claypool, Hibling.

Woman's Auxiliary: A well attended and most interesting session of the Woman's Auxiliary met in conjunction with the Convention, the outstanding points of which are as follows:

Mrs. E. C. Biller's talk on the Program of the Church, on which the Auxiliary as a body decided to lay special stress during the year, also intensive work in the rural field.

Miss Caroline Averill's explanation of the work of the Girls' Friendly Society.

Reports by Mrs. Biller and Mrs. Solvason of the Synod meetings in Ottumwa, Iowa.

Gifts: A moulded stone to the Washington Cathedral; fifty dollars to the Seabury Shrine at Aberdeen, Scotland, and fifty dollars toward the completion of a church at Oban, Scotland. The President of the Indian Woman's Auxiliary, Mrs. George Ellis, gave a most interesting outline of their work, and also told a most appealing story of sickness and need among the Ojibway people. The offering was given for relief work in the Indian field.

SAN JOAQUIN.

Fresno, Calif.—The twentieth annual convocation of the Missionary District of San Joaquin met in St. James' Cathedral, January 28-29, celebrating with the parish the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the mission which has grown into the present parish.

In his annual address, Bishop Sanford laid stress on the need for religious education, especially of confirmation classes and the Church Schools, on the use of the new prayer book, and the need for a volunteer clergy to minister to the small communities of church folk who are scattered in the little towns of the missionary districts. These, he said, should continue to earn their living by their trades or professions, and set the mission free to use its offerings for the mission work of the whole Church and in the service of the community.

The sessions of the convocation were taken up largely with routine business. There was a joint session with the service league of the district, at which Dean Anna G. Newell and Miss Leila Anderson, of St. Margaret's House, Berkeley, and Canon Graves spoke of different aspects of the religious education problems of the district.

F. D. G.

MILWAUKEE.

The eighty-third annual council was held at the Cathedral Guild Hall, January 21-22. Forty-five clergy and sixty-five lay delegates answered the roll call. The Bishop in his annual address said the chief accomplishment this year was the building of the St. Francis House and Stanley Memorial Chapel at Madison. This building has been erected at cost of $100,000, and is all paid for as a result of the campaign for funds in November, 1928. The Pledges for the Church's Program in 1930 amounted to $42,339.

The Church Club dinner held at the Hotel Astor was attended by a large crowd of Church people. Mr. Fergus With, President of the Diocesan Young People's Society, was one of the speakers and, in a brief and telling address, outlined their plans to raise $5,000 to establish a Church Mission House in Whitefish Bay. The Rev. Walter K. Morley, City Missionary, talked about the "Handicapped," and gave a picture of vast work to be done in his department. Mr. Morley's father, formerly an attorney, was ordained deacon at Grace Church, on Sunday, February 2, and will assist his son in the work of the City Mission. He will serve without salary. The St. Francis Chapel will be dedicated on Saturday, February 15. On February 16, St. Paul's Church at Sturtevant will be dedicated. The diocese is spending $14,000 in missionary work in 1930. A splendid spirit was evident throughout all the sessions of the Council, and the prospects for our work in all departments in 1930 look very bright.

W. D.

UPPER SOUTH CAROLINA.

In his address to the eighth annual convention of the Diocese of Upper South Carolina Bishop Finlay called attention to an increase in the number of confirmations in the diocese during each of the last two years. Another sign of progress was the approaching completion of the plant of renovated rectory, remodeled church, and new parish house at Clemson College, the state agricultural and mechanical college.

In making his report for the Church Home Orphanage, the Rev. T. P. Noe, Superintendent, said they had closed the year with a balance, due to generous contributions from the Church people of the two South Carolina dioceses. The per capita cost of the year was 63.2 cents per day. Mr. Carl H. Hart reported the results of his efforts to raise the debt on land purchased for the Orphanage a few years ago. The necessary amount had almost been raised. From the floor of the convention the balance was contributed, thus relieving the diocese of a burden of long standing.

Principal J. E. Blanton, of the Voorhees Normal and Industrial School for Negroes reported a slight decrease in the number of pupils due to crop failures and resulting financial depression in the state. He was pleased to report that the American Church Institute for Negroes is engaged in an effort to raise $200,000 for buildings and equipment at Voorhees.

Although pledges for diocesan and general Church work were better than a year ago, the diocese faced a gradually growing deficit. To meet the situation the activity of the Society for the Advancement of Christianity in Upper South Carolina is being revived and enlarged. Then, if necessary, reductions are to be made in the work of the diocese to avoid failure to meet the quota to the general Church. The Rev. A. Rufus Morgan, Executive Secretary and General Missionary of the Diocese, insisted that these reductions be made before reducing payments to the National Church, even if it means the abolition of his position, which will probably be necessary.

In the Executive Council, Mrs. Ben W. Aiken, of Spartanburg, became a member ex-officio as diocesan president of the Woman's Auxiliary. She was elected chairman of the Publicity Department. Mr. John W. Arrington, Jr., of Greenville, became chairman of the Field Department. Other members remained the same.

The elections at the convention resulted as follows:

Standing Committee: Rev. Messrs. A. R. Mitchell, H. D. Phillips, T. T. Walsh, W. H. K. Pendleton, M. S. Taylor; Messsrs. R. L. Manning, J. S. Middleton, J. N. Frierson, W. Bedford Moore, Jr., Frank P. Henderson.

Trustees of the Church Home Orphanage: Rev. M. S. Taylor, Rev. H. D. Phillips, Rev. W. H. K. Pendleton, Messrs. Carl H. Hart, W. B. Moore, Sr., R. I. Manning, M. C. Heath.

Delegates to the Provincial Synod: Rev. Messrs. Capers Satterlee, R. Chipman Topping, A. Rufus Morgan, T. T. Walsh, L. N. Taylor, Mrs. Alexander Long, Dr. T. C. Stone, Messrs. W. B. Moore, Sr., Carl H. Hart, W. S. Manning, John W. Arrington, Jr.

Trustees of Voorhees School were re-elected.

The ninth annual convention is to be held in the Church of the Good Shepherd, Columbia, January 20-21, 1931.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

The thirty-eighth annual council of the Diocese of Southern Virginia, which met in Danville, Va., January 28-29, 1930, was pervaded with a spirit of deep solemnity, which is rather unusual in such gatherings. The clergy and many of the lay delegates had just returned from the funeral of Bishop Tucker and the spirit of the beloved Bishop was present throughout the entire session, filling it with peace and harmony and a rededication to the work of advancing the Kingdom of God.

On the night before the opening of Council, Bishop Thomson dedicated a tablet in memory of the late Rev. J. Cleveland Hall, D. D., who served for thirty-one years as rector of the Church of the Epiphany, Danville. An account of the life of Dr. Hall was read by the rector, the Rev. N. E. Wicker, Jr. The Bishop also dedicated the parish house, which has been constructed out of the old rectory of the church.

Council opened with the Celebration of the Holy Communion, the Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese, being the celebrant. At this service, the secretary of the diocese, the Rev. Wm. A. Brown, D. D., read the farewell address of the late Bishop Tucker to Council, the congregation standing during the reading of the Bishop's message. The Bishop used Philippians 1:2-6, as an expression of his love for the Diocese of Southern Virginia. After a tribute to Bishop Thomson, the message took as its main theme, the Church as our Spiritual Home, giving expression to the thought in the following words: "We should try from early childhood to have an intimate love for the Church, to regard it not as an institution or organization, but as our home, touching our lives at every point. This I hope you will do. Love and devotion to the Church will mean more than wealth. We can build it up, as the Church of the Apostolic age was built up, by consecrating ourselves to its service and by making it the most important and essential part of life."

A large part of Bishop Thomson's Council address consisted of a beautiful tribute to the personality and influence of the late Bishop Tucker, stressing the fact that in all human relationships, Bishop Tucker was preeminently a father. The Bishop spoke at length on what is called, "Virginia Churchmanship," stating that "the seed of a strong evangelical inheritance has flowered in missionary enterprises throughout the world and comes back to us with the fruit of a missionary outlook." Asserting our loyalty to the standards of the whole Church, the Bishop reminded the diocese that it is vain to profess such loyalty and then to refuse a share in the undertakings and responsibilities of the Church. The address concluded with recommendation for the development of our diocesan activities, especially among the young people.

The reports from officers and institutions all indicated the diocese to be in a healthy condition.

Tuesday afternoon, the members of Council were taken to Chatham Hall, where they were delightfully entertained by Dr. and Mrs. Edmund J. Lee.

The general theme of the evening session was "The Diocese and our Young People." After Evening Prayer, addresses were made by Mrs. R. A. Gay, diocesan president of the Girls' Friendly Society; Mrs. E. V. Brush, representing the diocesan camp, Robert Hunt; and Mr. Leon C. Palmer, General Secretary of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew.

On the second day, Morning Prayer was read by the Rev. R. W. Eastman and the Rev. Pearson H. Sloan. A stirring address was delivered by the Rev. Wm. A. R. Goodwin, D. D., on the general theme, "The Spiritual Aspect of Giving." So well was this address received that council requested copies for distribution.

Among the outstanding reports was that of the Commission on Rural Work, presented by the Rev. Myron B. Marshall. This report contained recommendations prepared by the Rev. F. D. Goodwin, of Warsaw, Va., who had been requested to make a special survey of rural conditions in Southern Virginia.

The Council was greatly shocked by the announcement of the sudden death of the Rev. G. Otis Meade, who had been present a few minutes before his fatal attack.

At the evening service, reports were received from the Woman's Auxiliary and diocesan community houses. An address, Philippine Missions, was made by the Rev. Robert McCutchen, representing the National Council.

Elections were as follows:

Secretary, the Rev. Wm. A. Brown, D. D.; Assistant Secretary, the Rev. E. P. Miner; Treasurer, Col. W. W. Old, Jr.; Chancellor, Colonel James Mann; Historiographer, Miss Mary F. Goodwin.

Standing Committee: the Rev. E. R. Carter, D. D., the Rev. Charles H. Holmead, the Rev. J. K. M. Lee; Mr. C. W. Grandy, Colonel James Mann, Mr. E. W. Maupin, Jr.

Executive Board: the Rev. Wm. A. Brown, D. D., the Rev. H. H. Covington, D. D., the Rev. M. B. Marshall, the Rev. N. E. Wicker, Jr., Mr. N. E. Clement, Mr. F. W. Darling, Mr. C. W. Grandy, Colonel James Mann, Mr. George B. Townsend.

Delegates to the Provincial Synod: the Rev. E. R. Carter, D. D., the Rev. G. O. Watts, the Rev. R. H. Lee, the Rev. N. E. Wicker, Jr., Messrs. C. W. Grandy, E. B. Hodges, P. F. Parsons and Ivoa A. Page, Sr.

LEXINGTON.

The thirty-fifth annual convention of the Diocese of Lexington was held in Christ Church Cathedral, Lexington, Kentucky, February 3-4-5. The representation of delegates covered the entire diocese, and was the largest on record. At the opening service on the evening of February 3, the preacher was the Rev. G. Warfield Hobbs, Executive Secretary of the Department of Publicity of the National Church, and his subject, "Missions." At the service on February 4, Bishop Almon Abbott read his address, dealing with matters pertinent to the local and general church. The Committee on the Address have ordered that it should be printed and distributed at large throughout the diocese. On the evening of February 4, the Rev. G. Warfield Hobbs spoke upon "The Budget," and the Rev. William B. Dern delivered a report upon the activities of the Field Department of the diocese. Nothing could have exceeded the spirit of harmony that prevailed throughout the entire proceedings of the convention. As several members expressed it, "We have been engaged in a Love Feast."

The most important piece of legislation effected was the adoption of a Canon substituting for the Cathedral Chapter, the Executive Council and Departments: bringing the organization of the diocese into line with the organization of the dioceses and the General Church.

The members elected upon the Executive Council are:

For three years—the Ven. Theodore S. Will, the Rev. Edward W. Baxter, Mr. A. C. Hunter, Mrs. Almon Abbott.

For two years—the Rev. Harold O. Boon, the Ven. James D. Gibson, Dr. J. Rice Cowan, Mr. H. T. Soaper.

For one year—the Rev. J. Wilson Hunter, the Rev. Robert J. Murphy, Senator A. E. Stricklett, Miss Olivia M. Glenn, the Rev. Claudius F. Smith, Miss Laura Clay, Judge George R. Hunt.

The ex-officio members of the Executive Council are: the Bishop; the Secretary of the Diocese, the Rev. Franklin Davis; the Treasurer of the Diocese, Mr. C. H. Edge; and the Chancellor of the Diocese, Major Clinton M. Harbison.

Members of the Standing Committee were elected as follows: Archdeacon Theodore S. Will, Archdeacon James D. Gibson, the Rev. Robert J. Murphy, Mr. Herbert S. Jackson, Dr. W. B. McClure, Colonel John R. Allen.

The election of Deputies to the Provincial Synod resulted as follows: the Rev. Franklin Davis, the Rev. Thomas L. Settle, the Rev. Harold O. Boon, the Ven. Theodore S. Will, the Rev. R. J. Murphy, the Ven. James D. Gibson, Mr. A. F. Whitfield, Mr. W. Wheeler, Mr. E. C. Newlin, Jr., Mr. J. H. Chillington, Jr., Mr. J. A. Edge, Mr. C. C. Frishe.

The recommendation in the Bishop's Address looking towards Diocesan Self-Support was unanimously adopted, and Dr. J. Rice Cowan, of Danville, was appointed the chairman of the forthcoming campaign.

On the morning of February 5, the Rev. Theodore R. Ludlow, Secretary of the Adult Division of the Department of Religious Education, delivered an address.

St. Andrew's Church, Fort Thomas, Kentucky, was determined upon as the place of meeting for the next convention.

Church Intelligence

Secretary Wilbur Pays Tribute to St. Luke's, Tokyo.

Ray Lyman Wilbur, Secretary of the Interior and former President of Stanford University, is also an M. D., and has been president of four or five national medical associations, and head of the American division of the Institute of Pacific Relations. After a recent visit to St. Luke's Hospital, Tokyo, he wrote to Bishop Parsons:

"It was my privilege to visit the institution founded by Dr. Teusler in Tokyo. It brings medicine at its best and in accordance with American standards to a great Japanese City. The modern hospital has, aside from the actual practice of medicine, many outstanding social relationships. St. Luke's International Hospital has brought to Japan new conceptions of the training of nurses and of the actual care of the sick patients. In this field it is unique. I was much impressed by the affectionate attitude taken by the Japanese community toward this institution. Those who are interested in having our country put its best foot forward in the medical and hospital field can take great pride in what has been already done and assist the future growth of the institution."

Memorial Service for Bishop Sessums.

Memorial services for the Rt. Rev. Davis Sessums, D. D., late bishop of Louisiana, were held in Christ Church Cathedral, New Orleans, Sunday night, January 26. The Rt. Rev. Thomas Gailor, Bishop of Tennessee, for many years a friend of the late Bishop, delivered the memorial address in the presence of an audience that almost overflowed the church.

Opening sentences and versicles were sung by the Very Rev. William H. Nes, followed by the reading of the Scripture lesson by the Rev. S. L. Vail, and the singing of the Creed, versicles and prayers by Dr. Matthew Brewster.

Bishop Gailor was introduced by the Rev. Robert S. Coupland, president of the Standing Committee of the diocese.

After introductory words and a brief biography of Bishop Sessums, Bishop Gailor said, in part:

"His splendid power as a preacher and the charm of his personality won for him the respect and admiration of Churchmen everywhere, and he was recognized as a leader in the House of Bishops. For thirty-eight years and nearly six months he gave his heart and life in service to the church as Bishop of the Diocese of Louisiana.

"I think that Davis Sessums was the most lovable man I ever knew. His unselfish thoughtfulness and solicitude for the comfort and happiness of others; his abounding generosity; his genuine interest in the plans and hopes, the joys and sorrows of other men; endeared him to many thousands who came to know and love him. With his fine intellect and force of spiritual character he combined the simplicity, the sweet reasonabelness that was of the very spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ.

"Bishop Sessums was a poet. His vivid imagination, his exquisite sensibility to the appeal of everything that was beaautiful colored all his thinking.

"I cannot help thinking that the technical details of official business were always irksome to him; and when I picture him traveling over vast Louisiana, giving his affectionate interest and sympathy to men and women of all classes and all conditions, I wonder how his delicate and sensitive soul survived as long as it did. Yet he made that loving service the joy and strength of his life.

"More and more, as time went on, the purely intellectual interpretation of the Gospel took with him second place, or rather grew up into a simpler and serener vision."

Concluding, Bishop Gailor quoted the words of a letter which Bishop Sessums wrote to him some time before his death, as follows: "Some day, dear friend, you and I shall talk to each other about his warfare, as we dwell together in God's Eternal Peace."

Believe It or Not!

Miss Marian Oates has made a record of twenty-five years of perfect Sunday-school attendance, and on Sunday, December 29, 1929, was awarded an Honor Roll Pin, a Silver Cross and a Prayer Book. She is a member of Trinity Parish, Oshkosh, Wisconsin. The same Sunday school at the same time awarded an Honor Roll Pin to Jane Dickmann, aged eleven years, who has a record of nine years' perfect attendance.

A Worthy Memorial to a Great Man.

The friends and admirers the world over of Bishop Charles Henry Brent are to be given an opportunity to aid in carrying on some of the activities founded by the Bishop, or activities with which he was intimately associated. Announcement has been made of the completed plans for the Bishop Brent Memorial, which is sponsored by an organization of which Hon. Charles Evans Hughes is Honorary Chairman; General William C. Rivers, late Inspector General of the United States Army, is President; Hon. Alanson B. Houghton, Vice-President; and J. P. Morgan, Treasurer, all four of whom were personal friends of and admirers of the Bishop's life and work. The Board of Trustees is made up of twenty-five friends of the Bishop as follows: Mrs. Robert Bacon, Mrs. Stephen Baker, Edward D. Brandegee, Mrs. W. Bayard Cutting, the Rev. Samuel S. Drury, Gano Dunn, the Rt. Rev. David L. Ferris, Hon. W. Cameron Forbes, Hon. Alanson B. Houghton, Mrs. Helen Hartley Jenkins, Mrs. John Markoe, Sam. Mather, Chas. F. R. Ogilby, the Rev. Remsen B. Ogilby, Hon. George Wharton Pepper, General John J. Pershing, Mrs. Nathaniel Bowditch Potter, Blanchard Randall, Mrs. Whitelaw Reid, General William C. Rivers, Harper Sibley, Mrs. C. Lorillard Spencer, Lorillard Spencer, Mrs. Leonard Wood, Mrs. A. Murray Young.

The objects of the Fund may be summarized as follows:

1. To further Christian unity by gifts to the budget of the permanent Secretariat of the World Conference on Faith and Order, a cause for which the Bishop labored so effectively.

2. To aid in carrying on Bishop Brent's unfinished work in the Philippine Islands: a. The Moro school work at Jolo. b. The assistance of other institutions established by Bishop Brent in the Islands, such as St. Luke's Hospital, the Cathedral, and Brent School

3. To cooperate with the Bishop's successors in his last Diocese of Western New York, in assisting in time of need when funds permit, any unfinished special project of Bishop Brent.

The Headquarters of the Bishop Brent Fund is at 6 East Forty-first Street, New York City. The Secretary is Curtis J. Mar and the Assistant Treasurer is John S. Leech, care of J. P. Morgan & Co., 23 Wall Street, New York, N. Y.

Extracts from the statement of The Bishop Brent Fund organization, signed by its President, General Rivers, follows:

"During the last years of his life, and after Bishop Brent had been informed of his serious physical condition he said a number of times both orally and in writing to several of his friends that he hoped in the event of his death no effort would be made to construct in his memory a formal type of monument or any memorial of brick, stone or mortar; but that he much hoped if his friends deemed him worthy of any memorial it would take the form of aid and assistance to some of the movements to which he devoted his life. As is known to many of the large number of those who are familiar with his work as Chaplain-General of the American Armies in France, Bishop Brent was for seventeen years the first Bishop of the Philippines before coming to Buffalo as the Bishop of Western New York.

"The circumstances of Bishop Brent's death at Lausanne in Switzerland on the twenty-seventh of March, 1929, were widely set forth in the public press. The Bishop had expressed a wish to be buried where he died, coupled with a desire that in case he died away from home no effort to be made to send his body back to his Cathedral Church, or to have any elaborate funeral ceremonies concerning his interment. His body rests in the Protestant cemetery of Bois de Vaux at Lausanne, and by means of a subscription in the Diocese of Western New York, there is being erected over his grave a small monument, the design of which has been made by one of America's distinguished architects, a godson of Bishop Brent. On more than one occasion not a great while before his passing Bishop Brent mentioned the names of eight or ten of his friends who he hoped, if they felt it important, might initiate some movement to aid the projects in which he was interested. These persons met several times and with the approval of Bishop Brent's family and aid and advice of others have initiated this Bishop Brent Fund, which has been incorporated under the laws of the District of Columbia. The Bishops of Western New York and of the Philippines were consulted and have given cooperation to this undertaking. At a meeting of the Diocesan Convention of the Diocese of Western New York on the twenty-ninth of October, 1929, a resolution was passed making cooperation with The Bishop Brent Fund the diocesan memorial to the Bishop.

"Bishop Brent attended from the Philippines the Edinburgh Missionary Conference in 1910, and took an important part in the Universal Christian Conference on Life and Work at Stockholm in 1925. He was also the main proposer and leader in the World Conference on Faith and Order at Lausanne in 1927, over which Conference the Bishop, in spite of ill health, presided. It is well known that the Bishop was interested in a number of other important groups and movements in the interest of goodwill among nations, and the plan to continue the movement looking toward eventual unity among the Churches.

"Among these is the Cathedral, which is the natural center for the religious life of the American and English people in Manila; St. Luke's Hospital, widely known as one of the earliest American efforts to supply a need for a modern hospital in the Philippines, which has always done work almost beyond its capacity, and which has had a useful and far-reaching influence in stimulating others to establish hospitals in Manila and elsewhere in the Islands; and the school at Baguio, now called Brent School, which is the only place children of American residents may be sent for education in a relatively cool climate and under conditions and environment similar to those at home. Some of these institutions are: The Cathedral, built thirty years ago, is in need of considerable repair; St. Luke's Hospital, constructed about the same time, is in need of repair and renovation; the Brent School needs a new boys' dormitory at fifteen thousand dollars, an addition to the Girls' dormitory at five thousand dollars, and possible annual help toward the great expense for travel and otherwise of securing American teachers.

"Among the projects Bishop Brent later undertook in the Philippines was the establishment of an Agricultural and Industrial School for Moro boys in the turbulent Island of Jolo. This last undertaking established about fifteen years ago at a time when many of the best judges among the Philippine official personnel thought conditions in the Island still too turbulent, was dear to Bishop Brent's heart, and he felt and expressed great anxiety as to its future support. The Moro situation made a strong appeal to him from the fact that Islam and Christianity meet under the American flag only in the South Philippines, and because both the Spaniards and Americans had greater difficulty in the Island of Jolo than elsewhere in establishing order and initiating measures for the benefit of the people.

"The simplicity and beauty of Bishop Brent's character and his widespread acquaintance in many parts of the world make it unnecessary to attempt here to describe his achievements, his talents and power; or to set forth at length the merits and value of the several undertakings to which he devoted his life

"The Trustees plan to secure a Fund which they hope will reach the sum of one million dollars. From this Fund the Trustees may contribute to the work of the Continuation Committee on Faith and Order, the annual budget of which from subscriptions among Christian people the world over amounts to about $30,000; and they would be able to aid from time to time institutions established by Bishop Brent in the Philippines, such as St. Luke's Hospital, the Cathedral, the Brent School in the mountains of Baguio, as well as to carry on the Moro school; and also to aid work in which the Bishop was especially interested in the Diocese of Western New York, where he was Bishop from January, 1918, until his death.

"The Trustees will welcome small contributions as well as larger ones, and, of course, any donor is at liberty to designate a gift as one which it is desired should be for a particular object among the undertakings in which the Bishop was interested.

"A small expense fund has been donated by several of the Bishop's friends to defray the cost of this appeal, so that subscriptions may go intact to The Bishop Brent Fund. Further and detailed information concerning any of the above activities will be furnished by the Secretary to any one desiring it."

All subscriptions should be made payable to The Bishop Brent Fund and sent to John S. Leech, Assistant Treasurer, care J. P. Morgan & Co., 23 Wall Street, New York City.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND NEWS.

(S. C. London Correspondent.)

At the Islington Clerical Conference to which reference was made last week and which is generally regarded as the foremost pronouncement of Evangelical thought, Bishop Hind (Bishop in Fukien), speaking of the problem of the expansion of the Anglican Communion in non-Christian lands, described the Anglican Communion as "an unique phenomenon," and as "not a Church but a family of Churches." Prior to 1784 the Anglican Communion as we know it, did not exist. Up until then it was practically co-extensive with the Churches of England and Ireland. There were, indeed, agents of those Churches working overseas, but they were no more than agents and were under episcopal oversight, so far as there was any, by the home Church.

The loss by Great Britain of her American Colonies led to the independence of the Church in America, and thus the first step was taken towards the Anglican Communion as we know it today.

In the United States: The independence of the United States became effective in 1776. It was not until November, 1784, after delays which had begun to prove galling to the Church in the new Republic, that the Episcopate was given to the Church there. It is good for us to remember that it is not to the Church of England that the United States owes the gift of the episcopate, but to the little Episcopal Church in Scotland which, free from any State connection, could take this momentous step without all the delays involved in Acts of Parliament, etc. But the delays that had already taken place had had one disastrous result. John Wesley, who we must remember had gone out to Georgia as a missionary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel as early as 1736, having given up hope of America's ever obtaining the episcopate from England, did himself lay hands on one—the Rev. Thomas Coke—to be superintendent of the Church in that land. John Wesley can have had but little idea of the result that would follow upon this action of his. The Methodist Episcopal Church of the United States of America, one of the largest and strongest communions in the world, and one that has always been characterized by very great zeal for the missionary cause, is the direct outcome of Wesley's action. It is very good to remind ourselves of these things these days when we are considering Reunion. None would think of calling in question Wesley's sincerity nor his earnestness of purpose; his action was an emergency measure merely; he declined to repudiate his own Churchmanship. That the emergency existed we cannot fairly doubt. On whom then must the onus of the schism rest? On the mother Church whose delays produced the emergency? Or on the earnest minister of the Church who, in his impatience for the safety of the flock of God, and in the face of, to him, intolerable delays, took emergency steps to secure it?

I call attention to these matters because it is well that our memories should be refreshed today, when we are facing in many lands a question which seems likely to call for special and unusual measures on the part of the home Church, and which, if she is unable to meet the demand in a generous and helpful spirit, may all too easily become the cause of further losses to the communion that we love.

Thus began that development which has led by degrees to the great family of independent Churches which is familiar to us under the title Anglican Communion. After further historical reference to its expansion, Bishop Hind went on, "The Anglican Communion comprises within itself every color in the ecclesiastical rainbow. . . . With all the great variety that exists between the members of the family we must realize that the danger of division within the Communion is not small."

To obviate this danger Bishop made the suggestion that regional conferences might be held where clerical and lay representatives, appointed to the General Synods of several neighboring provinces, could meet together, say, one or two years before the meeting of the Lambeth Conference, in order to discuss together some of the outstanding questions in the region covered, and suggest agenda for Lambeth. Thus the laity and clergy would be given a real share in the Lambeth Conference which they would highly value, and they would also gain a sense of their unity with the Church in other provinces besides their own.

At the same Conference the Rev. F. S. Cragg, lately C. M. S. Secretary in Palestine, dealt with the terms upon which we should be ready to cooperate with other Christians in facing the world task. In so doing he mentioned three significant features of our day. Firstly, the rise of the young Christian churches in Africa and the East. These "young churches are becoming more and more restive every year at divisions which may have some historic explanation in the West, but have no justification whatever in the East." Secondly, the movement for peace. The world's statesmen are trying to organize peace. It is a noble enterprise, but we know that everywhere, the whole world over, secular ideas, ideals and ambitions are more and more dominating the minds and hearts of men. "Can men find in materialism the power which will destroy the selfishness, hatreds, suspicions and rivalries which have been in every age the causes of strife and war, and the power which will bind men together in peace and fellowship? The Christian Church knows the answer. How can the redeeming, unifying power of the Cross of Christ be expressed today? . . . Can the divided Churches of Christendom give that witness in the world today, when the very Sacrament of the Lord's Supper has become the symbol of division?" Thirdly, the great experiments in Christian cooperation which are associated with and have been largely inspired by the conference at Edinburgh, 1910; Stockholm, 1924; Lausanne, 1927, and Jerusalem, 1928, each one of them a notable event in Christian history. This led him to speak of the Lambeth Conference of 1920 and its Appeal to all Christian people which was welcomed by the Free Churches and followed up by negotiations on the basis of Holy Scripture and the Creeds, the Two Sacraments, and a ministry acknowledged by every part of the Church. The negotiations, however, broke down because no agreement could be reached on the question of the authorization of the existing non-episcopal ministers.

This and such matters as are closely allied, seem likely to be subjects of acute controversy in the approaching months.

St. Paul Normal and Industrial School.

Lawrenceville, Va.—It has been announced that Archeacon Russell, founder and principal of the St. Paul Normal and Industrial School, the large nationally known Negro school in our midst, has resigned and that the Board of Trustees, accepting his resignation reluctantly and only after he had twice repeated his request, has elected his son, the Rev. James Alvin Russell, vice-principal, principal. In accepting his resignation the Board paid high tribute to the work he had done in building up the school and promoting good relations between the races. The office of principal emeritus was created for him with a salary of $1,800, and a house. The Board also passed a resolution to give him a trip to the Holy Land, but he declined this, suggesting in lieu thereof that the money be used for the needs of the school.

In forty-two years of labor here he has not only built up a great school, but he has touched the lives of the people in such a manner as to win the confidence and respect of both races in Virginia. Locally, the school is regarded as a valuable asset. Its work and influence is responsible for the fact that the Negroes of Brunswick are among the most law-abiding and thrifty in the state and also for the excellent race relations existing.

The school started here in 1888 with practically nothing, as even the land on which the first building was erected and the material which went into the first building were paid for by his own note, endorsed by himself and wife. Half a dozen boarders and three teachers constituted the first student body and faculty. Today the school has nearly 1,600 acres of land, thirty-five buildings 800 students and fifty-five officers, teachers, and employees. It has seen 1,000 graduates and 12,000 under-graduates. Its students have come from almost every state of the Union, Cuba, Porto Rico, Haiti, San Domingo, Jamaica and even far-off America. The school is fully accredited by the State Board of Education of Virginia, and has the endorsement and support of great foundations, like the General Education Board, Slater Fund, Rosenwald, and others. It is one of the chain of schools supported by the American Church Institute for Negroes and is the largest and best known school of that system.

The new principal, the Rev. J. Alvin Russell, is not without experience, as for some years as vice-principal he has been the administrative head of the school. He is a graduate of Oberlin College, A. B., and Philadelphia Divinity School. He did graduate work in the University of Pennsylvania in Sociology, receiving the degree of A. M. and graduate work at Columbia, obtaining both, his Master's Degree in Education from the Teachers' College and his Normal School Diploma, qualifying him for the position of Normal Principal.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robert C. Jett, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. G. Otis Mead.

Through oversight on the part of the writer, the following was omitted from the notice, published last week, of the death of the Rev. George Otis Mead:

Effective April 8, 1913, Mr. Mead resigned his charge at Christiansburg to accept a call to Christ Church, Roanoke, Virginia, where he remained fifteen years. During that period the communicant list increased from 286 to 574. It was in the early part of his rectorship here that the handsome stone church and parish house were built at the corner of Franklin Road and Washington Avenue, S. W.

On August 6, 1928, he retired from the active ministry on account of the state of his health and he and Mrs. Mead have since had their residence at Altavista, Virginia.

Fellowship Dinner Planned.

The Inter-Parochial Committee of the Diocese of Washington will hold a meeting February 19, in the Diocesan House, to make final arrangements for the fourth annual fellowship dinner in honor of Bishop Freeman to be given February 25. Bishop Freeman and the Rt. Rev. Charles Fiske, Bishop of the Diocese of Central New York, will be the speakers at the dinner. Each year the number attending and the enthusiasm for this occasion has increased, and it is expected that about 600 men will attend this year.

Golden Jubilee.

The week of February 9 was an important one in the life of St. Luke's Parish, celebrating, as it did, the Golden Jubilee of the parish and the twenty-fifth anniversary of the rectorship of the Rev. T. J. Brown, its present rector. The service at 11 A. M., February 9, began the week's celebration, which will end with the Sunday evening service, February 16, when Bishop Freeman will preach the sermon and confirm a class.

Each day of the week marked the anniversaries by some special feature, as follows:

Sunday, February 9—Morning Prayer and Sermon, 11 A. M.; preacher, Canon Anson Phelps Stokes; Evening Prayer and Sermon, 8 P. M.; Preacher, Canon G. Freeland Peter.

Monday, February 10—Founder's

Day Service, 8 P. M., Preacher, the Rev. George F. Bragg, rector St. James' Church, Baltimore.

Tuesday, February 11—St. Luke's Night, 8 P. M., rally of all the organizations of the parish.

Wednesday, February 12—Young People's Night. Pageant and Entertainment by Girls' Friendly Society and Sunday School.

Thursday, February 13—Citizens' Night. Special Program, 8 P. M.

Friday, February 14—Reception and Testimonial, 8 P. M., in honor of rector and his wife.

St. Luke's is a parish for Colored people, which has done outstanding constructive work for a number of years in Washington.

Up until 1879 the church was known as St. Mary's Chapel of St. Luke's Parish and was a flock worshipping in a chapel of St. John's Church. Dr. Alexander Crummell took charge of the congregation on June 15, 1873, a regular canonical organization was effected, a vestry elected and the church was admitted to the diocesan convention. St. Luke's Church, partly finished, was opened November, 1879, for divine service, and a migration of the people of St. Mary's took place. Dr. Crummel resigned and was succeeded in 1895 by Dr. Owen M. Waller, who served nine years, during which time the parish hall was erected and a rectory bought. Following Dr. Waller, the present rector, Dr. Thomas J. Brown, took charge, February 8, 1905.

Dr. Brown is a native of Columbia S. C., where he was born August 15, 1865. He was educated at the Howard School at Columbia, St. Augustine School at Raleigh, N. C.; St. Stephen's College, at Annandale-on-the-Hudson, New York, and did his theological work at Seabury Divinity School at Faribault, Minn., where he won the B. D. degree in 1893.

He was ordained deacon June 26, 1896, at Faribault, Minn. On January 27 of the following year he was advanced to the priesthood by Bishop T. U. Dudley, in the Church of Our Merciful Saviour at Louisville, Ky., which he had been serving since his ordination as deacon in 1893. He remained in charge of that work until January, 1905, when he resigned to become the rector of the church here.

Social Service Sunday.

Savannah, Ga.—Social Service Sunday seems to have been very generally observed throughout the diocese. Reports to the Vice-Chairman, the Rev. Harry S. Cobey, of Albany, Georgia, indicate that a number of churches and missions held a full service of appropriate prayers, hymns and sermons, while others had the prayers and hymns only.

Memorial to Miss Mary Maccaw.

Savannah, Ga.—A silver private Communion Service, given by the Daughters of the King of St. Michael and All Angels' Church as a memorial to Miss Mary Maccaw, their first president, was dedicated on the Fourth Sunday After the Epiphany by the Rev. Joseph Burton, rector of the Church.

Reports From Mission Field.

Augusta, Ga.—On January 20, Mrs. Agnes Rowland Richardson, at home on leave from China, gave an illustrated talk on Chinese customs at the Church of the Good Shepherd, the Rev. H. Hobart Barber, rector, and on the afternoon of February 3, Mr. John Alexander Clarke, a missionary and explorer in Africa for thirty years, gave word pictures of Africa and Africans that were so vivid as to almost transport his hearers to the scenes of which he spoke.

Rt. Rev. F. W. Sterrett, D. D., Bishop.

Nineteen Hundredth Anniversary of Pentecost—1930.

The Christian world for some time past has been planning to mark this anniversary, fittingly. The Federal Council of Churches began work last summer. They look upon this event as a Providential opportunity for quickening the life of the churches and of gathering in a great multitude of those "who should be saved."

In view of the condition of our own Church and of the fact that the Commission on Evangelism urges us to continue evangelistic campaigns for at least five years, we hope the clergy and laity of our diocese will use this occasion—the Pentecostal Anniversary—to work out strong programs and to endeavor to bring the same to good effect in every one of our parishes and missions.

Some suggestions:

A—The Church Schools: Beginning with the three Pre-Lenten weeks, a survey of the Church Schools should be made.

(1) Are all the children baptized?

(2) Are all of proper age confirmed?

(3) Do the confirmed members of the school attend church and make their communions regularly or are they slipping away?

(4) Do you have all the children within your parish bounds which naturally belong to you in your school?

(5) What about those for whom no one cares?

A real survey along such lines will yield great surprises in many places.

B—From Ash-Wednesday to Mid-Lent Sunday, March 30:

An intensive effort to revive the entire membership of the parish should be made at this time, for even during Lent we have only the faithful in the special services.

(1) Perhaps a good mission will help.

(2) Personal visits with prayers in each family.

(3) Prayer circles for a revival along spiritual lines in the parish.

(4) The objective is to get our people to live creative lives for themselves—for others.

C—Mid-Lent to Easter—April 30:

A revived church at work. Send them out two by two to witness—not to argue about the great thing the Lord has done for them. The wholesome testimony of a good layman is worth more than a lot of sermons to the unchurched. They hear them not.

(1) Cottage meetings might be held in some places.

(2) Bible study classes formed.

(3) The effects of the bringing of the Kingdom of God to the world.

(4) Work and pray for conversions—an experience with God. Win one. Real evangelism by clergy and laity.

D—Easter to Pentecost—June 8, 1930:

An effort will be made this year to make Pentecost the climax instead of Easter.

(1) A continued crusade of every member church attendance. There shall not be an "Easter slump." The good habit of regular church attendance must be re-established. Lent is not long enough to fix a habit.

(2) The reading of St. Luke's Gospel and the Acts during this period—a chapter each day with meditation. Let us get this habit again.

(3) From Ascension to Pentecost "Upper Room" prayer services, looking forward to great things on Pentecost—the promise is to us as well as it was to the fathers.

(4) Pentecost! a day of great expectation, great faith, great grace, great possession.

The Diocesan Commission on Evangelism sees great opportunities for the parishes and missions in this Nineteen Hundredth Anniversary for empowering the Church anew for the work of God. But no occasion, no opportunity, no plan, works itself. A real personality must get behind it and push it to success.

The members of the Commission will be glad to serve you in any way possible with such time as may be at their disposal and with such ability as they may have.

We, however, firmly believe that if priest and people can see the need for doing something extraordinary and together will do it, the results will be much better and far more lasting.

Will you please give this paper some time and reflection?

Chairman.

Laying of Cornerstone of Trinity Cathedral, Reno.

"And when the builders laid the foundation of the temple of the Lord, they set the priests in their apparel with trumpets. . . . And they sang together by course in praising and giving thanks unto the Lord."

So reads the report of the laying of the foundation of an ancient temple of the Lord. So might read the report of a recent ceremony of the laying of a cornerstone of a modern cathedral.

At three o'clock on Saturday afternoon, January 25, the Rt. Rev. Thomas Jenkins, Bishop of the Missionary District of Nevada, laid the cornerstone of Trinity Cathedral, Reno. The Very Rev. Bayard H. Jones, formerly rector of All Saints' Church, Watsonville, California, who began his duties as Dean of the Cathedral on St. Paul's Day, was present to assist the Bishop in this service. The ceremony was of double significance, marking not only the completion of the first unit of the Cathedral building project, but also the first anniversary of the Bishop's consecration.

On Sunday morning, January 26, at 7:30 o'clock, the Bishop, assisted by Dean Jones, celebrated the Holy Eucharist, the first service to be held in the crypt of the new cathedral. At 9:30 a children's Eucharist was celebrated, introducing the Church School to the primary purpose of the cathedral. At the eleven o'clock service, Dean Jones was the celebrant and the Bishop preached the sermon, using as his text the significant words from St. Paul's First Epistle to the Corinthians, the third chapter and the eleventh verse: "For other foundations can no man lay than that is laid,

THOU PREPAREDST A TABLE BEFORE US.

F. B. STONE.

Our God prepared a food for us,
'Tis wondrous, though 'tis true;
"Man shall not live by bread alone,"
Christ says to me, to you;
"But man shall live by every word Proceeding from God's mouth,"
Life-giving food for all the world,
No hunger now, nor drouth.

For every word assurance gives
Of life for you and me;
O could we earlier understand,
And this assurance see!
So come from early morn till eve,
Each promise feeds the soul,
"He sent His Word and healed them," too,
Partake, and be made whole.

O let us taste this heavenly food,
This manna from above,
And know its quick'ning power right now,
Its miracle of love;
A greater love this food will give,
Than our starved lives have known,
For many of us struggle still
To live by bread alone.

O give us light, O give us grace.
To crave the food prepared,
To bring Thy life each hour to us,
For whom Thy love hath cared.
O may we ponder on Thy Word,
Upon it feed, then give
This food to others who now lack,
That they may eat and live.

Undisturbed From Without.

There were times when Jesus withdrew from the crowds and even from His disciples. The evangelists observed these periods of self-isolation and remarked upon them in narrating His ministry to mankind. Why? What explanation is there for their reference to His insistence on personal privacy? Usually we are told He went apart from them to pray.

Then prayer must be more than a demand for forgiveness, for Jesus was without sin. It must deal with more than the consciousness of weakness, for Jesus was never insufficient for the labor whose performance he undertook in obedience to the Father's will. Its occasions are not all supplied from the circumstances in which the world placed Him, for Jesus was not an opportunist, subject to conditions for whose management He was unprepared.

For Him, the periods during which He withdrew from human company were hours in which He communed with God most intimately. He thus made actual the unity of purpose that existed in the holy Trinity, of which His incarnation and humiliation were the fulfillment. Thereby He manifested the purely divine powers for redemption which came exclusively from above, yet were entirely for earth and man. He thereby divided the infinite from the finite and revealed a life in which not even a disciple like John could share. The evangelists caught the significance of these times of seclusion and remarked upon them when telling what our Lord did.

Prayer for the believer involves more than it did for Jesus, because believers must always ask for pardon and beg for guidance and for help. But in a finite, human way, we also have the high privilege of individually "communing with God." We also can withdraw from the crowds, and place ourselves in a privacy that will permit the presence of none besides our Lord. Thus isolated, we seek and obtain that essence of spirituality, the presence of the invisible God.

Alone with Him, our minds catch the significance of His revelation of the kingdom that is in the midst of us. Our wills are strengthened by His grace, so that we can the more readily and steadily eschew that which is evil and cleave to that which is right. Our souls receive the evidence of God's nearness. Life takes on new and deeper meanings. We find ourselves less and less the creatures of circumstances and more and more the stewards of the mysteries of holy living.

Those who have learned how to be alone with God bear witness to the inspiring joy received during such periods. Those who have not learned how to shut the door from within against the world have yet to experience the greatest privilege in faith's possession.—Lutheran.

Ramsay MacDonald.

Have you noticed the following things said by that remarkable English Prime Minister when here among us:

"When I reached Washington I called on a man whom I found working with his coat off.

"I said, 'Hello, what are you doing?' He said, 'I am blazing a trail for peace.' And I said 'I have come to help.' And he said, 'My name is Herbert Hoover—who are?'

"'Oh,' I said, 'My name is MacDonald.' Then both of us said, 'Have you any objections to my using my axe along side of yours—not to enrich our respective wood-piles, but that together we may cut the trail a bit broader, so that more people and more nations, because of our working side by side, shall find it easier to pursue the path we are opening up?'

"Europe today tells its political leaders there are risks in peace. It knows that the assumptions made between one nation and others, that they are to conduct their affairs in sincerity and justice do lay the believing nation open to a certain amount of risk. I will take it! I will take it!"

"If I build ship after ship I would be taking the risk of war. I take the risk of assuming that you are men of your word. I am taking the risk of a peace which is temporary and in the end I will get a permanent peace.

"Every nation knows that by competition in armaments it has failed to get security.

"We are not to build walls that exclude each other, but temples that will attract one another.

"The understanding we have been trying to establish will be incomplete until it has become the common possession of all the nations on the face of the earth."

"SANCTUARY."

"Let us put by some hour of every day
For holy things whether it be when dawn
Peers through the window pane, or when the moon
Flames like a burnished topaz in the vault,
Or when the thrush pours in the ear of eve
Its plaintive melody; some little hour
Wherein to hold rapt converse with the soul
From sordidness and self a sanctuary,
Swept by the winnowing unseen wings,
And touched by the White Light Ineffable."

In Old Goa.

An Indian Picture.

From Donna Paula to Goa we rode along an austere highway, amid the scenery of India, but with signs of Latinity on every hand. Strange it was that crumbling 'dobe walls and ruins suggestive of old Portugal did not seem more out of place in this far eastern country that was old when Portugal was young.

Then in the late afternoon we drove out between low hills to see Goa and the towers of its great churches massive above it. It was a picture surely, or a dream; here were houses and churches, but neither man nor beast was about. We stirred up the dust of a deserted village, through streets that were a relief to our sun-tired eyes, stopping at last beside the cathedral and within the benediction of its shade.

Timelessness! That was the keynote of the great structure. We gazed, spellbound, at its weatherbeaten exterior; at its statuary and cornices; at the repairs that had been made here and there by loving, priestly hands to save the great edifice from the deteriorating effect of the climate. Only scattered crosses mark the former locations of the ancient city's many churches and convents and hospices.

Through its doors we were admitted into a perfumed dusk. Hearing the soft chant of priests we stepped forward with all care, but the sound of our footsteps echoed and reechoed through the high-ceilinged interior. Fading light streamed in through the tall tinted windows, gave an unreality to everything it touched. Here on the walls were faces of the martyrs, gentle and compassionate; here, too, the dark-visaged pagans whom they sought.

Out of the dusk a priest came quietly to us; showed us vestments of great beauty; relics of antiquity; and brought us down great sweeping stairs to a corridor where iron cells had once housed those elder priests who came to Goa in the long ago. Could I not hear their footfalls in the echoes of our own? Surely our guide heard them, for even while he spoke he held his head as though listening for a sound other than that of his own voice.

Then he showed us to the garden.

"You must see the sunset here," said he, and in his quiet way seemed proud that he could lead us to such a place at such an hour. The air was heavy with the odor of ten thousand flowers; bees drifted everywhere. And between the leaves of the mango and rain trees shone a light that was incredibly rose-gold.

At a well in the centre of the garden a lissome, dark-eyed girl drew a bucket of water. She smiled shyly; then, setting the full bucket atop her shapely head, started off homeward down one of the cool forest aisles.

From overhead came the mournful lament of a dove. The rising and falling cadences of melancholy sound added to the lonesome beauty of the place and a wrinkled, weather-beaten old Hindu convert in loin-cloth and tattered turban, girdled with the keys to the church, completed the picture as he sat in silent meditation on the rear steps of the edifice.

The sun dropped, with an almost audible splash, into the Indian Ocean and only a solitary ray touched the tops of the jungle monarch and the tip of one of the church spires as we climbed into our waiting car to return to the small boat that would take us back to the ship.

As we topped the rise leading out from the little hamlet, I turned back for a final look. The church was but a great dark shadow that brooded among lesser shadows in the satin haze of an eastern dusk.—Cliff Maxwell, in Commonweal.

"There is, However, a Limit—"

Billy is the neighborhood bully. He bullies boys and girls alike, provided they are younger and weaker than he.

This time, however, he calculated wrongly, and Jackie, despite his lack of years, has proved perfectly able to defend himself. He has retaliated by giving Billy a badly gashed lip, which the latter carries, much swollen and shamefully prominent, the remainder of a humiliating day.

It would appear that no further discipline is necessary for Billy. His mother thinks differently, however. Having witnessed the whole affair, she gives him a round of lecturing, sends him to his room for an hour, and even thinks it necessary to set his case before Daddy when the latter arrives at night—Let it be said for Daddy that he confines himself merely to "speaking" to the boy, realizing that Billy, probably, has had discipline enough for one day.

"Joan," said Mother, "if you don't pick up your pretty 'Miss Amandy' when you are through playing with her, some one will step upon her some day! How would you like that?"

"Nobody would step on my dear 'Miss Amandy,' Mother!" cried Joan, snatching Dolly to her heart.

"Well, I'm warning you not to let her lie on the floor," replied Mother.

Of course. Joan does let Dolly lie on the floor again, and quite naturally, Joan herself, steps upon her, to her own horror, and "Miss Amandy's" complete ruin.

Poor little Joan! One would think her heart-breaking sobs spoke loudly enough of punishment. Perhaps Mother has forgotten the day that her own "Raggedy Ann," whom she had left out-of-doors, was dismembered by Fido, for she is adding discipline to Joan's grief, Joan is not allowed to have any playthings and must sit sobbing in a chair until Mother feels she is sufficiently punished.

Judith is about graduate from high school. She has led her class since she left the grades. But she has had many interests to call her from Latin and geometry these latter days of her senior year.

"Judith, what are you doing tonight? Now, you know you must brush up your Latin, or you will lose first place."

"Yes, Mother, but I must go to this meeting. I'll try to be back in an hour, really, Mother."

After the meeting there is dancing, and Judith is not home in an hour, or even two. Latin suffers, and Graduation Day dawns with Judith trailing the honor students, instead of leading.

What visions she has had of capturing the scholarship, and receiving the plaudits of all. Mother and Daddy most especially! As she bursts into tears when breaking the news at home, one feels her humiliation is sufficient. Mother and Daddy decide, however, that she is undeserving of the gift trip that they have planned. She shall have a short trip, but not to the beach, where her heart and her classmates will be.

These actual examples of superfluous discipline are, perhaps, not so extreme, at least they are not so amusing, as the one my father used to tell of a neighbor farmer who, upon being told that his son had received a thrashing from the schoolmaster that day, replied, "That so is it? Well, there'll be a harder one waitin' for him when he comes home." But it really is very easy to over-discipline. It comes chiefly from a lack of sympathetic understanding, but it is often urged on by a desire to satisfy one's own feelings.—Pauline Kerr Thomas, in National Kindergarten Association Release.

A Striking Quotation.

The striking quotation we give is from Dr. Gossip's volume of sermons entitled "From the Edge of the Crowd," sermons of unusual originality and power. "It is long since they discovered," he says, "on the wall of a Roman barrack a rude drawing of a grotesque figure of a cross, and a soldier kneeling, with the scribbled legend, 'Alexander worships his God.' How easily one can recall the scene in the lounging group of rough soldier lads; the boy among them hailed for his ridiculous religion; the humorist, with the happy knack of drawing, dashing off, amid boisterous shouts from his delighted comrades, that quick sketch that summed up so neatly the whole grotesque absurdity of so impossible a faith. Very human but surely one would not naturally look for a speaking likeness in a picture drawn in that lightning fashion and still more in that spirit of open mockery! And yet, perhaps, the most striking portrait of our Lord is just that caricature, intended to create a roar of laughter! And all the ages down, many who had passed through the long galleries, filled with authentic masters, not greatly impressed, on seeing this stop short, with a catch in their breath, and then running out to Christ, are won! Think it over for yourself, and you will be surprised how often you turn back to it, how instinctively your hand reaches out for the gospel according to Christ's enemies." This "gospel" runs through the Gospels in many a testimony paid to him by the enemies of our Lord, about sixty of them being found in their pages. "He saved others, himself he could not save," and others that unwittingly placed on His brow some of His brightest crowns. The rude cross with a rough sketch of Christ hanging on it, drawn in derision by a soldier in a Roman camp, laughed at uproariously by the pagan crowd, now turns out to be our most authentic portrait of our Lord!—Presbyterian Banner.

I HAVE A BOY.

I've a wonderful boy and I say to him,
Son,
Be fair and be square in the race you must run.
Be brave if you lose and be meek if you win,
Be better and nobler than I've ever been.
Be honest and fearless in all that you do,
And honor the name I have given to you.

I have a boy and I want him to know,
We reap in life just about as we sow,
And we get what we earn, be it little or great,
Regardless of luck and regardless of fate,
I will teach him and show him, the best that I can,
That it pays to be honest and upright, a man.

I will make him a pal and a partner of mine,
And show him the things in this world that are fine.
I will show him the things that are wicked and bad,
For I figure this knowledge should come from his Dad.
I will walk with him, talk with him, play with him, too,
And to all of my promise, strive to be true.

We will grow up together, I'll too be a boy,
And share in his trouble and share in his joy.
We'll work out our problems together and then
We will lay out our plans when we both will be men.
And oh, what a wonderful joy this will be,
No pleasure in life could be greater to me.

The Meaning of Christmas.

The meaning of Christmas is that the greatest fact in the world is God—that He is good, not bad, that He is benevolent, not malevolent; that He is love, not hate; that He has disclosed Himself in the person of Christ; that He, so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son and that as God so loved us, we ought also to love one another. He who gave the gift of Christ to the world also welcomes gifts from us. The only gift that is worthy of Him is one that can be given by rich and poor alike; it is the gift of our hearts to Him. As we thankfully acknowledge God's great Gift to the world, let us in return give our hearts to Him, our money to the needy and our love to those for whom Christ lived and died.—Bishop C. P. Anderson.

"The missionary enterprise is not the Church's afterthought, it is Christ's forethought; it is not secondary and optional, it is primary and vital. Christ put it into the very heart of His Gospel. We cannot really see Him or know Him and love Him unless we know and love His ideal for us, and that ideal is embodied in the law of missionary service."—Van Dyke.

I do not believe that there is a place in any world, or that there will be any time in any world, when any soul may not, if it will, take hold of God's hand and begin to climb, climbing unto better things on the "stepping stones of our dead selves."—M. J. Savage.

For the Young People

THE BEAUTIFUL GIFT.

What can a mother give her children
Greater today than this one great thing—
Faith in an old, sweet, beautiful story,
A star—a stable—a new-born king?

Shining faith in the young lad, Jesus;
Lover of high, white things was He;
Jesus—straight as a Lebanon cedar;
Jesus—clean as the winds from the sea;

Faith in the young lad come to manhood;
Jesus, compassionate, tender and true—
Oh, my children—what more glorious
Gift in the world can I give to you?

Carry it high like a lamp in the darkness,
Hold it for warmth when the day is cold—
Keep it for joy when youth goes singing,
Clasp it for peace when you are old.

What can a mother give her children
More than a faith that will not dim?
Take it, my dear one—hold it forever:
A lamp for a lifetime—faith in him.

—Grace N. Crowell.

"Signal!"

The whistle blows for the game to begin. The quarterback cries: "Signal!"

"Twenty-one, sixteen, thirty-eight, twelve."

"Watch your man! . . . Follow the play! . . . Stay on your toes! . . ."

Thus every football captain talks as play by play he leads his team down the field for a touchdown. One of the four figures in the signal means a certain play. The team snaps into position and as they await the zip of the ball from the center to the backfield man who has been designated by the signal—as they wait in that moment of terrific suspense, the captain's words are ringing through their ears—

"Watch your man! . . . Follow the play! . . . Stay on your toes! . . ."

And as you sit there in the grandstand or stand on the sideline, you marvel at the achievements of that fleet-footed backfield man who dashes through the mass of humanity.

Why did it happen that way? Why did Stumpy, or Mizell, or Waugh, or Rothstein, or Banker, or McKever, or Leonard, or Crabtree, or Holm, or Booth, or Cariedo make that wonderful run? How could a man achieve that miracle?

One man couldn't, but eleven men could and did!

Let the captain call that play again and let the ten other men on the team fail to respond to that signal—to do just exactly what the coaches have taught them through many days of arduous training—and see where your brilliant halfback will be. He will be smothered by the opposing team and instead of gaining ground, he will lose heavily.

The whole team must follow the signal, and follow in perfect unison. Else there will be a penalty for offsides or a hole broken in the interference. It takes eleven men to execute a perfect play in football—not ten, but eleven!

"Signal!"

When that quarterback cries signal!" every man on the team listens and waits and holds every nerve at attention. The play depends upon him. The game depends upon him.

Thus it is in life—this great game we call Life. There are signals sounding in your heart every waking moment—truth, honesty, purity, faith, love, kindness, loyalty, courtesy, punctuality, reverence, and others too many to mention here. These are the great signals of Life. We must heed these signals if we are going to win in our family life, in our school life, in our community life, in our church life.

Jesus is our Captain. Listen to Him as He calls the signals for His followers:

"Come" . . . "Go" . . . "Love" . . . "Be ready" . . . "Follow" . . . "Watch" . . . "Pray" . . . "Give" . . . "Together."

And every boy and girl in all the world may be on Jesus' side—on Jesus' team. He wants you. He needs you. He is a winning Captain.

Hear your father talk about how Jesus has led him when the Game of Life seemed difficult and the clouds of disappointment were hanging low about the field of experience. Hear your mother talk about Jesus as He has helped her carry the burden when the stress of circumstances were almost overpowering.

"Come unto Me all ye that are weary and heavy-laden, and I will give you rest (help). Take my yoke upon you and learn of Me, for I am meek and lowly and I will give rest unto your soul."

That is the way our Captain talks to us. He knows that the game is a difficult one, that we cannot win alone. And He calls the right signal every time. Our fortunes are in His keeping. He will not let His little ones fall or fail. He is ever beside us, giving strength and courage and victory.

"Signal!"

Jesus is calling. . . .

Will you answer?—Rev. L. D. Newton, in Christian Index.

For The Southern Churchman.

Little Souls.

Mary W. Cruikshank.

Little Kitty had been very sick for some time, but at last she was better and the nice, starchy nurse had gone, so Kitty had Mother to herself.

Kitty was not sure she liked nurse any more; for nurse had said that Jonah's baby would not go to Heaven, because it was not baptized when it died. Jonah was the gardener and Kitty's very good friend, so that evening, she told Mother what nurse had said.

Mother was very dear. She said: "Kitty, do you think that when Christ said, 'Suffer the little children to come unto Me and forbid them not,' that He meant only the little Jews who were there then?"

"No ma'am, He meant all children for all time."

"So, I think, little daughter, now go to sleep and leave the baby souls to the dear Christ who loves them."

"Oh, Mother, you are so dear! and will the colored babies go to Heaven, too?"

"Who has been talking to the child," Mother wondered. But to Kitty, she said, "Yes, dear, the soul is given by God to every baby born on earth without regard to religion or color; and, now, goodnight, Kitty, sleep well, dearie, and let God take care of the baby souls.

Mother kissed Kitty, turned down the light and went away.

Kitty lay in her little white bed and watched a bright star twinkle and twinkle, until it seemed to be in the room.

"Why," thought Kitty, "it must be Tinker Bell" (for she had seen Mr. Barrie's beautiful story, "Peter Pan").

But the face in the star was not a fairy, but an angel, who took Kity by the hand very gently, saying, "Come little Earth Child, our Lord would have me show you many things."

Kitty went with the angel and they came into a beautiful room, with a wall-paper of pink rosebuds and yellow butterflies; the furniture was white with rosebuds, and a pink and white rug was on the floor.

In two white beds lay two beautiful babies, with clean faces and hands, and over each child was a lovely angel.

Kitty's angel said softly, "Little souls, Kitty; our Father will not let them be shut out of His Heaven by man."

Then they were in a different room; its walls were dirty and cracked, and the broken window panes were stuffed with rags, the table was a goods box and there were no chairs.

Two children lay on an old mattress in one corner. They had thin, dirty faces, and the bed-clothes were dirtier than their faces, but over each child was a beautiful angel, just as over the rich children.

The angel said gently: "Little souls, Kitty, Christ died for the poor babies also."

They went next to a tent made of skins, where sweet piney breezes blew in at the open flap, and on a bed of soft pine branches lay two little red babies with long, straight black hair.

And over each was an angel as beautiful as the others. Kitty's angel said: "God gave them souls, too, little Kitty, though they are Indians."

The next place they went, was a funny little one-room cabin and on the rafters overhead were chickens roosting, and a dog slept behind the door. On a straw bed in one corner were two of the blackest little babies, but their faces were clean; over each was a beautiful angel.

"I am glad the cute little black babies have souls," said Kitty. "Now I know they are God's children. Can we see some heathen babies?"

"Yes," replied the angel kindly. So they went to Greenland, where it is so cold that the houses are built of blocks of frozen snow, and you have to crawl into them through a snow tunnel.

The only furniture is made of sealskins and on a bed of these skins, Kitty saw two little yellowish white babies—very ugly to look at, but over each was an angel. "Why the Eskimos are God's children, too!" exclaimed Kitty. "I am so glad!"

The next place was queer. The walls and floor were of matting and the only furniture, mats. On one of these mats lay two little yellow babies, with slanting eyes, and the angels over their mats were as lovely as the rest of the angels. "Japanese babies belong to God, too, little Kitty," said her angel.

Last they came to a lovely island, all covered with palm trees; blue seawaves, gently touched the white sands, and there the houses were covered with palm leaves.

On the mat lay two very dirty brown babies with bushy black hair, for on that island, no one ever saw a wash-cloth or a hair-brush, and I believe if you gave them a cake of soap they would eat it instead of washing with it.

But over these children, as over the others, hovered the angels.

"See, little Kitty, the heathen babies are also God's children," said Kitty's angel. "White, black, red, yellow and brown, all God's children for all time."

Then the twinkly star faded and the glorious sun rose and little Kitty waked happy, for she knew nurse was wrong and Jonah's baby was safe in the arms of Jesus.

A HYMN FOR CHILDREN.

Jesus is my Saviour:
He who loves me so
Left His home in heaven
Long, long years ago;
Came on earth to save me,
Here to live and die;
And is now ascended
To His throne on high.

Jesus is my Saviour:
At the Holy Font
His own child He made me,
I shall never want,
His were words of blessing,
His were looks of cheer,
And His arms enfolded
Me, His child most dear.

Jesus, Loving Saviour
Hear Thy child today:
Keep me ever near Thee
In the narrow way;
May I in life's journey
Daily grow in grace;
Then at last in heaven
See Thy wondrous face.—Amen.

—Canon R. H. Ferguson.

Since this earthly world has been builded so grandly and embroidered and sculptured and painted so richly and gloriously, what a word of beauty will not that heavenly place be where the redeemed dwell through endless time with the spirits of just men made perfect and with Jesus?—Exchange.

Rayon.

A chemist pondered upon the fact that a silkworm caterpillar ate mulberry leaves and spun silk. It was a challenge to him and he felt that a chemist should be able to chew up something in a bottle or kettle and spin a thread just as good as that of the caterpillar. It took a long time to realize that dream, but now we know rayon as well as we do cotton and silk and the amount made runs to hundreds of millions of pounds annually.

It really is, chemically, very little different from cotton, from which it can be made but it is quite different in its appearance and some other properties. If you want to make an old cotton sheet into rayon you can do it. Soak the sheet in strong caustic soda solution, squeeze out most of the lye, tear the sheet all to pieces so that it forms crumbs. Beat up the "ripe" crumbs with carbon disulphide, a liquor of atrocious odor, poisonous and extremely inflamable, more so than gasoline. A bright orange, rather sticky mass will be all that remains of the sheet. Dissolve this in water with a little more lye in it. Adjust its thickness until it is just right; get all the tiny air bubbles out of it; also every bit of dirt. Then force through platinum plates with tiny holes in them into an acid bath. Filaments will result and these, after many other treatments, such as washing, freeing from sulphur and bleaching, will appear, after spinning, as rayon yarn. On the whole, it is easier to use the old sheets as rags and buy your rayon.

Thus is the caterpillar no longer unrivalled in the art of making lustrous fibers out of vegetable matter, although it has certain trade secrets that are still outside the range of the chemist's present achievements. It is true, no fisherman would like to use a rayon line, but his daughter finds rayon indispensable in making her wardrobe up-to-date.—R. E. Rose, in The Baptist Young People.

Spot's Sixth Sense.

"Spot" was just a big old shepherd dog which we had raised from a woolly, tumbling puppy. He was the playfellow of all the children, trained to harness and driven between the shafts of the express wagon like a veteran steed. Gentle and affectionate, he submitted without resentment to the climbing of the "littlest" brother upon his back, or to having his ears pulled by the little sister.

We lived in a rather lonely place with no very near neighbors, in the suburbs of a small town. Father was away from home a great deal during the winter months and it was upon these occasions that Spot displayed his greatest sagacity.

At all other times, Spot slept in his kennel in the backyard. but when Father was away from home and the household had retired, there would always come the familiar sound of the great soft feet padding up the steps to the porch upon which the door of Mother's bed-room opened. Slowly he would lay himself down across Mother's closed door, and then with a sigh, his regular breathing would begin, soon to deepen to a snore.

"There's Spot. He knows your father's gone," Mother would say—and we who before had been listening with little frightened flutters for strange footfalls would calmly sink into slumber, sure of protection by our faithful guardian, whose sixth sense had told him the master was away.—Blanche Naylor, in Our Dumb Animals

How A College Athlete Keeps Himself Well

Robert O. Deming
fancy diver on Colgate University Swimming Team.

BOB DEMING of Colgate, claims that a sensible method of health has really made life a pleasure for him. Mr. Deming writes that at first he could not believe this simple thing was the cause of his buoyant spirits. Finally, however, he had to admit that it was Nujol which was keeping him well, besides giving him, as he says, "five times the vitality."

"Believe me," he says "having free and regular bodily elimination makes all the difference in the world to a diver as well as to any other athlete. I can't afford to be nervous, sluggish, or depressed while diving. It just isn't done! I would like to urge any one, whether they think they are in good health or not, to give Nujol a try-out. It certainly can't do any harm, and I'll bet it would make them feel a hundred per cent better. It's worth trying!"

Mr. Deming has just about told the whole story. He is right in believing that Nujol contains no drugs, no medicines of any kind. It is tasteless and colorless as pure water. It is simply harmless internal lubrication, which your body needs as much as any other machine. Regularly as clock work, Nujol cleans out of your body those poisons which we all have, and which make us low in our minds, tired, headachy, and below par.

The way for you to find out how much better Nujol will make you feel is to try it for a few days. You can get a bottle in a sealed package at any drug store. It costs only a few cents, but it makes you feel like a million dollars. Do you know how many thousands of people keep themselves well and happy just by using Nujol? Why shouldn't you feel well all the time? You can! Get yourself a bottle of Nujol today!

"Lord, help me! is a prayer that a thousand will offer, where one will pray, "Lord what wilt Thou have me to do?" There are men who would be willing to have God for an assistant; but God for a Master is not sought generally. Yet he who would be a worker together with God must be ready to work as God's servant, or as God's child.—Selected.

The Church School and the Book of Common Prayer: An Appreciation.

The recent publication of Course IV, in this series of Church School Lessons, with a stimulating Introduction by the Bishop of Mississippi, gives opportunity for this expression of strong conviction.

"The outstanding problem before the Church today is that of the religious education of the young." This utterance of a parish priest, who is trying, with good results, to find a solution of the problem, is both encouraging and monitory; encouraging as showing that some are thinking helpfully about this great duty; monitory, even humiliating, in its true implication that the religious training of children is thought of as a problem, after so many generations of Christian life. No obligation greater than this, save only the due ministration of Sacraments, rests on any parish priest—none is so lightly esteemed by some who have, nominally, the cure of souls. The many are quite ready to try experiments in fulfilling this obligation by practicing on helpless children. It was the consciousness of those facts and the conviction that the Church has provided both material and method for his teaching that moved the Rev. Chas. M. Beckwith, long before he became Bishop, to put forth, more than thirty years ago, the Trinity Course of Church Instruction, of which the present Series is the natural and worthy successor. The Trinity Course did not have the appreciation or the currency that it merited. Every one who realizes the vital need of real teaching and sound teaching of the children of the Church has reason to be profoundly grateful to Bishop Beckwith for repeating his contribution to the Church's treasury of education by this revised series of manuals. His experience and success as a teacher, his clear grasp of fundamental doctrines, his true discernment of the needs and the potencies of the young, his loyalty to the Church, combined to qualify him for making these books.

Without instituting comparison with other manuals, some of which have real merits, it is true to say that no pastor of children who tries this Series will be easily persuaded to substitute for it any other. Some Series of Lessons is a necesssity because so many catechists in our Church Schools are only partially competent, in character or in knowledge. A really competent teacher of religion needs no other books than the Prayer Book and the Bible, used in that order; but the very great majority of our teachers must have helps, such as this Series provided abundantly and skillfully, if they are to teach anything more valuable than some names and analogies and theories.

What I have written above is a record of happy experience. About the time of the issuing of the Trinity Course, an opportunity for personal conference about it with Doctor Beckwith was the beginning of a cherished friendship and of an appreciation of the manuals which deepened with acquaintance. So long as I continued to be parish priest I used the Beckwith System with satisfaction and success. I have commended it strongly to my students here. Some of them have used it with enthusiasm. On two occasions, Bishop Beckwith explained it in my lecture room, in his forceful, inimitable way. It has the uncontested merit and strength of teaching what the Church expects each parish priest to teach, by using the Church's own provided, designated, enjoined and adequate instruments; the Catechism, the Church Year, the Book of Common Prayer.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mrs. Buckner M. Randolph.

At the January meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary of Grace Church, Casanova, the following resolutions were adopted:

Whereas it has pleased our Heavenly Father to remove from our midst our beloved president, MRS. BUCKNER M. RANDOLPH, each member feels the loss of a true friend, and that our branch has not only lost its faithful president, for more than thirty years, but the Church has lost one of her most loyal and consecrated communicants.

Mrs. Randolph was a woman of great personal charm and dignity of character and a peculiar sweetness of disposition.

She has passed into the nearer presence of the King. Her family will have the sympathy of a large number of friends in their bereavement.

In appreciation of her beautiful Christian influence, we extend to her family our heartfelt sympathy, praying that God may bless and comfort them.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the family, and to the Southern Churchman.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

which is Jesus Christ." At this service, the Bishop blessed and dedicated the following memorial gifts, Two Prayer Books, a Missal, a Baptismal Shell, and the Organ.

At the evening service Dean Jones preached the sermon, using as his text, "For the Temple of God is holy, which temple ye are" (1 Cor. 3:17).

The policy of this building project has been one of "pay as you go," and this first unit, just completed, is entirely paid for at an approximate cost of $35,000. It is hoped that the second unit, the Hunting Memorial Chapel, will be built in the spring. The completed building will cost approximately $125,000.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D. Bishop

Winter Meeting of the Archdeaconry of Harrisburg.

Harrisburg, Pa.—Preaching at the opening session of the winter meeting of the Archdeaconry of Harrisburg, the Rev. Clifford G. Twombly, D. D., rector of St. James' Parish, Lancaster, Pa., said: "There ought to be a law and order society of men and women in every community, and a strong and active law enforcement committee in every Christian church. I challenge the churchgoers and decent adult population of Harrisburg to stop doing nothing. This is a critical time. The way conditions are dealt with now will determine to a large extent whether our country is going up or down. Police alone cannot enforce the law. They need evidence, they must have respectable witnesses, they must have citizen helpers in their fights." Disorderly houses, liquor, salacious magazines, and immoral motion pictures were included in vices mentioned as prominent in the City of Harrisburg. Dr. Twombly urged his hearers to form a nucleus for a civic organization whose purpose would be a general clean-up by arousing public indignation. Telling of his experiences while walking along certain streets in the city, the speaker said: "No one can pass that district without being solicited. When passing through the district you see young men of adolescent age answering the beckonings and window tappings of rouged and painted girls. Christianity has been defined as 'The creation of wholesome men in wholesome surroundings.' It is the duty of the Church to do away with vice. If truly religious persons do nothing, it is certain that no one else will. Christianity cannot succeed if it does nothing more than it is now doing to clean up unwholesome conditions. Our Church people can do their part by bringing more responsible, legitimate, concrete, united influence to bear on definite situations of evil and corruption now left free to do their pernicious work."

The Archdeaconry Meeting, which was held in St. Paul's, Harrisburg, opened Monday evening, January 13, with a brief devotional service conducted by the rector, the Rev. Archibald M. Judd. At the conclusion of the service, Dr. Twombly conducted a Forum, the subject of discussion being "The Church and the Community." The rector of the parish had invited all the clergymen of Harrisburg, Protestant, Anglican, and Roman Catholic, to hear Dr. Twombly, and to take part in the discussion that followed. Several of the most prominent ministers of the city were present and spoke at the meeting. The Rev. Dr. Mudge, of the Presbyterian Church, moved that the authorities of the diocese and the rector of St. Paul's, Harrisburg, be thanked for having arranged such a helpful meeting, and for securing the presence of Dr. Twombly to address them on topics of such vital importance.

On Tuesday morning, January 14, the session opened with a celebration of the Holy Communion, at which the Rev. Archibald M. Judd was celebrant. Following the service, business matters pertaining to the Archdeaconry were discussed, the Ven. A. A. Hughes presiding. The features of the morning session were an address on "The Law Appertaining Unto Marriage in the State of Maryland," by the Rev. Walter B. Stehl, D. D., rector of St. John's Parish, Hagerstown, Md., and an exegesis on Eccles. 1:9, read by the Rev. C. S. Sedgewick, vicar of the Church of the Holy Cross, Harrisburg. Speaking of the law relating to marriage in the State of Maryland, Dr. Stehl brought out the interesting fact that in that state all marriages must be performed by the minister of some religious body. The law as it stands at present, although by no means ideal, does give to conscientious ministers the opportunity to advise those seeking to be married, whereas a justice of the peace might be inclined to perform the marriage as a matter of form and without regard to the future welfare of the contracting parties. Dr. Stehl made it very clear that he held no brief for the law as it now stands, but that every clergyman in the State has to abide by it, regardless of his own personal opinion. A general discussion followed and many interesting points were elucidated. The Rev. Mr. Sedgewick gave a most illuminating and thought-provoking exegesis, all the members present commenting on it.

The women of the parish served a very delicious luncheon. In the afternoon missionaries' reports were heard, and plans discussed for the extension of the work done under Chaplain Graoff at the Episcopal Home for the Aged in Shippensburg. Bishop Darlington was able to attend the mass meeting on Monday evening and expressed himself as very proud of the fine movement for better civic conditions in which Dr. Twombly has for so many years been a leader and pioneer. A cold prevented him from attending the sessions on Tuesday. The meeting ended with the benediction pronounced by Archdeacon Hughes.

Running the Railroads.

"Where's the president of this railroad?" asked the man who called at the general offices.

"He's down in Washington attendin' the session o' some kind uv investigatin' committee," replied the office boy.

"Where is the general manager?"

"He's appearin' before th' Interstate Commerce Commission."

"Well, where's the general superintendent?"

"He's at th' meetin' of the legislature, fightin' some bum new law."

"Where's the head of the legal department?"

"He's in court, tryin' a suit."

"Then, where is the general passenger agent?"

"He's explainin' t' th' commercial travelers why we can't reduce the fare."

"Where is the general freight agent?"

"He's gone out in the country t' attend a meetin' o' th' grange an' tell th' farmers why we ain't got no freight cars.'

"Who's runnin' the railroad, anyway?"

THE CORNELL CANVASSSER and THE WEALTHY MIDDLE-WESTERN BUSINESS MAN.

A canvasser for the Cornell Endowment Fund approached a wealthy Middle-Western business man for a subscription. In answer the business man handed the canvasser a sheet of paper on which was written:

It's a Gay Life

I have been held up, held down, walked on, sat on, flattened out and squeezed. First by the United States Government for the Federal war tax, the excess profits tax, liberty loan bonds, thrift stamps, war savings stamps; for State, county and city taxes, the capital stock tax; merchant's license and auto tax; and by every society and organization that inventive mind can invent and extract whatever I may or may not possess.

From the Society of John the Baptist, the G. A. R., the Woman's Relief, the Navy League, the Red Cross, the Black Cross, the Double Cross, the Children's Home, the Dorcas Society, the Jewish Relief, American Relief, Belgium Relief, etc., ad infinitum.

The government has so governed my business that I don't know who owns it. I am inspected, suspected, examined and re-examined, informed, required, restrained, and commanded so that I don't know who I am, where I am, or why I am here.

All I know is that I am supposed to be an inexhaustible supply of money for every human need, desire or hope of the human race, and because I will not sell all I have and go out and beg, borrow or steal money to give away, I have been cussed, discussed, boycotted, talked to, talked about, lied to, lied about, held up, hung up, robbed and nearly ruined; and the only reason I am clinging to life is to see what in h— is coming off next.

"Very entertaining and very true," said the Cornelian when he had finished reading, "but it has nothing to do with the Cornell Endowment. We are not asking you to give away anything. We are offering you the privilege and the high honor of becoming an investor in Cornell University; an institution which for a half century has been supplying the nation, including your own business and your own corporation, with men of trained intellect; an institution which in the past has successfully carried on a vital work of the nation—the higher education of its young men; but an institution which cannot continue unless it obtains additional capital from business men like yourself, who have been among the chief beneficiaries of its work."

When it was over, the canvasser for the Cornell Endowment Fund left the office with a check for $25,000 signed by the wealthy Middle-Western business man.

THOMAS NELSON & SONS, New York

237,000,000 Bibles in Circulation in 1929

A London News item, sent out by UNIVERSAL SERVICE, gives the interesting information that the Bible is still the best seller. The number of volumes of the Scripture in circulation is 237,000,000.

The figures were given out by Dr. John H. Ritson, who has just completed thirty years as literary agent for the Bible. To mark the occasion, a lunch was given in his honor by the British and Foreign Bible Society.

"With the exception of Russia." said Dr. Ritson, "where the society is excluded, I have seen the yearly European circulation of the Bible doubled from 763,000 to 1,420,000 volumes. In South America the circulation has risen from 41,000 to 505,000.

"When I began thirty years ago, twelve volumes were circulated to every $5.00 spent, and now for the same amount we can distribute twenty-six volumes.

"The extent of the society's work can be gauged by the fact that 12,000 volumes is our daily output. Whereas in 1899 the scripture was printed in 364 languages and dialects, the number now is 623, and there are some nine new ones in process.

"But people know nothing of the heroism and the devotion of the Society's colporteurs—some 1,600 in all, and all natives of the country to which they are assigned. They have to undergo the greatest hardships, especially in the far north, and also in lands which are at present in a state of upheaval."

A RICH AND DESERVED TRIBUTE TO MOTHERHOOD

A great mother is the finest legacy, the best fortune possible, to the children of men. In a peculiar way she molds the character and shapes the destiny of her children. She suffers with them and for them. She cares for them and bears with them. She lives with them and too often dies with them. Her's is the watchful eye; her's the sympathetic touch. Her's is the load of care, her's the midnight vigil.

Out of her heart are poured her richest treasurers of highest and holiest womanhood. Her children love her because she first loved them. She knows no music so sweet as baby's feet making melody in her heart. She knows no voice so beautiful as the broken words of her little children. In spite of her children she finds her largest life; the success of her children in the fruition of her finest dreams. For them she will delve and for them she will toil for them she will live and for them she will die. No other love is like the love of a great mother; no other influence so great. How soft were her hands when she stroked away the pain from our wasted bodies—so often more efficacious than the costiliest drugs! How sweet was her voice when with baby lullabies at the close of the day she sang us to sleep.

How beautiful were her feet when at midnight we heard her softly approach our sick bed to watch with us until the long, long night was gone—so long and dark! How ample was her breast when, tired and sleepy after the long day's play, we curled up and were rocked into slumberland! She is growing old now. There are wrinkles on her brow and her step is not so light. Her hair is gray and her form is bent and sometimes her hands tremble and even her voice is different. In the service of her children she has worn herself out. As she stands upon the western porch of life, the halo of the living God is gathered about her form. No mariner no chartless sea, can claim a richer meed of praise, a larger share of honor.

She is greater than the greatest sculpter because out of a bundle of possibilities she carves an angel form. She is greater than the greatest painter because on the canvass of souls of her children she paints pictures which shall live forever and ever. She is greater than the greatest poet because in the hearts of her children she writes poetry and sings songs which help to swell, the anthems of the angel choir of God.

She loses her life in high and holy fashion for her children and finds a rarer, richer life because she gives her all.

"VIA CRUSIS"

A MOST GLORIOUS AND GRAND "DECLARATION OF SALVATION":

"IF ANY MAN SIN WE HAVE AN ADVOCATE WITH THE FATHER;

"JESUS CHRIST THE RIGHTEOUS, AND HE IS THE PROPITIATION FOR OUR SINS," AND "FOR THE SINS OF THE WHOLE WORLD"—INCLUDING YOU.

"HOW SHALL WE ESCAPE IF WE NEGLECT SO GREAT A SALVATION."

"OUR BIBLE"

The Holy Bible is the Divinely-inspired record of the creation of the heaven and the earth; of the divine birth of man upon it; of the fall, redemption and restoration of mankind to their high estate, as after the image of God.

It was made up and kept through ages by the people of God chosen and separated for the purpose. And the Jewish race continue to bear witness to their high privilege and care, and the reliability of the record.

The Tables of the Ten Commandments, delivered from the awful presence of Almighty God on Mount Sinai, are the bases of our civilization, and stand as the seal and guarantee of the truth of Holy Scriptures.

The Temple of Solomon with all its splendor, its gold and jewels, stands for the Old Testament with its histories, laws and prophecies. The Second Temple, glorified by God, manifest in the flesh, the walk and conversation of the Messiah, the Lord's Prayer as its Crown Jewel, stands for the New Testament.

The Old and the New Testaments, bound in one volume, stand for the foreshadows and emblems realized and law and prophecy fulfilled; our Salvation accomplished; The Word of God; Everlasting Righteousness.

Our Lord as the Way, the Truth and the Life, the Spirit of prophecy, is the thread of the labyrinth of humanity. His life, death and resurrection guarantee man's divineness. He is the Alpha and Omega, the Beginning and the End, the Most Holy.

The Lord our Righteousness.—J. L. W.

THE BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER

The Book of Common Prayer is the orderly selection and arrangement of the teachings of the Old and New Testaments, adjusting their instructions to the life of our Lord from his birth to his ascension to the right hand of God and consecrating the whole calendar year to him.

Its selections are the best and wisest distribution of the words of truth. Its collects realize the "golden vials filled with precious odors," the prayers of the saints, and its Saints' Days make the family portrait gallery of the household of Faith.

Its divine words of spirit and truth have the flavor of Myrrh, Aloes and Cassia; are holy garments answering to the gold of ophir, and its language suggests the finest needle work. It may well stand for the robe of righteousness of the Bride of Christ, the Church of God.—J. L. W.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

The argument for the Risen Christ is the living Christian.—Winifrid Kirkland.

Augustine's is no exceptional prayer, "O Lord, convert me—but not yet!"—Matheson.

Praised be Christ, who by His teaching shows
That Love can cure the ills of all the world.
If ye, His humble instruments, aflame,
Heart, brain and soul with this His high intent,
Take Love through Friendship into the daily life.

God does not arbitrarily make men happy any more than he makes them educated or cultured.—Exchange.

You cannot run away from a weakness; you must fight it out of you or perish. Why not fight it out of you now, right where you stand?—Stevenson.

There is no use trying to interpret Jesus until the interpreter can rise above dry, wooden concepts and can feel firsthand the marvelous depth and height of the infinite inward grandeur, of His personal life and experience.—Rufus M. Jones.

Lord, point my sight to all the good
That lurks behind another's mood;
And make mine eyes a little dim
To what of ill I find in him.
—Mary Curchod.

For myself, the palace of my soul must have somehow two lifts—a lift which is always going up from below (the scientific movement), and a lift which is always going down from above (the religious movement). I must be seeking and be having. I must both move and repose.—Baron con Heigel.

Virtue by itself is not enough, or anything like enough. Strength must be added to it, and the determination to use that strength. The good man who is ineffective is not able to make his goodness of much account to the people as a whole. No matter how much a man hears, the word, small is the credit attached to him if he fails to be a doer also; and in serving the Lord he must remember that he needs to avoid sloth in his business, as well as cultivate fervency of spirit.—Theodore Roosevelt.

Vol. 95. RICHMOND, VA., FEBRUARY 22, 1930. No. 8.

SHALL WE SCRAP CONFIRMATION?

Attention has been called to the Reinicker Lectures on Church Unity, delivered by the Rev. Beverley D. Tucker, D. D., at the Theological Seminary in Virginia. We share with him our profound conviction of the distressing need for unity.

While not desirous of throwing cold water on any commendable effort toward unity, we would suggest however that the matter be looked at from another angle. While not attempting to deal with all the points brought out in the lectures, we would confine ourselves to one which in the eyes of some seems rather radical, that is, to admit members of other Churches as full communicants and Church members without confirmation. Dr. Tucker says, "To receive such communicants without confirmation in no way involves giving up the historic rite of confirmation for those who have been baptized and trained in the Episcopal Church." We approve of issuing a cordial invitation to all members of other Christian Churches in good standing to participate with us in the celebration of the Holy Communion.

When we are seeking to teach our children the Scriptural authority for confirmation and its practice through the Christian centuries, would they receive it with any deep conviction if we turn around quietly and dispense with it in the case of those coming from other Churches, and admit them as full members of our Church without being confirmed by our Bishop? It is true we believe that their status is not the same as children who are completing their baptism and openly confessing Christ. And, yet, may we not consider it as a mode of reception without any impugning of their previous Church life? Would not our sincerity be appreciated if we show our desire to hold to an ordinance that has such Scriptural authority and through the ages has been practiced almost co-terminously with baptism by the great majority of the Christian Church? It appears to have been familiar in the Church in 68 A. D. In Hebrews 6, it is classed with baptisms. Tertullian speaks of it in 150 A. D. Calvin regretted that it was not retained in the Presbyterian Church. Adam Clarke, the great Methodist commentator, believed in it so much that he went and received confirmation even after he became a Methodist minister. A confession of faith adopted by the Baptist Church in 1742, in Philadelphia, says: "We believe the laying on of hands with prayer upon baptized believers is an ordinance of Christ and ought to be submitted unto by all such persons as are admitted to partake of the Lord's Supper." In recent years a movement for unity among Christian laymen in Philadelphia required confirmation for membership in this interdenominational association known as Stonemen. Thus it would seem that so far from being a barrier to union, it ought to prove a bond of fellowship.

This brings us to consider the mistaken approach to unity so often made today. For, after all is said and done, it is not the matter of surrendering a cherished traditional belief always, but of knocking out fundamentals of Scripture. The atmosphere of an age affects everything. In morals we are appalled by the boldness and shamelessness that reveals an absence of the fear of God. Immoral people, Jude tells us, are not afraid to speak evil of dignities. This spirit has entered the theological realm. Emboldened by a fancied undermining of some truths of Scripture by the arrogant claims of pseudo science and cross-eyed thinking, there is manifest a defiance of authority and a tendency to break away from old standards and destroy ancient landmarks. Some act like the crew at Fair Havens, who believed the captain of the ship more than Paul, speaking under the inspiration of God. No wonder they are tossed on a sea of uncertainty, and as it came to pass with the ship they "let her drive," on the rocks.

Wider contacts have tended to weaken definiteness. Beliefs of many are growing cold, and the Rock of Ages is obscured to doubters. Evolving light may cause you to scrap what you held yesterday. Loosely held beliefs make for ruin, and a unity born of a fraternal, man pleasing spirit. Did ever any one hear of a union chapel succeeding? What has become of the community church? We opine that they fade away for want of definite belief.

Rapprochements, conversations, pacts of reconciliation, etc., have their day and pass away. In all these well-meant efforts, there is a failure to perceive that the ground of unity is not intellectual, but moral and spiritual. What was the beginning of division in Apostolic days? Back of I am of Paul and I of Apollos" was the carnal mind. In the land of Shinar they aspired to build the tower to heaven with the slogan let us invent, and construct and achieve. They built with brick and slime, but God builds with stone and mortar. And God scattered them and confused their speech. This was reversed on the Day of Pentecost. What a wonderful unity was brought from above by the advent of God's Spirit. One in hope and doctrine and one in charity.

There is a unity by expulsion. Christ drove off the multitude of seekers after loaves and fishes with words that were spirit and life. There can be no unity with a mixed multitude. Quot homines, Quot animi. We need definite beliefs held with deep conviction in love and lived in obedience to God.

It has been said that Church differences were not so much a matter of doctrine as of Church government. But the division seen in modes of government were the crystallization of previous differences of doctrine and these in turn from the distintegrating effects of sin. "By one Spirit are we all baptized into one body." This is the positive side of which the negative is: "be not unequally yoked together with unbelievers." The well-marked differentiated life of the early Christians grew out of clearly enunciated doctrines. Always in the Bible exhortation is based on doctrine. Notice in Hebrews the recurrent phrase "having . . . . let us." Hence Christianity is called in the Acts a "way"—"if they found any of this way". But now discipleship has been so vitiated by worldliness and the way so attenuated and so many strange sounds drown the once clear note of the trumpet of truth that we find many beating the air in uncertainty. There is a tendency to cut anchors and allow the winds of doctrine by the sleight-of-hand men and cunning craftiness to blow them about until they drift with the tide without chart and compass. "They continued steadfastly in the Apostle's doctrine and fellowship," etc. It was doctrine first, "you have obeyed from the heart the mould of doctrine," Paul says. Doctrine must be kept active by life and life kept deep by doctrine, as Philips Brooks put it. In short, we say, when regeneration has been experienced we are members of the blessed company of all faithful people and we may each be loyal to the special contributory doctrine of his denomination and yet work in unity.

"If any man will do My will he shall know the doctrine."

Let us live the full Christian life daily, loving God our Father with all our heart and soul and strength, which Love to God causes us to love our neighbor as ourself and if we love our neighbor as ourself, there will be no need for social service societies and other superficial outside application of philanthropic work, for if we love our neighbor as ourselves we will gladly embrace every opportunity to be of service to our neighbor in a unity of spirit.

Langbourne M. Williams.

THE TRUE STONEWALL JACKSON

By the Reverend J. J. Clopton

JACKSON, THE CHRISTIAN.

NO ARMY was ever marshaled which had in it more earnest Christians than the armies of the Southern Confederacy. The sombre cant and piety of Cromwell's roundheads is no parallel either in numbers or character. Lee, Jackson, Polk, Stuart among the great leaders, and thousands of unnamed heroes in the lower grades and ranks, earnest Christians all, is proof. The morale of such an army could not be conquered either by defeat or death, and was a reflex of Lee's and Jackson's personal religion. Jackson's religion had not a little to do with his success. Prayer with him was a fixed habit, his religion was his daily life. It was rational, courageous, constant, and nothing is more suggestive of the character of his religion than its spontaneous naturalness. In the anxious days between his wounding at Chancellorsville and his death, nothing is more suggestive of the reality of his religion than his child-like faith in the presence of death. Jackson, in the presence of death, undismayed and full of Christian hope, and Lee, cheerful, active, forgiving, self-renunciating under defeat, each sustained by the simple faith of his religion, are pictures than which no greater exists in history. Jackson, teaching a Negro Sunday school, leading in prayer, kneeling at the front, patient, resigned, triumphant in the face of death, are even greater evidences of his greatness than his most signal and brilliant victories. He stood for what was not an isolated note, but the prevailing spirit of the rank and file of the Southern armies. Though the Southern Cross went down in disaster, never can the spirit of Religion which sustained him in his brief and bloody career and his brothers in arms for four long years be denied. When Americans of today look back upon the life of Jackson, all in it proclaims the loftiness of his moral courage, the simplicity of his trust in Christ, the depth of his faith in prayer, the resignation to untimely death, the glorious hope of the Resurrection.

To the South today no ideal should stand higher than his life. Great in his bravery, great in his inspiring leadership, but in nothing so great as his religion.

ANECDOTES OF STONEWALL JACKSON.

The following anecdotes, with one exception, were garnered from Southern Veterans. I give the anecdotes mainly in the words of the eye-witnesses:

How Jackson's men saluted him. Told by G. B., Sergeant Major, Company G, 25 Virginia Infantry, C. S. A., "Stonewall" Brigade:

When Jackson rode along the lines on old "Sorrell" the troops would cheer him, and he would take off and keep off his gray cap as they cheered him.

If it was so he could not be cheered, the soldiers would uncover their heads and not utter a sound. In such cases as Jackson rode with his staff, if the troops were in his way he waved his hand from side to side as a signal to clear the way.

How Major M., "Stonewall" Brigade, saved Jackson from capture of Kernstown. Told by a son of Major M.:

Jackson was in a house near Kernstown with his staff. A regiment had been stationed to protect him from the advancing Federals. But as they saw a cavalry regiment of the enemy advancing they broke and ran. Major Moore was near with only twenty-two men. He secreted his men behind a stone wall and ordered them to hold their fire until the enemy was near, walking up and down among them. On they came. Suddenly a volley stampeded them. They reformed and charged a second time. Again they broke and fell back in confusion for the last time. The determined stand of this handful of brave men saved the great "Stonewall" Jackson from capture. That night Major Moore, who was then a Captain, was introduced to Jackson, and thanked heartily for his valuable services.

Stonewall Jackson graduated in the Class of 1846 from West Point. There were sixty-nine members, and Jackson graduated seventeen, with such distinguished members as George B. McClelland and George E. Pickett. He was commissioned Second Lieutenant in Field Artillery and joined Scott's portion of the American Army in Mexico. For gallantry at the storming of the castle of Chapultepec he received the highest rating ever given an American soldier, being brevetted Major of Field Artillery. He continued in the Army until February, 1852, being elected in the meantime Professor of Natural Science and Field Artillery at the Virginia Military Institute at Lexington, Va. He was known by the students as "Old Jack", and was distinguished among them as eccentric, and all kinds of pranks were practiced upon him. The following anecdote was given me by an honored clergyman of the Episcopal Church, now the last surviving member of General R. E. Lee's staff:

Anecdotes told by Major G. B. C., member of General R. E. Lee's staff:

I was a Cadet at the V. M. I., prior to Civil War. One day Major Jackson assigned three of us to the blackboard to demonstrate problems. I finished and sat down. A classmate next to me had seen Major Jackson mark me, and he said, "Buck, old Jack gave you one." Three was maximum. After class I went up to the Major and said, "Major, did you give me one?" He replied, "I did." "Why?" said I. "Because you worked the wrong problem—the one I did not give you." No argument could move him. My relations became very strained, and when I graduated I was not on speaking terms with him. After first Manassas, when the army was lying at Centreville, one day while mounted with another youthful soldier, we saw the now famous "Stonewall" at a distance on. I asked my companion to hold my horse and, advancing towards General Jackson, extended my hand and apologized. He received me kindly and said, "I am so glad."

In the classroom at V. M. I. we used to annoy Major Jackson a good deal by cat-calls, dog barks, etc. One day I was imitating a puppy. He tried in vain to find the cause, much worried. Finally he said, "There seems to be a puppy in the room." The noise immediately ceased.

How Jackson got his name, "Stonewall," as told by R. C. P., private in the "Liberty Guards":

I saw General Bee waving his hat upon his sword at first Manassas, and he said, "There stands Jackson like a stone wall."

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSE.

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice, eternal treasures, indeed. "Thy word have I hid in my heart, that I might not sin against thee." Ps. 119:11.)

This week the following verse was submitted by

Mrs W. T. Yancey, of Woodville, Virginia:

"And be ye kind one to another, tenderhearted, forgiving one another even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you" (Ephesians 4:32).

Who will send one from the far-away places as well as very near us?

TRINITY CHAPEL

HARTFORD, CONN.—Ground has been broken and work is under way on a new chapel for Trinity College that promises to be one of the architectural show pieces of this country, the aim of the donor, Mr. William G. Mather, of Cleveland, Trinity, 1877, and a member of the college board of trustees, being to give his Alma Mater a building of rare beauty, worthy to be a House of God, not only as an ornament to the college, but also a tool—an opportunity for real use by the students.

Second only to this consideration in Mr. Mather's mind is a thought to make of his gift a means whereby Trinity men and their familiar may erect a permanent memorial, on the college campus for alumni of the college who have died. Accordingly, it is his intention not to complete all the details and the furniture of the edfiice, but to leave ample opportunity for others to share with him in the privilege of making the chapel perfect. The architects, Frohman, Robb, and Little, of Boston and Washington, the architects of the National Cathedral, have been working on the plans for a year and a half, and the building will be two years in construction, although it is expected that some use can be made of it during the 1931 commencement.

The chapel itself will seat approximately 300 men in the choir, with the addition of 300 more outside of the rood screen. Built against the tower is an outdoor pulpit, for use in connection with open-air services on the campus.

Worked into the new chapel will be several pieces of ancient stone that will link Trinity, Hartford, with her sister Trinities of England and Ireland, and with the ancient English Church. These include:

The framework and mullions of a window that originally was in that part of Whitehall Palace built by Cardinal Wolsey. These stones have been owned by the college for forty-two years, and are a gift of a former Hartford resident.

From Trinity, Cambridge: a corbel head from a building so old that it has been succeeded by one of the present venerable structures.

The Missionary College of St. Augustine has sent two stones, one a piece of Roman tile from the Chapel of St. Pancras, which is said to have been a pagan temple before it became a Christian Church in the year 598; the other a piece of Caen stone from Normandy, formerly a part of St. Ethelbert's Tower in the Abbey Church of St. Peter, St. Paul and St. Augustine. This church was built about 1080. Since the tile is Roman, it is believed that originally it rested in an ancient British church of Roman Times that later became a pagan Saxon temple.

From the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury Cathedral: a small piece of carved stone from the Cathedral itself.

From the churchyard wall at Sulgrave Manor, the original home of the Washington family, a stone which will serve as a reminder that the original name of our college was Washington College.

From Trinity College, Oxford, an old building stone.

From the old Chapel at Trinity College, Dublin, a part of a pillar which was taken down about a hundred years ago.

Architect's Drawing of New Chapel for Trinity College, Hartford. Construction started January, 1930.

Book Reviews

VERSES BY THE WAY: By the Rt. Rev. James Henry Darlington, D. D., with Forewords by Edwin Markham, Sir Oliver Lodge, LL. D., and the Rt. Rev. Hon. Sir Gilbert Parker, LL. D. Published by the Fleming H. Revell Company, New York City. Price, $2.

With such an array of distinguished personages stimulating the reader, there is little an humble reviewer can offer. The marvel is that with his multiudinous demands, this active prelate should find the mood and the leisure for poetic compositions. But here is it, virile and winsome and the successor of three preceding volumes in the same strain.

As one who has intimately known Bishop Darlington for almost half a century, I beg to lay my tribute at his feet, as I peer into this treasure house of poesy. His many friends and admirers will wish to possess a copy. Edwin Markham's commendation is that the Bishop directs his messages into the paths of "every-day kindliness, truthfulness and honesty," not "in the grey and violent nuances of indirections, but in the black and white of direct statement." Sir Oliver Lodge claims that the author mirrors "his assured conviction of the satisfying beauty of the Christian faith." Sir Gilbert Parker testifies that the Bishop combines in some of his poems the genius of Eugene Field and James Whitcomb Riley.

What more could be said?

Kenneth Mackenzie.

THE VEILED DOOR: By Caroline Giltinan. Cloth. Pp. 101. Published by The Macmillan Company, New York. Price, $1.50.

Strikingly contrastive of Bishop Darlington's contribution to the poetic world, is this volume of sorrow, of love, of faith and unrealized desire. It has its place; for all of life is not sunshine. The mellowing power of unexpected turns, the defeating barriers that impede our progress which come to be the very refining we need, contribute, after all, to full-orbed culture.

Kenneth Mackenzie.

RELIGION: WHENCE AND WHITHER? By the Rev. Clifton Macon, D. D., with Introduction by the Rev. Robert Norwood, D. D. Cloth. Pp. 101. Published by The Association Press, New York City. Price, $1.

When the editor sent me this book, I could have wished with all my soul that it had gone to some one else. For I have been a guest in Dr. Macon's home and broken bread at this table. Such kindly hospitality cannot be forgotten. Yet, the memory of his explosive communication to the Churchman during past months inspired me with a dread to even open its pages.

But I have read it, though with an occasional spinal shiver and a bit of a heart-ache at times. However, I have no disposition to criticise it adversely. It belongs to a class of publications now flooding the market and obtaining ready sales. It seems to be what the public wants; and will help those who have its vision.

One may question whether Christian leaders are wise in admitting to the young people (for whom Dr. Norwood thinks this contribution is specially designed) that we have our own doubts about the faith. And in our search for the human in the Scriptures, there is grave danger that we not only miss the divine, but crush it with our unholy feet. Our "flaming youth" are adventurously and hilariously insistent upon breaking down what has been reverently treasurable. This they first imbibe from the schools where unspiritual teachers enthuse them with revolutionary ideals. It is a part of the progressive program. Among some of the excellent things Dr. Macon presents, is the one conspicuous thing I have joy in commending. He advises his readers to procure a Bible, a good Bible, one that will stand wear and tear, and to studiously seek from it the light they need. If they will accept that counsel and read it for themselves, they will obtain just what we all would have them. The critical, it is true, will find ample material for confirming unbelief. The ardent seeker after "the truth as the truth is in Jesus" will discover the Author of the Book and become delightfully acquainted with Him whom to know is life eternal. Here he will digest the spiritual food prepared for his inner life, if he is sincere with himself and his God. He will behold the ground of redemption and its beneficent provision and the glorious Redeemer who will become the passion of his life.

After all, the young or the old will be moved and energized by the atmosphere which lends itself to the spiritual moods of the individual. That is why we are all so different. The new world which Dr. Macon believes we are entering will be the same old world of sin and selfishness, of faith and unbelief. God will do His best to win men to Himself; and the Gospel will be just what it was in the beginning, "a savor of life unto life and of death unto death." Argument goes but a little way. Men will think for themselves. The sweet persuasion of the Holy Spirit will allure willing hearts in to the current of His keeping. In this great centennial year may we give ourselves to the fervent acknowledgement of His sovereignty; and confess that the hidden mystery of Christ crucified is His prerogative alone to reveal (1 Cor. 2:1-14).

Kenneth Mackenzie.

Thank you, Dr. Macon, for both hurting and healing.

PERSONAL AND CHURCH PROBLEMS.

Mr. Editor:

There is an obscure but important footnote in your issue of this date (January 8, 1930), which ought to stir up a lot of thinking. It says, "Our Lord Jesus Christ would like to make this world a very different place . . . and He wants all of us . . . helping Him to do it." The words are under verses beginning, "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do " and are signed, "Frederick W. Neve," who will be recognized as Archdeacon and Doctor Neve. In no better way could a Doctor of the Divine Science make his title good than by bearing such a message as this. The world is full of people who need it. From the suicides who make the last surrender of life viewing life as useless, to the hosts in despair and disintegration, up to those who are passing their days without inspiration, and those who seize God's purpose with too weak a will, there are so many of us and so many around us who need to know God's purpose in life, that such a message as this should, in every way, be kept moving.

I hope you will not mind if I go on to say it has set me thinking; and if I set down some of the things it made me think about.

The Eternal Son of God has told us that He came into the world for a purpose. We may sum up His purpose as God's purpose in all creation—to make all men happy through goodness, through harmony with God's purpose and God's ways. To that, not His Birth only, but His Life, and His Death, were dedicated. To save us for God's purposes in this life and beyond, our Lord even endured the Cross. On the night before He was crucified, our Lord took His disciples, whom he had chosen for spreading abroad the good news of His purpose, and He let them deeply into the meaning of His sacrifice. Their training had qualified them to understand it. He drew them to sympathize with it, to share it in spirit. He even asked of them a devotion which might go as far as His own. He promised to be with them as they went, adding to the number of those who would give all to share in God's purpose for men. They were directed to serve men through serving God. It is not unreasonable to say that this event was the creation of the Church—a called and dedicated Body, dedicated to sacrifice, that the purpose of God might be fulfilled in man, for the highest joy of all man. Was it a vain quest? The perpetual help and presence of the Crucified Victor would be enough for them in failure, and enough for some success. The Church, despite failures and weakness, is a called and dedicated Body, meant to win men to the joy of "helping Him to do it"—to bring to pass in human lives the purposes of God. We are Baptized into His Death; and into Christ's Holy Church. We are called to forsake evil, that we may give ourselves to the good purposes of God. The whole of the Church is a Body dedicated to the perfect Purpose of life.

Now, why do people forget this? Or sit loosely to it? It may be preached at us and we forget it. If people really fail to learn it and do it, perhaps that may be for the same reason they fail in other things. It may be for the lack of practice. Only practice makes skill. Skill in living is just as much derived from practice as any other kind of skill. If the Church is a Body dedicated to the purposes of God, its members must practice the intention, the expression and the art of dedication. In the presence of the Crucified, we must offer ourselves, our souls and bodies, to be a reasonable holy and living sacrifice. The whole Church is a sacrificing Body, because Christ offered once for all; and He being with us, we are lifted to join in His Offering by offering ourselves. One who offers to God is called a priest. The whole of the Church is a priestly Body called to offer itself, with the aid and presence of Christ. We ordain a man to be priest for the priestly or dedicated Body, because he has vocation or call; and has been trained to give his life to teaching men and winning people to practice offering themselves to God and God's purposes, that they may become perfect. The duty of a priest is to offer his people in the presence of Christ to do the will of God, in the spirit of Christ and with the aid of Christ. Of course he himself is of the one Body and he must offer himself when he offers his people. Worship has been called a lost art in America. Worship is the practice of offering ourselves to God. Christ created the Christian worship at His Passover table in the upper room in Jerusalem the night before He gave Himself on the Cross. In that act He identified His disciples with His Sacrifice on behalf of the purpose and will of God; and they thereafter identified others with it, for it is the only perfect sacrifice, and large enough for us all. We ought to come to Holy Communion, seeking the meaning of it more than we do. We may see it plainly if we will read St. John 17; and two verses of the chapter fololwing, to indicate the connection between dedication and the Cross. Real Christian worship as Christ gave it, is identifying ourselves with His self-giving on the Cross, and learning to do the like in our lives, with His aid.

Some of us priests preach, teach, visit, and live to help people to that. It is the best we can do for them. It takes a deal of trouble to win one person to it. To win a man to live for God's purposes, to make him wish to hide his life in Christ, even to be happy to lose or to suffer with Christ, to rejoice to win with Christ, that is the all-year task of the priest, to some degree capable of being shared by every member of the priestly body which we call the Church

The Holy Communion is simply our practice and learning to offer ourselves to God's purposes in the spirit and presence and with the aid of Christ—the highest function of a man's life. Those who hold this in mind rejoice to call themselves priests. Why should a parish put a man on a salary if he can take his people only as far as Morning Prayer and preaching? Why not let our capable parishioners lead Morning Prayer? If the priest concentrates on his priesthood some of his best people will seek to follow him in his Orders. It is time we thought more of this. We ought to stop saying of our men whom we present to the Bishop for Ordination to the priesthood, that they "joined the Episcopal ministry," as was said in a New York paper recently; or as a man in our neighborhood said of a friend of his who was recently ordained to the priesthood, "Now, I suppose he is a full-fledged Rector-man." We hedge too much about this supreme thing in our Prayer Book. Pastor, parson (one of our officials from "281" used this many times in a recent address); clergyman, rector, minister; anything to keep people from seeing that the supreme purpose is to win men to God's purpose and lead them to offer themselves to it with Christ. Some of those people who solemnly petitioned our Bishops to enjoin upon us the use of "the Prayer Book terminology" are the last to recognize, in their own speaking, that every Bishop is first a priest, and in the parishes in every Bishop's diocese are men who have been ordained priests. It is a distinct advantage to our people and to our ministry that we should always recognize in our common speech, that their place and work is to offer themselves to the service and will and purpose of God, in the spirit and in the Presence and in the way and with the help of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. To recognize today that our Rector is a priest will be no small help to making us hear the call of Christ and feel the purpose of God in this life. And that will give us inspiration for a happy perseverance even "until everlasting life," as the priest in the Communion service always says to us.

Our rule is that a priest is the proper person to offer to God. A special priest stands at the head of a priestly people. Our Communion service is full of the sense of approaching God "through" Christ. From the offertory on to the end it is an offering to God. It is an ascending series of offerings: alms and oblations, prayer, penitence, praise. The solemn climax comes when we offer, in Christ Crucified, our whole selves. The memorial of the crucifixion which our Lord instituted is a definite association of our offering with His Offering, the Sacrifice of Christ. If we "discern" what the Bible and the Prayer Book say, that Christ is present for each offering, then it becomes vivid for us that our offering of self is associated with our Lord's offering of Himself.

Our rule is that if a man is ordained to the priesthood, he is not subject to be ordained again. We expect of a priest that he shall possess the idea and character of a priest. But by our rule we do ordain to priesthood a man who has been a "Gospel minister." That is because we want him to possess the idea and character of a priest. It is of essential importance to our people forever that they should see in the pastor the representation of the idea and character of the dedicated Church, perpetually offering itself to fulfill the purpose of God. I know ministers of the Gospel who are not certain enough of the purpose of God in Christ: so that in practice they do not preach the Incarnation of the Eternal Son. At a recent funeral of a dear friend of mine, the minister read the words of our Lord, "I will see you again. Where I am, there ye shall be also." He added his comment that this was the opinion of Jesus and that it is worth serious consideration. He was himself evidently uncertain about the whole business. How far this is from the Christian proclamation of the Resurrection! A weak witness carries no conviction. I feel quite sure that congregation is a social more than a religious organization. If we are united to the Risen Christ who was crucified for this purpose, we cannot bear any but a strong witness to His Living Person. I know others who practice their own personal interpretation of the memorial of the Last Supper, but it all appeals so little to themselves that they conduct it only on a Sunday afternoon every month or two. Even where a better understanding and practice exist, it remains true on the whole that the majority of congregations of ministers who are not priests do not practice or enjoy Christian Worship as our Lord founded it. This is why we support Bishop Manning's ruling that our Churches are set apart for our people to use in learning and practicing dedication with Christ and in His way, to the purpose or glory of God.

One or two of your correspondents have urged clearing out altars from churches, and substituting tables. It makes no difference whether the Lord's holy table is called by this name or that. Where you have priests you might as well have altars. They signify the act of the priest. They keep it in people's minds that the whole Church is dedicated to God in Christ. You set your holy table in the place of prominence and you make it fine, because it is not a supper-table but a place for the things our Lord provided, for our act of union with His Sacrifice.

Calvinists declared the will of God in Predestination: to which the human response was submission. Puritanism carried a great deal of the weight of the same idea. You will find the purpose of God, or His Will, or His Leading, or His Glory, all practically forms of speech showing minds looking in the same direction. It is a very living impulse among men, and men must have the truth about it. If they do not get it right, they will take it up in some wrong form. When religion goes out at the door, superstition flies in through the window.

Buchmanites declare the guidance of God through private seeking. This is good, and their methods of conversion may be good. But Christ guided private seeking in a social environment. His minimum is two or three, but those He trained were twelve, those He sent seventy, those He fed four thousand and five thousand. His Church is a social Body dedicated to our Lord's way of doing things We ought to make up our minds that it is better to lose with Christ than to gain by some other and "better" method. The Buchmanite restraint of Holy Communion is not after our Lord's leading. Restraint is too moderate a word to describe their attitude. There is evident a tendency to reject. If, as our record seems to show, our Lord founded Holy Communion as a practice in dedication to the Purpose of God in His Spirit and in His Presence, and thus meant it to bind His Church to God and its own members to each other, and if in this way He meant to give to His members the strength for perseverance, then in losing anything of Holy Communion the Buchmanites have suffered a great loss. It is commonly reported of the Buchmanites that they do not persevere, but fall away. This is asserted and denied. Probably there has not yet been time for a conclusive test. More will be known, about that, after the third generation. But why waste a life on something so uncertain?

Christian Scientists try to promote harmony with the purpose of God as expressed in their own way. They have their own way of promoting it. Daily meditation and reading, even if done poorly, is a good practice. Christian Science teaches people to ignore pain and sorrow. That is good if you have no other way. Christ teaches us the opposite. He was crucified, He suffered, He was dead. And through His Cross we learn that God does not take away our pain and sorrow, but He makes us strong and great to overcome them as He did. An eminent physician in a great city told me that the estimated loss in that city through neglected care of the body induced by Christian Science is annually a half million dollars. The dollars show only part of the trouble. There is an imperfect but good method with the body, because physicians are imperfect, but with the soul there is a perfect way for the perfect work, because it is our Lord's way. It is no secret or monopoly.

Everybody has at hand a copy of the Gospels and St.

Paul, and everybody can find out quite easily that the social method of our Lord for dedicating His people in His Spirit and Presence to the Purpose of God is the one service which He instituted. Our part is to participate with a developing sense of dedication to God.

I have a haunting bad dream of a big Church years ago nearly emptying itself into the streets during the service, most of the people desiring to escape any participation in the Lord's service. As Communion was "observed" only once a month, many of the members were even then not present and probably did not know what it was about, or knew very slightly. We should make it a point of honor to remain gratefully through the service. If we are not duly and truly prepared to receive the Holy Communion, we should feel that we may offer what there is in us to offer, and there is always something, and leave the act of personal communion till we have properly prepared ourselves for the next or some subsequent occasion. The whole Church is a dedicated and dedicating Body and we should not go out like Judas or in any other way hinder or discourage it in performing to God its greatest spiritual function.

Radio holds people, it is said, from Church; because they can hear a better sermon with cigar and slippers, or equivalent. But hearing a sermon is not dedication. It may be a preliminary or guide to dedication, and often is essential. But, except to the disabled, there is no substitute for personal presence at the Lord's service.

If we know that the Will and Purpose of God embraces the truly faithful souls departed from this life, and includes their happiness and growth, we do not seek to change the decisions God has made in respect to their present and future state. Prayer for them must be covered by the great words, "Thy Will be done." Only that can accord with the character of the Church as a dedicated Body. Reserving all Judgment to God according to His command, if we believe a departed soul has been faithful, prayer on his behalf is not changing God but entering into His Will. And if we fear we may be mistaken, we can ask God to purify every prayer His children lift from this darkness. We know that God lets His children cooperate with Him in every good work and purpose. Prayer is not antagonizing the way of God or getting out of Him what He does not will to give. It is cooperating with Him. He loves to have His children do that. If this is prayer, then the Church can pray for the faithful dead. It is amazing to see good people breaking out into wrath in your columns because we are allowed to pray for the dead. How can any one cease to pray for loved ones when they are safe in God's keeping? People say "If safe, Why pray?" Because we can always pray for whatever is the Will of God. Prayer isn't giving God pointers on His duties or adding to His impulses to do good acts. It is the child's loving fellowship with the Father's loving heart, seeking to work with the Father as the Father wills to work. No Father dislikes such a fellowship with his children.

Some of your correspondents are angry about the words in the Communion Service, "And now, as our Saviour Christ hath taught us, we are bold to say, Our Father." They allude to the splendid passage in the Epistle to the Hebrews 4:4-16:

> "Seeing then that we have a great high priest, that is passed into the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast our profession. For we have not an high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin. Let us therefore come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need."

Our people ought to be jubilant over their present right to use this allusion and approach God with this assurance. We ought to learn the passage by heart so we can quote it to those who do not know about it. In a score of printed letters we have read all sorts of comments on this new line in the Prayer Book, including citation of all the forms of ancient liturgies and all the dictionary definitions of the word "Bold." But the one simple and obvious and sufficient explanation, the allusion to the ringing passage in the Hebrews, has not, I believe, ever yet been printed out for any one. Why don't you carry the passage a few weeks on your outside cover in big type so all your readers will see it? Properly featured it may lead to an interest in the Epistle to the Hebrews and suggest to many a parish priest that it would be well to take up with his people the exposition or the study of the Epistle itself.

Unchanged, in the most important respect, for three hundred years, our Prayer Book has continued presenting to our people "The Order for Daily Morning Prayer" and, for Sundays, provision for Holy Communion. Our love of the Church ought to lead us to more use and intimacy with these principal services. With the book in our hands and its praise always on our lips, we have failed to see the absurdity of it all in the light of our use of "Daily Morning Prayer," only about three times a month and the Communion once a month. If any one calls himself a priest and proceeds to use the services daily and weekly just as provided in our Prayer Book, he gets himself marked as a dangerous man! Such is our present standard of devotion and loyalty. It is time there was a change. Troubles are come about us which require of us more devotion and duty-doing in a glad spirit than we have ever before shown in this country. We need more of the Presence, the help, and the inspiration of God our Father, our Lord Jesus Christ and the Blessed Spirit. We can all agree that our Lord's under-priests on earth never can offer any other sacrifice than His, and His cannot be repeated. All we can do, and what we must do, is ourselves to enter into His Sacrifice. For it was offered for us; that we might enjoy the perfect fulfillment of the Father's creative intention. It is for this Purpose that our Holy Communion service from the offertory on is an offering to God; within the scope and power of our Lord's Offering of Himself. It is still ours, and ours now, because now only can we enter or learn to enter into His Offering and so into His Purpose. It strikes me as simply spiritual obstruction to abuse or threaten priests who try to show their people how truly to worship God each Sunday by gathering together in His Name for Holy Communion. It is time we all saw that we can do this with Divine sanction and nothing else that we do has as great sanction. And nothing else has its spiritual possibilities. We ought to repent our neglect and reform our ways. Every hand should be raised and every voice lifted, with willing feet carrying us from our ease or convenience, for Christ's Worship as always our chief and best privilege. We should learn to lose every trace of self in the practice of Worship which centers about the Purpose, the Harmony, the Will, the Guidance, and the Glory of God in the Way of Christ.

BIBLE QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

(Our readers are invited to send in their questions from time to time concerning Scriptural subjects in which they are perplexed or desire light. Our limited space necessitates brevity in questions, as well as in the answers which we will endeavor to maintain in strict accord with the Word of the Lord, which, after all, settles all argument. This column is therefore not for controversy, but for a testimony.)

Question No. 25.—Please name the office or attributes of the Holy Spirit.—S. E. W.

Answer.—The Holy Spirit is recognized as the Third Person of the Trinity and indwells every believer. His work may be classified in brief as follows: Regenerates, John 3:6; Intercedes, Rom. 8:26; Strives, Gen. 6:3; Reveals, John 14:26; Bestows, Gal. 5:22, 23; Seals, Eph. 4:30; Comforts, John 16:7; Empowers, Acts 1:8; Convicts, John 16:8; Guides, John 16:13; Indwells, Rom. 8:9; Restrain, 2 Thess. 2:7. Conditions after receiving, are: "Grieve not," Eph. 4:30; "Quench not," 1 Thess. 5:19; "Walk in the Spirit," Gal. 5:16.

Question No. 26.—Can you favor me with some definite reasons why the Church will not pass through "the great tribulation".—L. E. B.

Answer.—Yes, here are four: (1) God's people were always provided for, when previous ages closed in Judgment. (2) We shall be saved from wrath through Christ, Rom. 5:9. (3) Even Jesus, which delivered us from the wrath to come, 1 Thess. 1:10. (4) For how it will be done, see 1 Cor. 15:51, 52, and 1 Thess. 4:16, 17.

CHINA FAMINE RELIEF.

The Department of Missions has considered at several of its meetings what recommendation should be made to the people of our Church regarding China Famine Relief. The most careful investigation of the whole subject was made. Conference was had with the American Red Cross and with our Bishops in China, in order that the Department might take the wisest action in the case.

There has been no question about the need of relief. The only question was as to the possibility of getting relief to those who needed it most. In response to a cabled inquiry to Bishop Graves, who is a member of the International China Famine Relief Committee in Shanghai, for advice on this question, the Bishop has replied:

> "Need unquestioned. Limited funds can be used in few areas under foreign supervision. Writing."

In view of the information received the Department of missions, at its February meeting, felt that it should emphasize to the clergy and the people of our Church the fact that several million people in China are suffering indescribable privations as a result of present conditions, and that the Department will gladly receive and forward to the Bishop of Shanghai gifts for their relief, to be distributed by him in consultation with such advisers as he may select.

The Southern Churchman will be glad to forward any contributions for this most needy cause.

NATIONAL COUNCIL MEETING, FEBRUARY 12 AND 13

"Splendid things have been happening all through the Church," said Dr. Lewis B. Franklin, Vice-President of the National Council, opening the Council meeting on February 12. He was referring first to the fact, previously reported, that the National Council had received for 1929 the full amount which the dioceses had told it to expect, and $10,853 more. Such a record of collections on pledges, made at a time of financial depression, has not before been equalled. Because of this record, because of strict economy in the Church Missions House, because of inability to operate at full capacity in China, and because of a favorable rate of exchange with China, the Council closes its books for 1929 with an unexpended item of $168,000, to be carried over in 1930.

The Budget.

Turning to the 1930 budget, Dr. Franklin reported that early in January the Council, according to pledges then received, faced the probable necessity of reducing appropriations some $250,000. Since this was made known to the Church, additional gifts and pledges have been received, so that at the time of the Council meeting the amount expected for 1930 from dioceses and individuals is approximately $2,914,000, a figure approaching the Church's previous high record in giving.

The Departments of the Council, to make cuts in the mission field unnecessary, of their own initiative accepted the following reductions in the budgets: Religious Education, $8,550; Missions Administration, $12,800; Publicity, $6,500; Field, $22.547; Finance, $8,350; Social Service, $1,150; Woman's Auxiliary, $3,500.

The death of Bishop Anderson called forth messages of sympathy and appreciation from all parts of the world. The Council's own memorial to him expressed its sense of loss of his brief but strikingly effective leadership.

Minute on Death of The Right Rev. Charles Palmerston Anderson, D. D.

Your Committee, to which the Council committed the preparation of a memorial for the late Presiding Bishop and President of this Council, together with a minute passed by the Department of Missions, begs leave to submit the following report:

1. Memorial:

Again the Church has been bereaved of a Presiding Bishop. Again the National Council laments the loss by death of its Presiding Officer.

The Most Reverend Charles Palmerston Anderson, Doctor of Divinity, fourth Bishop of Chicago, Presiding Bishop of the Church, and President of the National Council, was one of the great prophets and statesmen of the Church. To soundness of judgment, positiveness of conviction and fearlessness of utterance he added the great gifts of tolerance for the opinions of others and modesty and simplicity and humble walking with God.

He loved the Church for which Christ died and threw himself with ardor into the great enterprise of Christian unity. He was the first President of the Commission on Faith and Order. He loved his country and sealed that love with the gift of his only son, who died in the great war. He loved the world, he loved all the peoples of it, he longed to have them know his divine Lord and Master. The mission of the Church to make that Lord available for all the needs of all men in all the world was the supreme passion of his life.

Called but last November to be the President of this Council he entered upon the arduous tasks attached to this high office with characteristic zeal. To those tasks he brought a rich experience, a clear and piercing mind, a powerful and persuasive personality, a quiet courage, and a serene confidence in God. He saw problems clearly, grasped their implications quickly and faced conclusions bravely. Coming into office at a critical time he brought reassurance and renewed courage to the hosts of workers in the field. Calling the whole Church to rise up and meet its responsibility, to go forward and not to retreat, he heard, even in his dying hours, that shout of loyal response which has changed apprehension into hope and bright promise of advance in every field of the Church's work. His term of service as President of the Council was brief, but it was not barren. It was untimely short, but it was touched with the splendor of large accomplishment.

We mourn his death, but we rejoice in his life still among us if beyond us and above us, for

"Surely unto him is given
A life that bears immortal fruit.
In such great offices as suit
The full-grown energies of heaven."

Out of the shadows and unrealities he has entered into light and greater service. To his family and diocese we convey our tenderest sympathy in a loss which we share; but with them we also rejoice in the treasured memory of his gallant life and leadership and pray that unto them and unto us there may be given grace to forward the great cause to which he gave his mind and his heart and his strength and for which he finally laid down his life.

R. I. P.

2. Resolved:

That the above memorial be spread upon our minutes, and a copy of the same sent to the Church press and to the Secretary of the Diocese of Chicago; and that it be suitably engrossed and sent to Mrs. Anderson.

Signed:

Joseph M. Francis.
George Craig Stewart.
Richard I. Manning.

The above was received standing, and adopted unanimously by the National Council on February 12 and 13, 1930.

A memorial, presented by the Department of Missions, was also adopted for Bishop Kinsolving, for nearly forty years Bishop of Southern Brazil, whose death occurred on December 18, since the last Council meeting.

Minute on the Death of Bishop Kinsolving.

The Department of Missions of the National Council, meeting in New York on the eleventh day of February, 1930, and having been informed of the death on December 18, 1929, of the Right Rev. Lucien Lee Kinsolving, D. D., First Bishop of Southern Brazil, puts on record this Minute of appreciation and gratitude:

For forty years, Bishop Kinsolving had been a laborer in South Brazil. Fired by missionary enthusiasm, moved by the needs of its people, he gave himself and gathered around him a small group of like-minded men who gave themselves to service in that distant land. A mission of this Church to a Roman Catholic country was a new adventure in our ecclesiastical procedure and was viewed with anxiety and distrust by many. From the beginning the adventure was justified. By sympathy, broad-mindedness, the manifestation of a truly Catholic spirit, godly living and zeal, the work prospered and developed until the District of Southern Brazil has become a conspicuous evidence of the result of wise and loyal presentation of the Gospel as this Church has received the same.

Rarely gifted, a man of serene faith and high courage, with an attractive personality and a deeply loving nature, Bishop Kinsolving has left an example of heroism and devotion to duty which enriched the Church and for which we render heartfelt thanks to God.

Administrative Reorganization.

Administrative reorganization affecting all the Departments of the National Council centered at the Church Missions House, became effective at the meeting of the Council by the adoption of many features of a report submitted after some months of careful study by a committee of that body, appointed last October to secure greater coordination, cooperation and economy. The report was presented by the chairman of the committee, Bishop Perry of Rhode Island, and was considered by the Council through many hours of executive session.

The reorganization groups the six departments in two divisions. The first of these will include under one administrative office the Departments of Missions, Religious Education, and Social Service. In addition, the present Department of Missions is reorganized into two autonomous sections, Domestic Missions and Foreign Missions. The second division will include under the present vice-president, Dr. Franklin, the Departments of Finance, Field and Publicity. The Presiding Bishop and the executive heads of these two major divisions will form the inner control of the administration of the work of the Council.

The plan cannot be put fully into effect until a new Presiding Bishop has been elected, which it is hoped will be in Chicago on March 26. The election of the new executive officer, to be in charge of the first division above mentioned, and as such the dominant figure in the organized missionary work of the Church, is of so great seriousness that the Council appointed a committee of advice to confer with the new Presiding Bishop on this appointment. This committee consists of Bishop Rogers, Dr. George Craig Stewart and Mr. Walter Kidde.

In its effort toward greater coordination, Bishop Perry's committee has proposed important changes in the Department of Missions, particularly with respect to work which has been conducted by the Foreign-Born Americans Division; the Department of Religious Education, in the regrouping of work and workers; the Department of Christian Social Service, also in the matter of regrouping.

Very considerable economies will be effected by the proposed changes, far more than compensating for the addition of a new executive officer. Details proposing the abandonment of certain work and reduction of staff were resubmitted to the committee for further consideration and will be reported again at the next Council meeting, May 1. The committee's report, which has not been made public, brings nearer to completion the work of the Evaluation Committee provided for by General Convention in 1925. Changes now effective and others under consideration are the outcome of studies begun at that time and indicate the present policy in national administration of continuous study and appraisal of work, personnel, cost, results.

"All the work in the Missions House is of value," say the report of the committee on coordination, "but the duties and responsibilities of some of the officers have become so enlarged that for their own sake and the sake of the work, readjustment is advisable."

The members of the committee, in addition to the chairman, Bishop Perry, are the Rev. Drs. George Craig Stewart and H. Percy Silver, Mr. Samuel F. Houston and Dr. Lewis B. Franklin.

Mr. Walter Kidde Appointed to Council.

The Council has a new member in the person of Mr. Walter Kidde, appointed by Bishop Stearly as Council member from the Second Province, in place of Mr. Tully, resigned. Mr. Kidde is head of a New York engineering firm, a member of St. Luke's Church, Montclair, N. J., a national vice-president of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew. He was recently chairman of the New Jersey State Conference on Social Work. He is a brother-in-law of Mrs. Alfred A. Gilman, wife of the Suffragan Bishop of Hankow. Mr. Kidde was appointed a member of the Department of Religious Education and Publicity, and of the Trust Funds Committee. Bishop Rogers was appointed a member of the Department of Religious Education and Finance.

Rev. C. Leslie Glenn Resigns.

The resignation of the Rev. C. Leslie Glenn, secretary for college work since September, 1927, was accepted with great regret and with an expression of deep appreciation for the notable service rendered by him. His resignation takes effect July 1, 1930. He has accepted a call to Christ Church, Cambridge, Mass. Upon his resignation he is to become vice-chairman of the Department of Religious Education's Commission on College Work.

The Rev. W. Brooke Stabler, now assistant at All Saints' Church, Worcester, Mass., was elected to succeed Mr. Glenn.

Woman's Auxiliary.

The Woman's Auxiliary is to make use of associate secretaries similar to those used by the Field Department, women throughout the country who will serve without salary, giving their services for such time as may be requested, to assist in promoting the general Church program. To provide their expenses, a small appropriation was made from the income of the Emery Fund.

The Council adopted an expression of appreciation for the past thirty years' service of Dr. Wood.

Dr. Wood's Thirtieth Anniversary.

The National Council rejoices to recognize the unremitting and devoted service of Dr. John W. Wood, executive secretary of the Department of Missions, as marked by the recent thirtieth anniversary of his relation to the Church's missionary work. This service has been characterized by unusual devotion and fidelity. Dr. Wood's familiarity with the Church's missionary enterprise, his understanding knowledge of details concerning its work at home and abroad. His clear and consistent judgment as applied to progressive efforts, his sympathetic contacts with missionary bishops and workers, have made him an advisor of exceptional value to his department. His genius as an administrator and his gifts as an exponent of the Church's missionary program give him a unique and outstanding place in the Church's missionary effort. The National Council felicitates Dr. Wood upon his long and remarkable period of service, places on record the deep esteem and affection in which he is held, and expresses the hope that he may long be spared to serve the Church as a leader and counselor.

Resolution on Naval Conference.

Further Council action included the adoption of a resolution, to be forwarded to the Secretary of State in London, affirming the Council's earnest hope and prayer that the Naval Conference will result in substantial limitation and reduction of armament; in increased confidence of the nations one with another; and in consequent lessening of the possibility of war. The resolution was brought in by the Department of Christian Social Service.

Prayer for Sufferers in Russia.

The Department also asked that a special prayer be issued for use in the Church, on behalf of sufferers in Russia. The Council, approving the request, asked the Bishop of Rhode Island to issue such a prayer, with the understanding that it would first be approved by bishops in whose diocese it might be used.

Partial Reimbursement for China Missionaries.

The question of personal losses sustained by members of the mission staff in China as a result of disturbances of 1927 had been before the Council for some time. No reimbursement for these losses had been made. The three bishops in China have advised that from funds in hand in China partial reimbursement could be made. The National Council, in view of the fact that the same conditions in China which caused the losses to the missionaries had also made it impossible to resume much of the work which would have been done under normal conditions, occasioning an unused balance in the China account, felt able to set aside from that account $25,000 for partial reimbursement of those who sustained these losses.

Undesignated Legacies.

The Council was able to make a number of appropriations from undesignated legacies.

Your Committee recommends that the following appropriations be made from the available amount.

North Dakota, Church at Wahpeton	$ 3,000
Southwestern Virginia, purchase of property for school for mountain children (Using, therefore, the legacy of $2,000 from J. C. Davies, of Michigan, given for the improvement and betterment of living and educational opportunities in the South.)	10,000
Wyoming, reconstruction of the mission building, Indian School and dormitory on the Shoshone Reservation, Wind River	2,700
American Church Institute for Negroes (to be distributed as the Trustees of the Institute may determine)	25,000
Brazil, Porto Alegre, parish house for Trinity Church, to cost $18,600 ($13,000 has already been given)	2,500
Haiti, Porto-au-Prince, Episcopal residence, to cost $15,000 ($3,100 has already been given)	12,000
Mexico, Cuernavaca, rest house for members of mission staff, to cost $7,500 ($3,000 has already been given	4,500
Virgin Islands, repairs on Church properties	10,000
Kyoto, X-Ray equipment for St. Barnabas' Hospital, Osaka	5,000
Philippine Islands, Baguio, residence for missionary in charge of Easter School	5,000
North Tokyo, Tsuchiura, land, rectory and parish house (other funds amounting to $3,951 are available in accordance with a recommendation that will be made later in this report)	3,549

Honolulu, reserve for land and buildings to be selected by Bishop of Honolulu in consultation with Bishop Burleson and Dr. Wood	10,000
Arizona, advance for construction of Church of the Good Shepherd, Fort Defiance	1,400
Total	$100,449

Church Intelligence

Statement by the Rt. Rev. H. P. Almon Abbott, Bishop of Lexington.

"In June last I brought the Rev. Julius A. Velasco to the Diocese of Lexington. I knew that his attachment to a Roman Catholic girl in Ellicott City was causing unfavorable comment in that community; comment that was militating against his usefulness as a priest of the Church. As Mr. Velasco had entered the ministry from my parish and had asked me to preach his ordination sermon in Ellicott City in June, 1928, and had often expressed friendship for me, I thought that I would be able to steer him aright and contribute toward his future welfare in the ministry.

"In July and August I had definite conversation with Mr. Velasco, advising him against entering into union with a young lady of another faith, for the sake of his future ministry and for the sake of the happiness of the young lady in question.

Pledge Was Demanded: "On September 7, 1929, I received word from the Standing Committee of the Diocese of Lexington that they would not permit me to ordain Mr. Velasco to the priesthood unless he first signed a written pledge to me that in the event of his marrying a Roman Catholic he would immediately resign his orders. Canonically, my hands were tied in the matter. The Bishop of an Episcopal Diocese can only ordain with the consent of the Standing Committee.

"Mr. Velasco, after some hours' consideration, decided to sign the written pledge. I drew it up and he affixed his signature, in the presence of two ordinands. Accepting the conditions imposed by the Standing Committee, Mr. Velasco was ordered a priest on September 8, 1929. Two days after, Mr. Velasco asked me to use my influence to have the record of the condition effaced from the minutes of the standing committee. I used my influence and the record of the transaction, not the fact of the condition, was effaced from the minutes.

Tells of Plea Made: "The fact could not be effaced, for the ordination had been consummated on the condition. Mr. Velasco's plea was, 'I will abide by your godly admonition and advice in this prospective matter, as in all matters. Between September 8, 1929, and January 16, 1930, I spoke many times to Mr. Velasco upon the inadvisability of a priest of the Episcopal Church marrying a member of the Roman Catholic Church; pointing out that it would be hard for him and hard for the young lady were such a situation created. I also spoke on two occasions to the young lady in question, and to the same effect.

"On January 16 or 17—the date is fixed, for I forwarded a transcript of the conversation on that day to the President of the Standing Committee—Mr. Velasco gave me his solemn personal promise that in the event of his going against my 'godly admonition and advice' in the matter he would 'automatically resign his orders.'

"Since then the event has occurred, Mr. Velasco has been married by a Roman Catholic priest to a practicing Roman Catholic. He has done something unprecedented in the history of the Episcopal Church in this country, and has defiled his ecclesiastical nest. He repudiates his solemn written pledge to the Standing Committee and his personal promise to me, and in the repudiation has behaved with unbelievable insolence to his bishop.

Ordered to Bring Trial: "The Standing Committee, under the legal advice of the chancellor of the diocese and three leading lawyers of Lexington, Kentucky, have ordered me to bring Mr. Velasco to trial. In accordance with the canons when such a request is made, if there be any suspicion of guilt in the mind of the bishop, I am compelled to abide by this request. Mr. Velasco, therefore, will be brought to trial before the ecclesiastical court of the diocese, and the successive steps toward that end are now in process of fulfillment. This is not a case of a bishop persecuting an individual priest. It is a case of corporate, authoritative action of a diocese against a recalcitrant minister who treats his obligations as so many 'scraps of paper.'

"This is not a case of discrimination against the Roman Catholic Church. It is a case of an autonomous Church upholding its dignity and self respect. The Roman Catholic Church can appreciate that, for they have their own autonomy dignity and rules and regulations. In fact, it is from members of that great church of the centuries that I have received the warmest commendation and approval of the action of the Standing Committee and of the Bishop of Lexington."

TO RECTORS OF PARISHES.

Does the Church need more missionary workers in the foreign field? It does. How can the Church send more workers to the foreign field if there is the necessity of cutting the budget, is a question frequently asked. The answer is that though we are not forging ahead in our missionary work, it is necessary to have new workers merely to hold the fort. There are constant needs for replacing those who, for good reasons, retire from the field.

Our present most urgent needs for women are as follows:

Nurses for St. Elizabeth's Hospital, Shanghai; St. Luke's, Tokyo; St. Timothy's Hospital, Cape Mount, Liberia.

Evangelistic workers for Kyoto, North Tokyo and Tohoku, Japan; Baguio, Besao and Upi, the Philippines.

Teachers: A kindergartener for Japan; a rural grade teacher for Porto Rico; a grade teacher for St. Stephen's Chinese School in Manila, and for the Moro girls' school at Zamboanga, Philippine Islands.

We have a most important communication from Bishop Graves, calling for women evangelistic workers for the District of Shanghai.

He also needs a man trained in physical education for St. Paul's University, Shanghai.

We hope to secure the above workers so that they may sail during the coming summer. It will be a great encouragement to the workers in the field if we can do this. To do so will mean that we will have to pull together and make these needs known. In some place in the Church, young people of the right make-up and with sufficient consecration ought to be found. We will appreciate your putting us in touch with any persons interested.

Further correspondence should be addressed to the Rev. A. B. Parson, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

Tenth Annual Institute Church Mission of Help.

Utica, N. Y.—The Tenth Annual Institute of Church Mission of Help, which met in Utica, February 10 to 12, took up, in turn, the three great divisions of Christian social service: the study of the outward facts, the consideration of the mental and emotional elements, and the solving of the spiritual problem, always involved. The part of the social "case worker" is to bring together the material facts; the function of the physician and the psychiatrist is to find the facts as to health of mind and body; the office of the clergyman is to learn what malady is in the soul. All must then work together, to heal the "whole individual," man or woman, girl or boy.

Miss Mary S. Brisley, of the New York Church Mission of Help, opened the discussion of the first topic, with an admirable paper. Miss Brisley made the point that no one of the three or four helpers needed should be the instrument of the others, but that they all should be colleagues. Speakers to this point brought out the truth that each and all are indeed "instruments," but instruments of God. The second topic was presented by Dr. Richard H. Hutchings, State Superintendent of the Utica State Hospital (for the Insane). Dr. Hutchings impressed every one deeply when he said that mental disease, like physical, was often curable if taken in time, but fatal if neglected. He said also that "nervous troubles" were never due to "nerves," but to the emotions. He declared that the best provision for health of mind, body, and soul is a good home, with a good mother and a good father at the head of it. The Very Rev. George L. Richardson, Dean of All Saints' Cathedral, Albany, spoke on the third topic. Dean Richardson said that, until the individual is at peace with God, there is no solution of the problem of life for that person. He urged that the clergy learn more and more not only to wish to give pastoral care, but how to do it.

There was a Mass Meeting in Calvary Church, on Sunday, February 9, which served as introduction to the Institute. At this, the chief address was made by Dr. Charles H. Johnson, Director, State Department of Social Welfare, New York State. He was preceded by the rector, the Rev. D. Charles White. The Rev. Charles N. Lathrop, Executive Secretary, Department of Christian Social Service, the National Council, gave the opening talk of the Institute proper, on Monday evening, at Grace Church, the rector of which is the Rev. Harold E. Sawyer. Dean Lathrop said that the foundation of morals was faith in God; that, until each individual could say with conviction, "I believe in God," that individual could not live the Good Life as God means it to be lived—the life of fellowship with man and communion with God. Each day began with a Celebration of the Holy Communion, and the Institute ended with a Service of Intercession.

Delegates were present from all the dioceses in New York State, and from the two dioceses in the State of New Jersey; also from Connecticut and Chicago. The people of Utica were greatly interested, and services and sessions were very well attended. Bishop Fiske made a fine address at the Tuesday luncheon, when he and Mrs. Fiske were guests of honor; and Bishop Coley made a splendid speech at the Wednesday luncheon when he and Mrs. Coley were guests of honor. Mrs. Theodore Robinson, of Chicago, also spoke on Wednesday. The officers of the National Council of Church Mission of Help were reelected, Mrs. John M. Glenn again being made President. It was, altogether, one of the most successful of the ten annual institutes.

Dr. Glazebrook's Visit to Oregon.

Dr. Glazebrook, continuing his evangelistic tour in the West, sent the folloking report to Bishop Remington of his visit to the District of Eastern Oregon:

When I reached Chico, California, the Rev. Dr. Little informed me that Archdeacon Thomas, of your diocese, desired me to be at Alturas, California, on the night of January 14 and Lakeview, Oregon, on the fifteenth. I wired him that I would make every effort to comply with his request. On the evening of the thirteenth I was at Grass Valley, California, intending to leave there after the evening service, motoring twenty-nine miles over the mountain to catch my train. Unfortunately, a heavy fall of snow, which reached the depth of two feet by the time I was to leave, made it impossible to pass over the road. The next day I took the train from Auburn, finding it necessary to go quite a long distance out of my way, to Reno, Nevada, arriving there on the evening of the fourteenth. I left there at 6:30 the next morning for Lakeview, but by train was delayed five hours by wreck on this route, and I was forced to wire him that it would be impossible to reach this point in time. I, therefore traveled all day and reached Klamath Falls the following morning at eight A. M., where I was met by the Rev. Mr. Joseph Ewing.

January 16, at twelve noon, in company with Archdeacon Thomas, I spoke to thirty-five members of the Kiwanis Club, where I made several very interesting contacts. At eight P. M., I spoke to a group of twenty-five men in the parish hall. Twelve of these were from this parish, the other being from the other churches. A Jew, who was present at the luncheon, came to this meeting and brought three of his Semitic friends with him.

January 17, I was invited to address the Rotary Club. Spoke to sixty-five men. That evening I spent with Mr. Thomas and Mr. Ewing in a very worthwhile conference.

January 18, took the 7:30 A. M. bus for Bend. Motored 156 miles, passed Crater Lake, over the Mountain through the dense pine forest, reaching Bend at 1:30 P. M., and was met by the Rev. Philemon Sturges; having met his father, Dean Sturges of Boston and spoken in his brother-in-law's church at Lee, Massachusetts, we had many things in common. At 8 P. M., he invited several young married couples in to meet me.

January 19 (Sunday), a heavy snow falling all night, and continuing during the day to the depth of two feet, with zero temperature. At 9:30 A. M., I addressed forty children of the Sunday school. At 11 A. M., spoke to his congregation of about thirty-five, about half of these being men. At 6:30 P. M. he arranged for a men's dinner at the hotel, where I addressed sixteen of his men and found them most responsive.

January 10, left Bend 7:30 A. M. Temperature eighteen below zero, arriving at Pendleton about 5:30 P. M. Met by the Rev. Mr. Hinkle. At 8 P. M., spoke in the church to a congregation of fifteen men and about twenty women. A pleasant and profitable after meeting being held. I was then invited to the residence of Mrs. Remington, where I enjoyed a most delightful evening.

January 21, left Pendleton at 10:30 A. M., train being three hours late owing to temperature of thirty degrees below zero, arriving at LaGrande at 1:30 P. M., where I was met by the Rev. Mr. Tennyson. At 6:30 P. M., I attended a men's dinner at the hotel; Bishop Remington and Archdeacon Creasy being present, the Bishop introducing me when I spoke to a group of fifteen very splendid laymen.

January 22, in company with Archdeacon Creasy, we left for Baker, arriving about 11 A. M., and met by the acting rector, a young Church Army man by the name of Thomas Lewis. At 12 noon I addressed the Kiwanis Club of seventy-five men. At eight P. M., in the Church I spoke to ten men and about twenty women. Took the eleven P. M. train.

January 23, arrived 9:30 A. M., at The Dalles, met by the Rev. Mr. Richardson. At twelve noon addressed sixty-five Rotarians at luncheon. At three P. M. in the church spoke to the Women's Guild of twenty-eight, afterwards attending a tea given by this group. At eight P. M., twelve laymen came to the rectory and were much impressed with the challenge which I brought to them; there was a heavy fall of snow at this point with temperature well below zero.

January 24, took the nine A. M. train for Hood River, where I was met by the Rev. Schuyler Pratt. The weather conditions were very severe at this point. He had, however, arranged the general meeting at the parish hall at three o'clock. At that time I spoke to a very interesting group of twelve men and fifteen women. At eight P. M., several came to the rectory for an informal conference.

January 25, I took the 7:30 A. M. train for Portland, arriving at 9:30. Here I was met by Archdeacon Black of the Diocese of Oregon.

Although the weather conditions throughout my visit were the worst for several years, I feel more than satisfied with the result of my visit. Besides the many men addressed at the Civic Club meetings I was in touch with about ninety-five laymen of this district and the clergy. Apparently, they were greatly interested in the challenge to more active cooperating of the laymen in the work of the Church. I explained to them a plan to challenge three men in each parish to a more difficult effort than herebefore attempted; in two of the parishes visited a group of three men were selected and others urged to offer their services to their rector. I took liberty of suggesting to each of the clergy to invite to their homes the week following my visit the men that I had addressed. In order that they might go over the suggestions I made. A line from you to your clergy endorsing such after-meetings I feel will prove beneficial. God bless you for the splendid work you are doing in this field.

Bishop Rowe and the Quota.

Bishop Rowe addresses some plain remarks to his own missionary staff on the subject of the quota. "May I suggest," he says, "that in the coming year, 1930, you will please make it a matter of conscience to raise your offering for the quota as early in the year as possible.

If your people are made acquainted with the quota and what it means, I feel that they well gladly respond. It is a matter of education, a challenge to come to the help of the Lord. Delinquency towards such an object is a crime. There is no place here for indifference or selfishness, as there is no place for discouragement or despair."

Alaska more than met its quota of $1,500 last year, as in the years past.

Conference for Leaders of Boys' Work.

A movement promising much for the future boy life of the Church received a real impetus at the conference called for leaders of boys' work by the National Brotherhood of St. Andrew at Indianapolis, on February 7 and 8. Some forty men, diocesan executives in boys' work, parish leaders, clergy, and national officers of the Brotherhood were in attendance at the meeting, which included representatives from eleven midwestern states.

Believing that before adequate work could be done in presenting the Church to boys, it was necessary for a leader to have some understanding of the boy problem as a whole, the first section of the program was devoted to a consideration of the subject of "The Psychology of Adolescence," with papers in this general field being read by Irwin C. Johnson, Director of Boys' Work for the Diocese of Michigan, on "Understanding the Individual Boy"; Glenn R. Sawyer, Prosecuting Attorney, of Elkhart, Indiana, on "Developing Personality in Boys," and Professor L. C. Gardner, of Lexington, Kentucky, on "The Problems of Boyhood." The discussion following these papers demonstrated the necessity of a thorough understanding of the social environment in which the boy of today grows up, and the place of the parent in the whole process if the Church is ever to do an adequate job.

The second section of the program was devoted to a series of papers on "The Boy and the Church"; the first of these being on the subject of "The Church's Responsibility to the Individual Boy and in Organization," by Dudley McNeil, a young layman of the Diocese of Chicago, who has been active in boys' work. "The Growth and Development of the Religious Idea in the Mind of the Adolescent Boy" was discussed by Leon C. Palmer, the National General Secretary of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew; while the subject of leadership and the various methods of developing it with special reference to the value of camp conferences was covered by the Rev. H. H. Lumpkin, of Madison, Wisconsin.

The concluding section of the series of conferences was devoted to a general discussion of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew as an answer to the problem of integrating our boy life into the Church, and training our boys in leadership for the carrying on of the Church's work. Papers in this section were read by Mr. Johnson; Geo. C. Kubitz, the Executive Secretary for the Junior Brotherhood in the Diocese of Chicago; the Rev. H. C. Dixon, Louisville, Kentucky; the Rev. G. S. Gresham, St. Louis, Missouri, and the Rev. Otis Jackson, Chicago, Illinois. All the conferences were presided over by H. Lawrence Choate, of Washington, D. C., the National President of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, and he directed the discussions which followed the reading of each paper.

The conference, after its deliberations issued a series of recommendations, which begin with the peramble: "As a result of the deliberations of this conference we have been deeply impressed with the vital importance for work with youth in the Church. We are convinced that the importance of such work has not been sufficiently recognized in the Church at large—evinced by the lack of young leadership, and we are of the opinion that only through adequate provision for this work can we hope to meet the present needs of the Church today and develop this leadership commensurate with the opportunities confronting us. Recognizing to the fullest the contributions to boy life made by various secular organizations, such as the Boy Scouts and other agencies in areas of experience other than the spiritual, we are of the opinion that in our work with boys the Church needs at this time an organization with definite religious objectives, specialized for boys, simple in program, and capable of adaptation to various conditions. For this reason we commend the Junior and Advanced Junior Brotherhood of St. Andrew to the careful consideration of our Bishops, clergy, and other parish leaders."

Other definite recommendations which the conference issued had to do with the suggestion that the various dioceses of the Church be encouraged to incorporate into their diocesan organizations a commission or a department solely devoted to the consideration of the boy problem in the Church; that the National Brotherhood be requested to make available to leaders of boys throughout the Church a special study of the problems of adolescence and their relations to the Church's work; that the place of camping as an educational project in developing ideals and training leadership should be recognized, and that the Brotherhood be responsible for calling together the leaders of Church camps in the United States for a conference, both in the interest of extending the camp movement throughout the Church and for developing certain common objectives leading to the furtherance of the Church's work.

The conference also urged attendance of older boys throughout the country at the National Junior Brotherhood Convention to be held at Oberlin College, August 26-29, 1930.

It is planned to extend the number of these leaders' conferences to be held next year.

Hebrew Christian Publication Society.

The sixteenth annual meeting of the Hebrew-Christian Publication Society was held on January 29, at the vestry room of St. Thomas' Episcopal Church, Fifty-third Street and Fifth Avenue, New York City. Dr. Brooks, presiding, was reelected president for the ensuing year. Mr. William Albert Harbison, vice-president; Col. Howard Caswell Smith, treasurer, and the Rev. Kenneth Mackenzie, who served in the capacity of treasurer and secretary, has been elected secretary of the Society. Mr. B. A. M. Schapiro, Managing Director was reelected to the same office. The following committees were appointed by the president:

Finance Committee—Mr. William Albert Harbison (chairman), Mr. Thomas P. Browne, Jr., Mr. William Phillips Hall.

Publication Committee—Dr. Ludlow S. Bull (chairman), the Rev. John F. Fraser, D. D., the Rev. Duncan J. Macmillan, D. D., the Rev. Dr. George E. Sehlbrede, D. D.

There was a large attendance of Directors. Mr. Schapiro, the Managing Director, who may be remembered by the readers of the Southern Church for have appeared from his pen in the Southern Churchman, has been very ill during 1929. He is fully recovered now, and is able to resume his work for the Society. The new office of the Society is 664W Two Hundred and Seventh Street, New York City.

Use the Extension Library.

Do you know that the National Council conducts an Extension Library for people who are isolated by distance or illness from Church instruction?

If you would like to avail yourself of this privelege the simple rules to be observed follow:

Rules.

1. Books may be borrowed for one month and renewed for another month, if desired, by writing to The Extension Library, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

2. The only charge will be the cost of postage in sending the books to you, which you are asked to refund in stamps when returning the books.

Copies of the list of books obtainable will be sent as requested. Additional lists of new books will be sent from time to time as they are added. Keep the lists together for reference. If you do not find the kind of books you need, listed, write to the Librarian who may be abye to secure them for you.

Any voluntary contribution will be used for the purchase of new books. Books may also be given, if approved by the Librarian, as designated memorials. Books given in this way would be especially appropriate for the new Children's Lending Library for children who are isolated by distance or illness from Church instruction.

First English Church Service in America to be Commemorated.

Plans have been completed for the erection of a beautiful gateway "in memory of Virginia Dare, the first white child of English parentage to be born in America," at the site of Old Fort Raleigh, on Roanoke Island.

This is to be paid for by a U. S. Government appropriation of $2,500. The detailed plans have been completed through the efforts of the Roanoke Colony Memorial Association, which was organized in 1894 and has operated under charter since that year to establish a shrine at the site of the Sir Walter Raleigh colony in Dare County. The organization was and still is, largely composed of faithful Episcopalians who have sought to receive recognition for, and preservation of the first Protestant colony in the New World and especially for the first recorded performance of any service of the Protestant Church for an English speaking person—the baptism of Virginia Dare.

The Association owns sixteen and one half acres of land surrounding the Fort Raleigh site and, in 1896, placed there the beautiful monument which stands today, on the shore of the calm blue waters of Roanoke Sound, where the little body of Englishmen and women who landed there August 5, 1587, found harbor and abundant promise of great good fortune.

Less than a quarter of a mile westward of the shore and midway of the association's property frontage on the State Highway, soon there will be in place a beautiful gateway to mark the entrance of the road to America's oldest landmark set up by English speaking persons.

The following are the inscriptions, which have been approved for the memorial tablets on the highway side of the gateway pillars:

For the North pillar:
To
Sir Walter Raleigh's
1584—Colonists—1587
Whose Friend and Guide Was
The Indian
Manteo
Christened and Called
Lord of Roanoke and Pasamonguepeuk
11 August, 1587
In Reward of His Faithful Services

For the South post:
To Virginia Dare
First Born of the English in America
Near By this Place
Born 18th and Baptized 20th August
1587
And Then Vanished With These Colonists.

It is with peculiar and fitting pride that North Carolinians see the placing of a memorial to those pioneers and Virginia Dare by the nation on North Carolina soil. Credit is due the Roanoke Memorial Association and to Bishop Cheshire, to Dr. Drane, to Congressman Lindsay Warren, and to Mr. Alexander B. Andrews, who has succeeded Bishop Cheshire as President of the Memorial Association, in particular for the very definite part they have taken in bringing this to pass.

DELAWARE.

Rt. Rev. Philip Cook, D. D., Bishop.

A Beautiful Memorial Dedicated.

On Sunday, February 9, the Saulsbury window and reredos just erected in St. Paul's Church, Georgetown, Del., were dedicated by the Bishop of the diocese, assisted by the Rev. Samuel D. Van Loan, a former rector, and the Rev. Martin Bram, the present minister-in-charge. The window is the gift of the late Senator Saulsbury in memory of his sister, Miss Margaret Saulsbury, both of whom were parishioners. It was formally presented by the trustees of the estate, Judge Hugh Morris and Victor Wolley.

The window is a product of the studios of James Powell and Sons, of London, and was designed by Mr. James H. Logan. It is fittingly called the Te Deum window, for in it this beautiful canticle is pictured in detail.

As the congregation stands facing this window, singing the most ancient of Christian hymns, the Creed-Anthem, called the Te Deum, the whole scene is a glorious accompaniment to the worship of our Blessed Lord.

This window is but one of four provided for in the bequest of Senator Saulsbury, the others having been placed in Trinity Church, Wilmington, Christ Church, Dover, and the Church of St. John the Baptist, Milton. All are the work of the same firm and are among the finest specimens of stained glass work in this country.

Baltimore Laymen Stir Countryside In Delaware.

An opening gun hit its mark when three Baltimoreans, one a clergyman and two laymen, addressed a gathering in the old St. James' Church, Stanton, Delaware, February 5, by invitation of the rector, the Rev. Ernest A. Rich. The meeting was sponsored by three laymen of the parish, Messrs. W. Truston Boyce, Alonzo Newlin and Edmund Mitchell. The general subject of the addresses was "My Church and Myself." A deep impression was made upon the community, which was well represented by citizens of all denominations.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. H. St. George Tucker, Bishop.

Financial Situation for 1930.

The total diocesan budget for 1930 was estimated at $194,000, including the General Church quota, the Diocesan Missionary Society quota, and all other expenses of the diocese.

General Church	$48,000
D. M. S.	73,250
Church Schools	50,000
Various Diocesan Boards, etc.	22,750

The total acceptances to date by the various parishes of the diocese as a result of the Every Member Canvass amount to $158,000. This would mean an indirect cut of 25 per cent on all the various items. Therefore, a committee has been formed with the Rev. Beverley D. Tucker, D. D., as Chairman, to make a special effort to raise a sufficient amount to balance the budget or at least to secure sufficient funds to pay the salaries of the missionaries without a cut. Also special committees have undertaken to see the vestries of all the parishes, which did not accept the full tentative quota.

The Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese will undertake to raise a certain amount. Every congregation in the diocese has been asked to give the Easter offering as a free-will offering over and above the parish quota to pay the salaries of the Church's missionaries and other workers.

A most encouraging response has been received from every section of the diocese to this effort to support and carry on the Church's work.

Already one church in promising the Easter offering for this purpose has guaranteed $1,000 and hopes to have more to give. Quite a number of others have already promised, and it is hoped every church in the diocese will take part in this way.

It is understood, of course, that the Easter offering does not include the mite box offering of the Sunday schools, which is already designated for missions under the quota.

Sufficient special gifts for the diocesan quota for the work of the General Church have been received in cash or pledges to justify the committee in accepting as the diocesan quota a sum of $42,000, instead of the cut of 25 per cent to $36,000. The diocese has, therefore, accepted a quota for general Church work this year the same as 1929.

Diocesan Institute: A well-attended institute for the training of leaders among the women workers of the diocese was held in the Mayo Memorial Church House, Richmond, February 12, 13, 14.

Of outstanding interest was Miss Laura Boyer's discussion of the "Jerusalem Conference," a stereopticon lecture on the mission to the Arapahoe Indians by the Rev. A. A. Hastings and the Rev. Robin Chen's address on China.

Bishop Tucker, on Friday, told of the meeting of the National Council, from which he had just returned.

Here and There In the Diocese.

The usual winter activities throughout the See-city and diocese apparently leave scant leisure for reports; but several items bespeak interest: The Cathedral Year-Book is at hand, with its tabulated totals exceeding $59,000 as its record of widely dispersed expenditure. St. George's Parish, the Rev. T. S. Kell, rector, after a long period of many conflicting obstacles to progress, sends forth a clarion note of brave hope and determination for the coming year. Under the oversight of the Rev. W. F. Rennenberg, minister-in-charge, the Mission at Grahamton, with its newly-dedicated chapel, is realizing its hopeful vission with regular services conducted each Sunday by a corps of faithful lay-readers. Following serious injury by fire to the church at Lyndon, the Advent offerings of the Church Schools were devoted to this point, amounting to nearly six hundred dollars. Mr. Joseph Califf, one of our younger Churchmen, is giving valuable service here, as Superintendent of the Church School. Grace Church, Hopkinsville, not long since bereaved of its beloved rector, the Rev. George C. Abbitt, is rejoicing under the new leadership of the Rev. W J. Gaither, and looks forward to enlarged and rapidly growing activity. Pre-Lenten energy is already in evidence in many parishes busy with programs foretelling concentration of aim and purpose in devotional and personal service. The following list of names chosen as noon-day speakers, promise a season of helpful interest, not only for our Church people, but for an ever-increasing participation on the part of fellow Christians throughout the community: the Rt. Rev. C. E. Woodcock, March 6, 7; during successive weeks, the Rev. Wm. C. Cravner, Biltmore, N. C., the Rt. Rev. H. P. Almon Abbott, Lexington, K., the Rt. Rev. Warren L. Rogers, Cleveland, Ohio, the Rt. Rev. Derwyn T. Owwen, Bishop of Niagara, the Rt. Rev. Robert E. L. Strider, Bishop-Coadjutor of West Virginia.

The Indian Mission Burned.

The many persons in various parts of the United States who are interested in the work being done at Christ Mission in Amherst County, Virginia, about six miles from the town of Amherst, will be distressed to learn that the church and mission house were destroyed by fire at about 10 A. M., on Sunday, January 19. Miss Brightside Webb Savage was alone at the mission when the fire was discovered and the flames made such rapid headway that practically nothing was saved. Miss Savage lost all of her personal effects with the exception of a very little clothing.

The fire originated on the inside of the mission house and evidenty was caused by a spark from a defective flue.

In the fall of 1929, Miss Savage succeeded Miss Ella Pier who resigned after several years of faithful service as the missionary at this point. In the few months she has been in residence she has done excellent work and the loss of the buildings is a serious blow to the mission. It is probable that during the coming months, Miss Savage will board in the neighborhood and conduct her mission work in the school house, located just across a small stream from the buildings, which were burned.

The mission house was built a number of years ago with funds contributed by the students of Sweet Briar College, only a few miles distant.

The work at this point, which since its organization has been known as "The Indian Mission," is rather unique in its character; the people served by the mission being of a racial type not often found in this section of the United States. The missionary in charge serves under the general supervision of the Rev. Thomas D. Lewis, D. D., of Amherst, in whose parish Christ Mission is located.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., Bishop

Brotherhood of St. Andrew.

The Annual Corporate Communion of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, on Washington's Birthday, will take place on Sunday, February 23, at 8 A. M., in Washington Cathedral, with Bishop James E. Freeman, the celebrant.

Following this service, the Junior members will take breakfast at St. Alban's, the National Cathedral School for Boys, at 9:15 o'clock, and this will be followed by a Junior conference to be held at Satterlee Memorial Hall of St Alban's Parish Church, when the innovation of having boy speakers discuss religious problems and opportunities in their own way will be introduced.

Davis Caldwell, of St. Margaret's Parish, will speak on "A Boy's Lent," and William Hendrix, of St. Paul's Parish, Rock Creek, and Stephen B. Lee, of St. Stephen's and the Incarnation will discuss "Lenten Opportunities." The principal address to the boys will be delivered by Right Rev. Samuel B. Booth, Bishop-Coadjutor of Vermont.

The Senior members of the Brotherhood will take breakfast in the refectory of the College of Preachers' Building, where they will begin their conference at ten o'clock. The Rt. Rev. Philip M. Rhinelander, warden of the College of Preachers, will lead a discussion on "A Man's Lent," and William C. Sturgis, of the staff of the College of Preachers, will speak on "Lenten Opportunities."

The final hour of the conference will be devoted to the general theme, "The Churchman and His Neighbor," with addresses by Busey H. Howard, President of the Laymen's Service Association; Harold Brown, V. Ward Boswell and the Rt. Rev. Henry St. George Tucker, Bishop of Virginia.

Reservations may be made through H. Lawrence Choate, National President of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, at 925 Fifteenth Street.

Wedensday Evening Lectures.

The series of Wednesday evening lectures, which were begun in St. Alban's Church, January 15, under the auspices of St. Alban's Parish Church, and the Washington Cathedral College of Preachers, will continue through the Lenten Season.

A splendid list of speakers have been heard and are booked for future dates. The Rt. Rev. Arthur C. A. Hall, Bishop of Vermont, lectured February 19, on the subject, "How to Make Use of Lent," and Dr. F. S. Fleming, rector of St. Stephen's Church, Providence, R. I., will speak February 26, on "How to Use the Sacraments." Dr. Fleming has recently accepted the call to become vicar of the Chapel of the Intercession of old Trinity Parish, in New York City, succeeding the Very Rev. Milo H. Gates, recently installed as dean of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine.

WEST VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. L. Gravatt. D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. R. E. L. Strider, D. D., Coadjutor.

The Northwestern Convocation of the diocese met in Christ Church, Clarksburg, February 10-12, the session taking the form of a Retreat with the Rev. McVeigh Harrison, O. H. C., as director.

Several of the clergy were unavoidably absent, but those attending found these brief hours apart exceedingly helpful and inspiring. The Convocation directed the secretary to present a resolution to Mr. Harrison, expressing appreciation and gratitude for his gracious service.

I WANTED TO REST.

William Allen Ward.

I was weary of toil,
My bones ached and
My nerves cried out,
For I was very tired;
I wanted to rest
For an age I thought,
But I could not stop,
For I had to work
To get bread and meat,
For there was the wife
And the little ones—
At last the time came
When I could rest,
For my toil had made
Me great wealth—
But I was not tired!

An Old Lady's Hymn Book.

G. W. H.

"This world is made for young people." I thought this remark was made rather sadly by a gentleman nearing his seventieth birthday. Another said seriously, but sadly: "I have lived long enough to testify that we need not fear old age."

No doubt we have a natural fear of old age and death. But—this fear can be overcome!

I opened my hymn-book this morning and played the hymn: "Guide Me, O Thou Great Jehovah"; and memory took me back to the days of a happy, carefree childhood. "Pilgrim through this barren land." I sang it then, but how little I knew of deserts and difficulties and red seas. I recited in Sunday school the history of the children of Israel, their wanderings in the desert, the bread of heaven that fed them daily, the pillar of fire and the pillar of cloud that led them. I thought it was history of the chosen people. And it was. But I know now that it is also my history. And I remember all the way that God has led me to humble me and to prove me and to keep me walking in His way. I see that the story of the desert and the pillar and the daily manna is the story of the individual Christian. And so without sadness, I look ahead to the Promised Land.

No doubt the young look with real compassion on the old; and their little attentions are gratefully received. But the old have their compensations. The battle of life has been fought. Victory at times, defeat at times, mistakes often that one could correct, if only one could return and live life over.

But we have peace, learned. Now, not much remains to do. To love, to trust, to pray—we, the aged, can always do that.

And we are not appointed to die. Rather to live! For eternal life is given us even here and now if we believe in our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ.

"Guide me, O Thou great Jehovah,
Pilgrim through this barren land,
I am weak, but Thou art mighty;
Hold me with Thy powerful hand,
Bread of heaven, Bread of heaven
Feed me till I want no more!"

Blessings in Disguise.

A writer of some renown has said, "It is found in farming that the removal of small stones which frequently encumber the fields does not always increase the crop. In many soils they are an advantage, attracting the moisture and radiating the heat. Around these stones you will find the largest berries. In an experiment made in England the result of removing the stones was so unfavorable to the crop that they were brought back and spread over the ground. We often cry to God, like Paul, for the removal of some thorn in the flesh. Later experience teaches us that it was better for it to remain. We may learn the sufficiency of grace and glory even in our infirmities."

God makes our infirmities means of grace if we are driven to feel our need and apply to Him for more grace. We prosper best where we have just enough difficulty to keep us much on our knees. In eternity we will thank God for our infirmities, if we have made them the occasion of obtaining more grace.—Wesleyan Methodist.

A Saint of the Congo.

Baraweni, the greatly beloved of all our missionaries, and the best of all our evangelists! After a time of patient suffering, during which he never ceased to witness for Christ, he has been called to higher service. He was called by grace in the early days of the work of the Heart of Africa Mission. He responded to the call and yielded his life to the proclamation of the Gospel to the people from whom he had been gathered out. The following account has been written by Mrs. Alfred Buxton of Baragweni as she knew him.

Baragweni came into our lives in the early days of Nala, 1916, and he came to stay. I remember the first time I saw him. We had not long settled in our first home. There had been much talk of Baragweni, but he was away when I arrived in Nala. Then he came —one morning I found him on our verandah. He was of unprepossessing appearance with an untidy sort of face; his skin pitted as if with smallpox, and I wondered why every one had been saying—Baragweni this and Baragweni that . . . and wait till you see Baragweni, etc. But under that disappointing exterior there was a heart of gold. And a heart of gold is never worn on the sleeve—it takes time to find it.

The days and months went by, and somehow we all seemed to turn to Baragweni for everything. Two lady missionaries go to a native village for a week's meetings, Baragweni must go as escort; there is a difficult bit of work to be done with a neighboring chief. Baragweni must take the message. He was the friend of every missionary, one of God's true gentlemen. So on the night when Sambo died, our first convert, and Elder of Nala Church, we all turned to Baragweni—"Of course there was Baragweni"—so he became, without any question, the leader of the Nala Community.

He must have been near forty when he was converted. The incidents of his conversion I do not remember; but the surprising thing was that a man of his age should learn to read.

I said to him once, "How is it, Baragweni, that you can read, and these fellows in Class I, much younger than you, cannot even grasp aeiou?" "Ah!" he replied, "it was this way, I used to smoke hemp . . . and it makes your eyes go zaba-zaba—nothing you look at stays still—and I went to school at two o'clock and the 'A' used to be dancing this way, and 'E' would be dodging that way, and I never could keep track of them, so far a long time I never moved out of Class I. Then one day I realized it must either be hemp smoking or reading, and I determined it should be the reading of God's Word. Twelve o'clock came and, instead of lighting my pipe as usual, I got up and walked to a sheltered place behind my hut. Here I knelt down and said, 'O God take away this desire to smoke, and help me to read Thy Word'." He said he got up from his knees, and the desire left him from that time—he never again took up his pipe. Two o'clock found him in school, and for the first time he saw a e i o u all steady on the board, and with triumph he added: "And I was out of Class I in a week!"

Once I saw him angry. At the end of a market day in Nala a shindy broke out along one of the roads over a bowl of wine. A market row was always an unpleasant excitement; you never knew where it would end, with twelve different tribes at least represented, and six hundred natives congregationed together. The missionaries were sent out to guard the roads so as to keep the crowd from increasing. A new missionary recognizing Baragweni, barred his road and would not let him by. His indignation at being kept from his white man's side while he was in danger knew no bounds; he was inconsolable. No explanation was of any avail, and we had to leave him to go back to his hut and let time heal it.

I have many pictures of Baragweni; he stands and leads in prayer at the Friday night prayer meeting, so quiet, so humble in his approach to God—just a silhouette of him as he stands against the light of the fire—lifting us up to God in prayer. Or again, he is preaching in the Nala Church on a bright Sunday morning, pouring out the thoughts which had given him, may be in that same sheltered spot behind his house where he had found such wonderful deliverances.

It was an inspiration to hear him expound the Word. Every morning about 5:30, or as soon as it was light, he might be seen sitting by a fire outside the door of his house reading his Bible. He had a great love for God's Word, and this was the secret of the life he lived.

Taking an evening stroll round the compound, we pass his house. There he sits by the fire, out in the open, with his wife, her loud voice and rough ways seem a contrast to his quiet, Spirit-filled life. We read of the Saviour that "as He prayed the fashion of His countenance was changed," and it is the same with His followers. Contact with Jesus can change the ugliest, sin-stained face and give it a refinement, a strength, and a transparent honesty, which is most remarkable.

And how unselfish he was! The Poko Elder got disgruntled because his pay was not large enough to provide him with shoes—he must have shoes. Baragweni goes to his precious box. See him take out his only pair of shoes and send them to him.

The last picture is the best of all. A quiet night under the stars, a little company round the fire. I hear the strains of an old banjo and they sing—

Only trust Him, only trust Him now,
He will save you, He will save you now—the tilt of his head upward, and his eyes looking out beyond the palm trees and the starry sky, to the very gate of heaven.

Yes, Baragweni did what many of us failed to do; he, a black man, lived as he prayed. What he sang by the firelight, he carried out next morning. Yes, his heart trusted in Him and he was helped; helped through the long, long march; helped in his temptations and through the days of trial and difficulties; helped when he came to pass over to the Other Side. Now he rejoices with many another who had gone on before, in the City which hath no need of the sun, neither of the moon, to shine in it, for the glory of God lightens it, and the Lamb is the Light thereof.—Selected.

God of the Starry Night.

"O God, whose wisdom speaketh in the order of the Universe, who hast set the stars in their places, and who tenderly guidest the littlest insect that crawls upon the earth.

"Thy love rises higher than the firmament and Thy sympathy is deeper than the depths of the sea. Thou rejoicest greatly in our gladness and Thy tenderness shall accompany us through the depths of our anguish.

"Thy harmony is beauty and Thy riches are when man, for Thy sake, serves his fellowman. We bless Thee for all that Thou hast done for us in the past and we glorify Thee for whatsoever Thou has prepared for us in the future, lest when we meet joy we may forget Thee and when we meet sorrow we may not see Thy hand leading us.

"Thou hast bidden us to Thy Table and there Thou hast touched us with Thy very life. Thou hast looked not upon our short-comings but upon our necessities, and Thou hast joyfully bestowed upon us more than we did think to ask.

"As the sun warmeth the earth and calls it to blossom and as the rain maketh it to be fruitful, even so Thy love shining on our hearts calls us to high endeavor, and Thy life touching our lives shall enable us to be fruitful in Thy service.

"Thy people are weak, but Thou art strong for them; they are poor, but Thou art rich for them. Thou laborest for Thy children by night and by day, and though they wander from Thy paths yet art Thou ever preparing fresh ways by which they may approach Thee.

"Thy door is ever open and Thy love is ever bidding us enter.

"Without Thee, O Lord, we are as the sand of the desert, which the wind tosseth about and it knows not whence it came and cares not whither it goeth and it bringeth forth food neither for man nor beast.

"But when Thou hast touched us we shall become as the fertile ground on which Thou mayest bring forth abundant fruit to nourish those who dwell there and to make glad the hearts of those who pass thereby."—H. K., in Canadian Churchman.

I Hate War.

I hate war.

I hate war because I know its folly—I have watched it waste the substance of the world.

I hate it with terror—the terror of one who has known the sting of its torture and the frenzy of its fear.

I hate it with passion—the passion of one who has held its dying against his breast.

I hate its disillusionment—the disillusionment of one who has gathered up its bloody fragments and remembered its broken promises.

I hate it with agony—the agony of one who has sons to be numbered and daughters to be offered should its guns grow hungry again.

I hate war

I hate it for the crimson bubbles on all seas for the poisoned breath it gives to the wings of the wind and for its fences of skulls that girdle the globe.

I hate it for the men it maims—bodies mutiliated, eyes blinded, limbs severed, faces that shut forever behind masks.

I hate it because of the young men it splits upon bayonets and scatters like offal across continents sown to passion and watered with blood.

I hate it because of the child it orphans and the bride it widows.

I hate it because of the betrothed it leaves unmated, the father it makes sonless, and the mother it robs of the fruit of her womb.

I hate it because of the unborn slain in the loins of the potential fathers it destroys.

I hate it because of the evil passion it unleashes to feed upon the innocent.

I hate it because of the virgins it casts to the lions of lust.

I hates war.

I hate it for its ruined cities, hate it for its polluted rivers, hate it for its desecrated altars.

I hate it for the good-will it destroys, the truth it perverts, the lie it exalts, the murder it decorates, the brotherhood it despoils and the black damp of suspicion it hangs over all the lounlils of man.

I hate war—but I believe; believe that the song of the angels above Bethlehem is a prophecy; believe that right is ultimate might; believe in the fatherhood of God, in the brotherhood of man, and have cast the anchor of my faith behind the Prince of Peace.

I hate war and I believe. And because I both hate and believe, I hear the trumpet of the dawn when nations shall beat their swords into ploughshares, their spears into pruning hooks, and when men shall learn war—No more forever.—Daniel A. Poling.

A Christian man once said, "I have been seeking that blessing for about thirty years." "Brother, it is nearly time you got it then," was the swift rejoinder. And the writer of the story then remarks, "For all these thirty years that man was crying, 'O God, give—give—give!' While God in His wondrous grace had been bending over him and saying, 'Oh, my child, take—take—take!'"

Carry religious principles into common life, and common life will lose its transitoriness.—Caird.

TO THE NEW CRUSADERS.

Lo, in the east the sunrise!
Reveille sounds today;
You have your marching orders;
Your Captain leads the way.

Your foes are strong—and deadly,
The weapons that they wield,
But every point is blunted
In contact with Faith's shield.

Ah, not in noise of battle,
Or shriek of shot and shell,
The victory of the Lord is won
Against the powers of hell.

On shining heights of heaven
Angelic warders keep
Their holy watch, while over all
The eyes that never sleep.

Follow the mighty conflict,
Till, with the victory won,
Your Captain, Christ, acclaims you,
Soldiers of mine: "Well done!"

Panyam's Leopard.

Panyam was a little girl of thirteen living in Africa. She once came out at the head of her class for attendance at the small local Sunday school, and her unbroken record meant no easy thing. She was brought up to work hard from sunrise till the great fiery ball "fell asleep under the earth." Once or twice a week she had to go about ten miles into the "bush" for firewood. This took up the whole day, but, even, when she got home at night, she must help her mother cook the evening meal for her father and brothers. Then the corn must be ground for tomorrow's breakfast, and the days she did not go to the "bush" were spent in hoeing the garden with the heavy baby on her back.

It was the singing of a Christian hymn by one of the neighbor's children that caused Panyam to resolve to go to Sunday school.

"Ayo," she said, "how do you make your voice wriggle up and down like that?"

"Easy! Easy!" said Ayo with a proud toss her little fuzzy head, "You should hear our teacher! Why, Panyam, you should come and be taught, you have such a big voice."

Now, her voice was the pride of Panyam. Every one told her it was extra good, and certainly it was unusually loud and strong for a small girl. From that day forward, Panyam was eaten up with the desire to sing like Ayo, and she did not mind what she did, as long as she could get to Sunday school to learn the "wriggly tune," as she called them. It was a terrific scramble to get her work done so as to get off to the school, but Panyam had a will that about matched her voice.

"Our eldest daughter is singing all those Foreign Jesus songs," said Panyam's granny one day to her mother. "By and by she will become lazy, proud, and rebellious. She will despise her parents, and tell us we ought to keep the hut cleaner and be washing ourselves all the time. Be warned in time and stop her going, or bitter fruit will spring up in the home."

Panyam's mother agreed; she was ignorant and believed all the witch doctor told her about the evils of "the Foreign way." She did not, however, immediately forbid her daughter to attend the Sunday school; perhaps she felt the little girl's will might find a way.

Instead she chose Sunday as the day for Panyam to go to the "bush," knowing well she could never get home till evening.

Panyam pretty well guessed the reason, and saw it would be of no use to protest or beg for permission to go another day. She had grown not only to sing many "wriggly hymn tunes," to her satisfaction, but she had also acquired a childlike faith in God. Therefore, Panyam prayed earnestly for some "little pathway to open up through the jungle of her difficulty.' She also set her nimble wits to work.

She was rather popular in her village, and some of the younger children were fond of her. She would sing to them when she was hoeing the garden, and she was always smiling and never bad-tempered. So when she asked them to go with her to the "bush" and help her to get more grass and fuel on Saturday afternoons, they thought it a great advenure, and willingly agreed. Panyam had also won a much coveted red bead necklace as a prize for attendance at Sunday school, and this was to be lent out for so many days to all who came and helped her.

Her mother said nothing when the usual supply of wood was brought in on Saturday night. She was secretly proud of her daughter's clever ways, but she dared not oppose Granny, who was a powerful old dame, whom none dare offend for the peace of the family.

One evening when Panyam and two other little girls were very busy cutting the tall grass, they heard a terrible roar like a leopard's from the jungle close beside them. The children screamed, and, dropping their hooks, they tore away home as if not one but a hundred wild beasts were after them! Only Panyam stood still, her eyes full of terror, yet unwilling to run away without the all-important fuel. She tried to calm her fears and go on with her work.

"It may not come here at all. If I make a fire and keep shouting it will likely be scared." So, quick as lightning, she struck two flints together and set a bundle of the grass and twigs alight. But alas! this leopard wanted something more than that to frighten him away, and the noise of his approach came, still nearer. He was almost in sight, when Panyam, who had carefully marked a tall banyan tree near by, made a flying leap, and swung herself safely up on a topmost branch.

The leopard, a curious starved looking animal, so undersized that it looked as if it had never enjoyed a single decent meal in its life, paused at the foot of Panyam's retreat. She was singing now at the very top of her voice to keep her courage up, and was also hoping to attract any one who might be near. In her heart she kept praying God to save her, and she fully believed that in some wonderful way He would.

Somehow the leopard did not seem so dreadful now that he was so near. Panyam, in the strangest way, seemed to have suddenly lost all fear of him. In fact, she could almost have laughed at him, only she thought perhaps she had better not, especially as he seemed to be thinking about climbing the tree.

Suddenly a shot rang out from the jungle, and in a flash the leopard seemed to wriggle right out of his skin, which he toosed away and ran for his life with a cry of human terror!

Panyam was so astonished that she slid down to the ground with a cry of surprise. Then, in a moment, she understood everything! Her mischievous brother Dakum had likely been bribed by Granny to disguise himself in an old leopard's skin which her father was waiting to sell. Well, their plan of frightening her had not achieved its purpose.

As Panyam was chuckling to herself while she was gathering up her bundles of twigs a European appeared through the jungle.

"Seen a leopard about here?" he asked. "I am sure I caught sight of one just about this spot."

"Oh, Great Excellency, it was only this skin which my father desires to sell. Please follow me home, and if you want to buy it he will talk a proper price."

Now, the young sportsman was extremely anxious not to sail to America without some such trophy, and he was prepared to pay for the skin so generous a sum that Panyam was praised and congratulated by every one on her sharp wits.

"Let the girl go to Sunday school," said her father. "It gives her courage and teaches her many useful things. Any one will be glad to swallow her Foreign flavor if she continues to act with such ability."—A. O. Stott, in S. S. Times.

Washington's Faith.

At this time when the memory of the nation turns to the man who was so large and heroic a figure in its first era, and to whom its debt of gratitude will ever remain so large, it is both pleasant and helpful to remember that among the sterling qualities for which Washington is held in honor, not the least was his strong and unswerving Christian faith.

Taught by a Christian mother, Washington's religion, deep and unobtrusive, as was the nature of the man, was from boyhood to death part of his daily life. It strengthened and sustained him in every hour of trial, and kept him brave, sincere and uncorrupted in the time of depression, of temptation and of power.

As a young man, but little over twenty, when about to join the ill-fated command of Braddock, he wrote to his mother, who, motherlike, feared for him to take the risk, "The God to whom you commended me, when I set out on a more perilous errand, defended me from all harm, and I trust He will do so now." And his letters and journals and actions through life showed that he never lost that unfaltering trust, a trust that nerved him for great undertakings, and gave him confidence to meet grave dangers.

Washington was reverent of everything that was sacred. The impression that the profane use of the name of God made upon him is shown by this order issued while he was Commander-in-Chief of the Army:

"Headquarters, Moore's House,
"West Point, July 9, 1779.

"Many and pointed orders have been issued against the unmeaning and abominable custom of swearing, notwithstanding which, with much regret, the General observes that it prevails, if possible, more than ever; his feelings are continually wounded by the oaths and imprecations of the soldiers whenever he is in hearing of them. The name of the Being from whose bountiful goodness we are permitted to exist and enjoy the comforts of life is incessantly imprecated and profaned in a manner as wanton as it is shocking.

"For the sake, therefore, of religion, decency and order, the General hopes and trusts that officers of every rank will use their influence and authority to check a vice which is as unprofitable as it is wicked and shameful."

NOT ONLY WITH OUR LIPS, BUT IN OUR LIVES.

E. Elizabeth Bateman.

It matters not how well we speak, or long,
Our acts alone will make our words prove strong.
This is our test, no other ever thrives;
Not only with our lips, but in our lives.

Since Christ our Saviour dwelt among men here,
This proof He asks of us, who hold Him dear;
To feed His lambs and help men break their gyves,
Not only with our lips, but in our lives.

Dear Father, then for wisdom we will pray,
That we may give Thee service day by day;
And show Thy wondrous live to him who strives;
Not only with our lips, but in our lives.

A True Story of a Common Cat.

As the cold winds begin to blow and there is a hint of heavy snows in the air, and as we sit closer at home and feel grateful for comfort and security, my mind goes back for some few years to a high hilltop in Berkshire county, and a yellow cat, roaming the dark woods at night and living as cats may in the wild country. This is the story of "Tommy." It is a true story; there is something of tragedy in it, much of drama, a deal of mystery. It has a happy ending.

Back thirty years ago my parents bought an old farm in the town of Otis, but some five miles from the village. A remote, isolated, beautiful place, the house perched on the hill, about 1,800 feet above sea level. Standing on the front piazza one looked across a rolling expanse of low hills, and on the horizon stretched a purplish haze of mountains melting into the sky. Behind the house the slope rose another fifty feet, to a bare, bleak, stone-cropped summit whence the watcher saw a great sweep of horizon, with Mt. Tom, Greylock, Monadnock and, on clear days, the Catskills in the distance. Woods of maple, beech, oak, birch and pine, with some ash and other trees swept like a benediction along the slopes of our farm.

When we took over this great old place there went with it, along with farm tools, horses, Jerseys cows, and other farm necessaries, two cats—"Tommy" and "Beauty." If ever there was a married couple, here was one! They were devoted. When Beauty had her little family of yellow kittens to care for, Tom provided her with wild food. The house gave her milk and odds and ends, but it was Tommy's delight to bring her field mice, and we could see him come across the mowing with a mouse in his mouth. Now, let's keep clear of moralizing at this point on the hunting proclivities of cats. I have no quarrel with them. I may write something about this some day, but not here. I love birds, and all living things; but I will not judge the cat, or other animals who are as the Lord made them. Just as the fact let it be said that Tommy brought Beauty field mice, not birds.

But that is not the story. The hired farmer who had charge of the place owned several dogs. It is not easy to mix dogs and cats, unless they have been brought up together. Here is another of nature's ways with which I shall not quarrel. The facts in this case were that Beauty, after some months disappeared. We always supposed one of the farmer's dogs killed her, and we mourned her. Tommy remained a short time after Beauty went, and then disappeared. We felt sure he had also fallen a victim to the dogs, and we mourned again—and even more, for Tommy was a most engaging cat, firm-fleshed, sleek, responsive, soft-furred—not like a city tomcat, but a bit of wild life consenting to human companionship.

We did not forget Tommy, and often spoke of him as of friend lost. Time passed, and with it the farmer's reign. On a spring day he packed his household goods on wagons, prepared to depart with his family on the morrow.

On the day he packed his wagons, Tommy reappeared. He sat perched on one of the highest rafters in the great old red barn, safely out of reach of dogs or men. There the old fellow sat, leaning his head over and watching the goings and comings of those beneath. We called him, tried to tempt him with a saucer of cream; but he moved not. Night came, and on the high rafter slept, or watched, Tommy.

The next day the farmer, his family and his dogs, departed. The caravan had not gone a quarter of a mile down the road when Tommy came trottting and chirruping to the west door of the house. He rubbed, purring and joyous, against our legs, arched his fine yellow back, nosed into once-familiar corners of the kitchen, and then settled down, crouching, to a saucer of cream, his tail gently swaying at the end, lapping contentedly the renewal of things as they had been.

Where had he been? All through the last half of the summer before through the winter—and they have old-fashioned winters in the Berkshire hills—through the melting spring, Tommy must have ranged the fields and woods, living maybe in deserted, tumbled-down barns or sheds, perhaps in caves or other natural shelters. Tommy for those long months had gone wild. He had skipped back some thousands of years to the time when his kind were self-sufficient wanderers of the woods.

But, and here is the point of the whole story, while he had gone wild in his way of living, the ties of civilization had stuck. The claim of human companionship had stayed with him. Else, how was it that he made his reappearance on the very day that the farmer's loaded wagons stood in the yard?

I feel sure about Tommy. He liked us; and though circumstances told him he must make his living elsewhere or perish before hostile forces, he kept his eye on home. Like some wandering exile, he crept close in the dark hours, and peeked in the lighted windows. The thought of warm firesides, of stroking hands, of saucers of food by the kitchen stove, the memory of a pleasant couch or chair in the living room, a thought of his favorite spot in the spring sunshine on the south steps—these lived with him.

Tommy had faith in us, in the future, in the gods of nature, and the gods of homes and friendship. Very likely cats have their gods. So he watched and waited, patiently, unspoiled. He came back.

Tommy lived his span of life, a good cat, loyal to his friends, faithful to the demands of cat nature. He has gone to the place for good cats; and in Our Dumb Animals.

How Mary Made Friends.

Mary was a very fortunate little girl. She lived in a nice home with a lovely lawn all around and plenty of room to play. She had any number of toys, but still she was not quite happy. "I don't see," she said to her Aunt Mary one day, "why all the children will stay over at Jane's and play with her so much more than they will play with me. Her dolls are not half so nice as mine, and she has hardly any toys. Besides, she isn't very pretty and her hair is as straight as a stick. And look how much more room we have here."

Now, Aunt Mary loved her little namesake very much, and she hated to see her unhappy. So she was sorry to have to say what she felt was the real reason that Mary was alone so much of the time. "You know," she said slowly, stroking her little niece's bright curls, "straight hair does not necessarily make one unattractive. Haven't you often heard Grandma say that 'Pretty is, as pretty does?' Maybe Jane is nicer about letting the other children play with her dolls and her toys than you are. Does Jane ever say 'Don't take that carriage, that's mine?' I don't believe she would ever say to the other children, 'You'll have to play this game that I want, because aren't we playing on my lawn'?"

Then Mary's little head began to hang down a bit. She remembered having said almost exactly those words. And she remembered, too, some things she felt sure Aunt Mary didn't know about, how she had hid her candy and just slipped bites of it when the others were around and she thought they weren't looking, and other things like that.

Then she glanced up, "Aunt Mary," she asked slowly, "do you think if I wouldn't be selfish that the other children would like better to play with me?"

"Well," answered her aunt, "I couldn't be sure, but I don't think selfish people have so many friends and they are never as happy as their unselfish friends even if they have ever so many more toys."

"All right," said Mary, "you don't know, and I don't know, but I'm going to find out if being selfish has kept me from having friends."

She was as good as her word and often after that when she wanted to ride her bicycle herself she would remember just in time and say, "Let's take turns riding so we can all have fun." She learned to play the games which her playmates wanted and she was surprised to find that very often they would make her choose a game. She found, too, that a little bit of candy shared with her friends tasted better than lots more eaten "on the sly."

It was not long until the children all came to Mary's lawn to play, Jane along with the rest. Before Mary was through her lunch, she would hear, "Aw, Mar-ee," and she nevermore had to beg her friends to come over and play with her.

All things that can be thought, or seen, or told, or handled, are as nothing in comparison with those things that can neither be thought nor seen, nor told, nor handled.—Giles of Assisi.

EUGENIA CARTER CASSATT.

By Her Friend, Deborah Brock.

Shortly after the ending of the World War a group of women war workers were gathered at their headquarters in Philadelphia and were discussing the various women with whom they worked. How difficult many of them had been, and how scheming for notoriety and decorations were even some of the best of them! It was the seamy side of their excellent work. "Well, there's one woman who has come out of it unscathed," said one of the group, "that's Mrs. Gardner Cassatt. She has worked with the most difficult people, and made them work together, keeping them in a good humor with her amusing talk and, when they were unreasonable and trying, with a quick rebuke making them ashamed of themselves. The work no one else wanted to do she quietly did while others were discussing it, and she sought no recognition or reward." To this the whole group agreed.

One of the greatest belles Philadelphia ever had, and always a leader in social life, she stood for what was highest and best, and everyone knew where she stood. The "singular gifts of the Holy Ghost" with which she was endowed (and all who knew her agreed she was a unique personality) she used for the glory of God. The tongue, that unruly member, so often used for evil and to injure others, was by her used to give pleasure. Many were the lives she brightened with her gay and witty talk, and many sad and lonely persons, rich and poor, were made happy by her visits. Busy woman as she was, she always took time for this Everyone in need was her neighbor, especially the members of her own parish; and how she loved St. Mark's! If there were prayers for the sick and afflicted, she wanted to know who was prayed for, and was the first to call to see what she could do. She never sent. Her hand was always in her pocket to help when such help was needed. "Thank you so much for letting me know. Of course I want to help," was her invariagle answer when asked to contribute to something in the parish. And her giving meant sacrifice and self-denial. During the war, when it was difficult, and sometimes impossible, to get coal, she told the worker in the charity organization in her ward and the Sisters at our missions to come to her cellar and get a bucket of coal if they needed it and couldn't get it for their poor people. They did, and she suffered. "Just like the saints," said someone to whom I told this story, and of course it was.

She was a leader in Red Cross work, president for several years of St. Mark's Auxiliary, was chairman of the hospitality committee for the Priests' Convention of 1924, and for twenty-two years assistant to the chairman of St. Mark's League of Intercession. No one wrote as many notes and mailed as many circulars as she did for our days of intercession, but that was the smallest part of her work. Her whole life was a life of prayer and a hidden life. "I hear Mrs. Cassatt goes to St. Mark's every day to pray. I never knew she was that kind of person," said someone who had only known her socially. "That is why she is that kind of a person, the most charming and attractive person you know," I replied. This had been her habit for over half a century. "It is not in gloom and hardness, but with a reckless gladness of the saints, the careless and light-hearted glee of children, that we must look for the crashing of ramparts and fall of Jericho. Dullness will never master the flaming dragons of sin."

A Catholic life, the product of Catholic faith and practice; and when last August the call home came to her I think she answered as usual: "I was glad when they said unto me, Let us go into the house of the Lord."

An ardent writer on the spiritual life has said that a deply spiritual person will be so pleasant that all persons of good will will want to be continually in his or her company. Such a person was Eugenia Cassatt. May she rest in peace.

Mrs. Eugenia Carter Cassatt was the daughter of Dr. Charles and Ellen Newman Carter, of Philadelphia, Pa., and granddaughter of Mr. William Carter, of North Wales, Caroline County, Va.

IN MEMORIAM.

The Rev. George Otis Mead.

In the passing of the REV. GEORGE OTIS MEAD, many have lost a true and faithful friend and the Church a more than usually useful member. His geniality and cheerfulness widened his influence with Clergy and Laity as the years went by. This he used with fine and telling effect as new opportunities for service opened up in his one thought and purpose of advancing the Cause of Christ.

Limited in his boyhood in educational advantages, because there were no schools at that time so shortly after the War, he bravely overcame the want of them. With inspired use of splendid endowment of an attractive personality, it is doubted if any man ever met their varied and various requirements and exactions, with better success than he as he measured up to many departments of the Church as opportunity presented themselves, enlarging and strengthening them with his benign and helpful influence.

As mission preacher in his early life he was of the best; he touched Church Extension Fund to make it a success in his department; the Sunday schools in his own and other Dioceses got new impulse and inspiration in his energetic and practical presentation of the cause; the rural churches which he faithfully served still recall his ministrations in their behalf with cordial affection; while the town and city churches through which he passed to a splendid culmination of a successful ministry in Christ Church, Roanoke, add their willing testimony to the uplifting and benignant influence of a simple and Godlike ministry.

Limitation in education and others of like nature are no bar to success in preaching the Gospel of Jesus Christ or living a life of righteousness, if the effort is entered into, under God's guidance, with the same simple hearted, energetic sincerity which actuated every motive and purpose of George Otis Mead. He goes back to God, leaving a splendid example for praise and emulation.

May God put His hand on the pain of his sorrowing loved ones and enable them to forget in time their loss, as they contemplate him as he enters for eternity into that "rest that remaineth for the people of God."

IN MEMORIAM.

Rt. Rev. Beverley D. Tucker.

On the eve of our annual report going to press, February 6th, the Executive Board of the Woman's Auxiliary held a meeting which was opened with a memorial service for Bishop Beverly D. Tucker and the following resolutions were adopted:

Whereas it hath pleased Almighty God to remove from this worlds' sphere to a higher one our beloved Bishop

Be it Resolved, That the Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese of Southern Virginia record the deep sorrow that we experience in the loss of so true a friend, shepherd and counsellor, whose simplicity, democracy and godliness have endeared him to all who knew him. His interest and love for the work and members of the Woman's Auxiliary so long an inspiration, will continue with us in the life of the Auxiliary, and his absence will be keenly felt in our Diocesan meetings.

Be it further Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the family, to the Diocesan Record, to the Southern Churchman and printed in our annual report.

Respectfully submitted,
MRS. FRANK HOLLADAY,
MRS. CHARLES GRANDY,
MRS. R. B. SPINDLE,
MRS. WALTER WHICHARD,
MRS. RICHARD McILWAINE,
MRS. JOSEPH D. DEAL,

A CONFEDERATE CATECHISM.

12. Did Lincoln, by his conquest of the South, save the Union?

No; the old Union was a union based on consent; the present Union is a great Northern nation based on force and controlled by Northern majorities, to which the South, as a conquered province, has had to conform all its policies and ideals. The national authority is only Northern authority. Today the Executive, the Cabinet, the Supreme Court, the Ministers at foreign courts are all Northern men.

13. Could Lincoln have saved the Union by some other method than war?

Yes. If he had given his influence to the resolutions offered in the Senate by John Jay Crittenden, the difficulties in 1861 would have been peaceably settled. These resolutions extended the line of the Missouri Compromise through the territories, but gave nothing to the South, save the abstract right to carry slaves to New Mexico. But most of New Mexico was to barren for agriculture, and not ten slaves had been carried there in ten years. The resolutions received the approval of the Southern Senators and, had they been submitted to the people, would have received their approval both North and South. Slavery in a short time would have met a peaceful and natural death with the development of machinery consequent upon Cyrus M. McCormick's great invention of the reaper. The question in 1861 with the South as to the territories was one of wounded pride rather than any material advantage. It was the intemperate, arrogant, and self-righteous attitudes of Lincoln and his party that made any peaceable constructive solution of the Territorial question impossible. In rejecting the Crittenden resolutions, Lincoln, a minority president, and the Republicans, a minority party, placed themselves on record as virtually preferring the slaughter of 400,000 men of the flower of the land and the sacrifice of billions of dollars of property to a compromise involving a mere abstraction.

14. Does any present or future prosperity of the South justify the War of 1861-1865?

No; no present or future prosperity can make a past wrong right, for the end can never justify the means. The war was a colossal crime, and the most astounding case of self-stultification on the part of any government recorded in history.

15. Had the South gained its independence, would it have proved a failure?

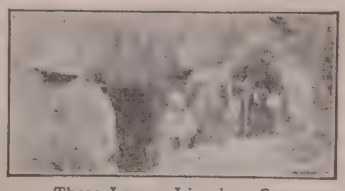
No. General Grant has said in his Memoirs that it would have established "a real and respected nation." The States of the South would have been bound together by fear of the great Northern Republic and by a similarity of economic conditions. They would have had laws suited to their own circumstances, and developed accordingly. They would not have lived under Northern laws and had to conform their policy to them, as they have been compelled to do. A low tariff would have attracted the trade of the world to the South, and its cities would have become great and important centers of commerce. A fear of this prosperity induced Lincoln to make war upon the South. The Southern Confederacy, instead of being a failure, would have been a great outstanding figure in the affairs of the world.

16. Were the Southerners "rebels" in seceding from the Federal Union?

The Southerners in seceding from the Federal Union were no more rebels than the Americans in 1776 in seceding from the British Union. These last called themselves "Patriots," not rebels. Both Southerners and Americans in 1776 acted under the authority of their State governments. The Freesoilers in Kansas and John Brown at Harper's Ferry were undoubtedly "rebels," for they acted without any authority whatever in using force against the Federal Government, and Lincoln and the Republican party, in approving a platform which sympathized with the Freesoilers and bitterly denounced the Federal Government, were rebels and traitors at heart.

17. Did the South, as alleged by Lincoln in his messages and in his Gettysburg speech, fight to destroy popular government through the world?

No, the charge was absurd. Had the South succeeded, the United States would still have enjoyed all its liberties, and so would Great Britain, France, Italy, Belgium, Switzerland and all other peoples. The danger to popular government came from Lincoln himself. In conducting the war, Lincoln talked about "democracy" and "the plain people," but adopted the rules of despotism and autocracy, and under the fiction of "war powers" virtually abrogated the Constitution, which he had sworn to support.



18. Was Lincoln's proclamation freeing the slaves worthy of the praise which it has received?

No, his proclamation was a war measure merely. He had no humanitarian purpose in view, and only ten days before its issuance he declared that "the possible consequences of insurrection and massacre in the Southern States" would not deter him from its use, whenever he should deem it necessary for military purposes. (Nicolay and Hay, Complete Works of Abraham Lincoln, 11, p. 225.) In his second inaugural message, while professing "malice to none and charity to all," he slandered the South by describing the slave owner as an incarnate demon, who did nothing but lash his slaves, without giving the least requittal for their service of 250 years! The Southerners took the negro as a barbarian and cannibal, civilized him, supported him, clothed him, and turned him out a devout Christian. Booker T. Washington admitted that the negro was the beneficiary rather than the victim of slavery.

19. Would Lincoln have saved the South from the horrors of Reconstruction if he had survived the war?

No, Lincoln had shown no kindness to the South while he lived, and there is no reason to suppose that he would have done so had he survived the war. His war violated every law of humanity, and instead of offering pardon to every one who would submit, as the British General Howe had done in his amnesty proclamation of November 30, 1776, Lincoln in his amnesty proclamation of December 8, 1863, excepted from the benefits of his proclamation everybody in the South of any leading intelligence. It is absurd to ascribe Andrew Johnson's policy of Reconstruction to Lincoln, for Lincoln in his proclamation of July 8, 1864,, professed that he was not bound up to any fixed plan whatever. The closest companion of Lincoln and the master mind of his Cabinet was Edwin M. Stanton, who hated the South and all that concerned it. President Johnson to his credit, drove him from his Cabinet. Lincoln's reputation for kindness is based upon a number of trivial incidents and on his knack of juggling with words and using rhetoric to cover his absurd and oftentimes outrageous statements by a jingle of sentences.

A CONFEDERATE CATECHISM

THE WAR OF 1861-1865

By LYON GARDINER TYLER

1. What was the cause of secession in 1861?
It was the fact that the Union consisted from the first of two jarring nations having different interests, which were brought to the breaking point in 1861 by the intemperate agitation in the North against everything Southern. The breaking point was nearly reached in 1833, when the North sought to impose upon the South a protective tariff. It was finally reached in 1861, when after unmitigated abuse of the South, a purely Northern president was elected by purely Northern votes upon a platform which repudiated the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States authorizing Southerners to carry their slaves into the territories. This decision gave no material advantage to slavery, as none of the remaining territorial domain was in any way fit for agriculture, but the Southerners resented the attitude of Lincoln and his party as a challenge to their constitutional rights and as a determination on the part of the North to govern the Union thereafter by virtue of a mere numerical majority. There was no real peace, and the South seceded because it wanted peace and not strife or war.

2. Was slavery the cause of secession or the war?
No. Slavery existed previous to the Constitution, and the Union was formed in spite of it. Both from the standpoint of the Constitution and sound statesmanship it was not slavery, but the vindictive, intemperate anti-slavery movement that was at the bottom of all the troubles.

3. Was the extension of slavery the purpose of secession?
No. When South Carolina seceded she had no certainty that any other Southern States would follow her example. By her act she absolutely shut herself out from the territories and thereby limited rather than extended slavery. The same may be said of the other seceding States who joined her.

4. Was Secession the cause of the war?
No, secession is a mere civil process having no necessary connection with war. Norway seceded from Sweden, and there was no war. The attempted linking of slavery and secession with war is merely an effort to obscure the issue—"a red herring drawn across the trail."

5. What then was the cause of the war?
The cause of the war was the denial of self-government, by Lincoln, to 8,000,000 of people, occupying a territory half the size of Europe. Lincoln himself said of these people that they possessed as much moral sense and as much devotion to law and order as "any other civilized and patriotic people." Without consulting Congress, Lincoln sent great armies to the South, and it was the war of a president elected by a minority of the people of the North. In the World War Woodrow Wilson declared that "No people must be forced under sovereignty under which it does not choose to live."

6. Did the South fight for slavery or the extension of slavery?
No, for had Lincoln not sent armies to the South, that country would have done no fighting at all.

7. Did the South fight for the overthrow of the United States Government?
No, the South fought to establish its own government. Secession did not destroy the nation, but merely reduced its territorial extent. The United States existed when there were only thirteen States, and it would have existed when there were twenty States left. The charge brought by Lincoln that the aim of the Southerners was to overthrow the government was no more true than if King George III had said that the secession of the American colonies from Great Britain had in view the destruction of the British Government. The government of Great Britain was not destroyed by the success of the American States in 1783. Nor would the government of the United States have been destroyed if the Southern States had succeeded in repelling the attacks of the North in 1861-1865.

8. What did the South fight for?
IT FOUGHT TO REPEL INVASION AND FOR SELF-GOVERNMENT, JUST AS THE FATHERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION HAD DONE.

9. Did the South in firing on Fort Sumter begin the war?
No, Lincoln began the war by attempting to land troops at Fort Pickens, in Florida, in violation of a truce existing between the Federals and Confederates at that place. This was long before Fort Sumter was fired on, and Fort Sumter was fired on only after Lincoln had sent an armed squadron to supply and strengthen that Fort. Even supposing that the action of the Confederates in firing on the Fort was unjustifiable, Lincoln was not bound to treat it as a gage of battle. He knew that all the Confederates wanted was a fort that commanded the Metropolitan city of South Carolina. He knew that they had no desire to engage in a war with the United States. Not every hostile act justifies war, and in the World War this country submitted to having its flag filled full of holes and scores of its citizens destroyed before it went to war. Lincoln, without any violation of his views of government, had an obvious alternative in putting the question of war up to Congress, the war-making power. But he did not do it.

10. Why did Lincoln break the truce at Fort Pickens and precipitate the war by sending troops to Fort Sumter?
Lincoln did not think that war would result by sending troops to Fort Pickens, and it would give him the appearance of asserting the national authority. But he knew that hostilities would certainly ensue if he attempted to reinforce Fort Sumter. He was therefore at first in favor of withdrawing the troops from that Fort, and allowed assurances to that effect to be given out by Seward, his Secretary of State. But the deciding factor with him was the tariff question. In three separate interviews, he asked what would become of his revenue if he allowed the government at Montgomery to go on with their ten per cent tariff. Final action was taken when nine Governors of high tariff States waited upon Lincoln and offered him men and supplies. The protective tariff had almost driven the country to war in 1833; it is not surprising that it brought war in 1861. Indeed, this spirit of spoilation was so apparent from the beginning that, at the very first Congress, Grayson, one of our two first Virginia Senators, predicted that the fate reserved to the South was to be "the milch cow of the Union." The New York Times, after having on March 21, 1861, declared for separation, took the ground nine days later that the material interests of the North would not allow of an independent South!

11. Did Lincoln carry on the war for the purpose of freeing the slaves?
No, he frequently denied that that was his purpose in waging war. He claimed that he fought the South in order to preserve the Union.

THE ONLY PANACEA FOR ALL ILLS
JESUS CHRIST OUR PARACLETE

"No man cometh unto the Father, but by Me."

"Come unto me all ye that travail and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

"Cast all your care upon HIM, for He careth for you."

"Trust ye in the Lord forever: for in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength."

"Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is staid on Thee, because he trusteth in Thee."

A MESSAGE FROM GOD

My name is Jehovah. I am that I am. I am a jealous God. My glory I will not give to another. I am seeking a people who will wholly obey Me. Him that honoreth Me will I honor. I am seeking out a real people, a people who do not honor Me with their lips alone, but with heart and mind and life. I am a real God; I want a real people.

There is violence and oppression in the earth, confusion and chaos, selfishness and self-seeking. Many profess with their mouths to love and serve Me whose hearts are far from Me. I am weary of shams and hypocrisy. My heart is hungry for reality, for a people who will love, serve, and obey me. I long for a people who will open their hearts to me. I long, yea, greatly desire, to bless my people. My name has been dishonored, I am wounded in the house of my friends. I am cast one side as one unworthy to be trusted. Do not my people know that I am Jehovah? My name shall be exalted in the earth. I, Jehovah, have purposed, my plans and purposes shall be fulfilled. I greatly desire to manifest forth my glory and power in the earth, but I am hindered by my people. Have not I said unto thee, if thou wouldst believe thou shouldst see the glory of God? But ye have not believed. You have said with your lips you believed, but your actions belie your words.

But I will have a people who will fully trust and obey Me. I am about to pour out My Spirit in greater fulness in the earth. I have only begun to show forth my glory and power as yet. Hear My voice, O my people, give me thine ear and hear what I have to say unto thee.

I am offering now a place by my side in my glory. Thou canst have a seat beside Me on My throne; thou canst rule and reign with Me in glory if thou wilt hearken unto My voice and obey Me. I have said I will not give My glory to another, but thou canst share My glory if thou wilt follow me all the way. Yea, I have called thee out to show forth My glory. I am cramped and hindered by the unbelief and fear of My people. Why will ye not believe Me? Move out into the deep. Enlarge thy borders. Trust Me fully. I will not disappoint you. A goodly land lies before you; corn, wine, oil, milk and honey. I long to lavish upon you all good things, but you must separate yourselves from the world. I must have a people wholly separated unto Myself, then I can work and show forth signs, miracles and wonders in the earth. I have not withheld these because I desired to, but because I could not trust My people with them. But ye shall know and all the earth shall know that I am Jehovah in your midst. My people shall be willing in the day of My power. My name shall be exalted, and My glory shall fill the whole earth.

Have not I spoken and shall it not come to pass? My purposes are ripening fast. The consummation of the age draweth nigh. Hasten, O My people, for golden opportunities are before thee. Look not for worldly honor or praise: I will honor thee.

There is no time to lose. I hasten. I am coming. Get ready for Me. Only those who are separated wholly, unto Me, who have severed all ungodly and worldly alliances, will be caught up

When you hear some one criticising foreign missions, just ask him if he ever knew of a hospital where blind eyes were opened, suffering abated, diseases cured, misery alleviated anywhere in heathendom, except where the foreign missionary has gone. A man may not be willing to acknowledge Christ as Saviour and Lord, but if he has any intelligence he must acknowledge the blessed ministry that has come in such abundant measure with Christ's Gospel.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

You are today where your thoughts have brought you; you will be tomorrow where your thoughts take you.

Our best is none too good for God, but are we good enough to make such an offering.—Rev. Wm. Porkess.

The cultured and skeptical Lord Chesterfield said to Fenelon, in whose company he had been thrown, "He will make a Christian of me in spite of myself, if I stay long with him."

He loveth thee, but not thy sin;
He would thou shouldst be pure and clean;
That which defileth, cast away;
Thy steps direct in wisdom's way.
Give Him thy heart and soul, and be
His own, because God loveth thee.

In sorrow and trouble, how little comfort there is in ordinary consolations! But when you tell people about what Jesus did and suffered Himself, and how He feels for mourners, you will find that God the Holy Spirit has Himself applied the consolation to their hearts: the word about Christ has been used to bring before them His Person.

"If only we strive to be pure and true,
To each of us there will come an hour
When the tree of life will burst with flower,
And rain at our feet the golden dower
Of something grander than ever we knew."

"The foundation of our society and our government rest so much on the teachings of the Bible, that it would be difficult to support them if faith in these teachings should cease to be practically universal in our country."—Ex-Pres. Coolidge.

There is no more use in praying without practicing than there is in practicing without praying. You cannot learn to walk without walking, no more can you learn to do good without trying to do good.—Charles Kingsley.

Thou hast taught us that Thou art
Still present in the crowded street,
In every lonely suffering heart
That there we meet.

O God, our Master, help us then
To bless the weary and the sad;
And, comforting the hearts of men,
To make Thee glad.
—Annie Matheson.

SUNRISE

This Lenten season comes with events and conditions offering us brighter hopes for the future and surer confidence that the promises of God shall be fulfilled than the world ever has known. Therefore, it brings more and stronger incentives to earnest and fervent prayer, humiliation and gratitude than has inspired any preceding generation. Humanity has made more progress toward the reign of peace and righteousness and brotherhood in the last one hundred and sixty years than in the seventeen centuries that had passed since the Crucifixion; more in the last ten years than in all the centuries before.

In 1775, the world had but one republic, that of Switzerland. Since then wars and upheavals have followed each other swiftly, each resulting in distinct advancement, repulsive as they are to read of, fearfully tragic and apparently destructive as they were. Now the strongest nations are uniting in earnest endeavor to outlaw war and end it. We have pacts, treaties, agreements, the international court of justice, the league of nations, the conference at work in London for limitation of naval armament. Cynics and pessimists, those whose thought is directed from the standpoint of twenty years ago, sneer at these efforts, recall the long record of diplomatic treacheries, betrayals of compacts by statesmen and rulers, the complications of jealousies, fears, greeds, ambitions, ignorance. They overlook the vast fact that the masses of the people in all civilized countries have gained steadily in intelligence, become more conscious of the interdependence of mankind, more closely intimate with the people of other tongues and races. While the philosophers of gloom and exponents of despair tell us of the profound and incurable hostilities and dissensions and bloodlusts, the radio, long-distance telephone, airship, moving-pictures, cheerfully and happily draw the ordinary citizens more closely together, make the idea of killing each other more repugnant and absurd. The time when emperors and kings and cabinets could decree war for satisfaction of their tempers and whims and covetousness relying on an unthinking populace to obey and blindly follow, regardless of causes and consequences, is gone. Public opinion asserts itself more than ever before and demands reasons and to know if all possible means for avoidance of war have been exhausted. Emperors and kings, premiers and rulers, know this and measure words and demands, deferential not only to their own constituents, but to the increasing sentiment of the world for tranquility and against strife, resorting to arbitrations rather than arms. Another tremendous factor for peace is the rise of the United States to world dominance and the close sympathy between the English-speaking peoples, representing so much of the population, courage, ability, wealth and resource of the world and their honest, cordial cooperation in fulfilling the prophecy that the swords shall be beaten into plowshares and spears into pruning hooks and that nation shall not lift up sword against nation.

Unity of Christian peoples comes continually nearer, by orderly, steady, well-measured steps. We realize it clearly as we look back a little way to the ferocity with which Protestants and Roman Catholics, Presbyterians and adherents of the Church of England fought each other, when Catholics, Baptists, Episcopalians, Presbyterians, alternately persecuted and were persecuted as they gained or lacked power. In 1675, Quakers were excluded by law from many American colonies. Quaker women attempting to preach the doctrines of their sect were publicly whipped. Now a Quaker is President of this Republic. Baptists were put in jail for being Baptists. One of them is Governor of Virginia, elected by a great majority, partly because of his allegiance to the Roman Catholic nominee of his party. As recently as fifty years ago the bitterness of feeling among Protestant denominations was evidenced everywhere. It is disappearing, in most parts of the country has disappeared.

Day by day all of us are developing unity of purpose and mutual helpfulness and coordination of work to the same great end. In Scotland and in the Anglican Church of India denominational lines are melting away or being lowered. The horrors in Russia are driving all the Christian people of the world in united protest against the attempt there to destroy all religion and the mingling of the blood of Catholic, Protestant, members of the Greek Church and Jews will tend toward uniting believers in all religions in sympathy more closely than ever before, perhaps in faith and action.

After one of the periods of loud, blatant, aggressive irreligion that have come at fairly regular intervals, with loose beliefs and heresies and religious inertia, we have clear signs of re-awakening for the Church. The evangelizing crusade is organizing and already is giving glorious results and promise of addition of hosts to the Army of God, the winning back to the fold of many astray, the arousing of the indifferent, neglectful and careless to enlistment under Christ's banner, to be His faithful soldiers and servants.

Peace on earth, good will among men, unity and united work for the Almighty, a great revival of religion, are the magnificent prospects. Let us dedicate this Lent beyond all those past to lifting our hearts in humble, continuing prayer that God's kingdom shall come, His will be done on earth as it is in Heaven. For peace and the unification of all Christians most of us may only pray. In the revival work each of us may help by act and word and example. If the laity of each parish will volunteer their service for faithful, determined, concerted effort glorious results will come. That is the duty and the responsibility on us as individuals. If we will do that, we may leave the other and larger blessings to the Wisdom and Mercy of the Most High, knowing that we have done our parts as we could.

Alfred B. Williams.

THE CHURCH IN CUBA---PAST AND FUTURE

By the Right Reverend H. R. Hulse, D. D.

Special services were held in Holy Trinity Cathedral, Havana, January 12, in commemoration of the fifteenth anniversary of Bishop Hulse's consecration as Bishop of Cuba.

Following is the sermon preached by the Bishop.)

"Look Unto the Rock Whence Ye are Hewn."

AN anniversary furnishes an opportunity to survey the past and expresses one's reasonable hopes for the future.

The future grows out of the past. Human institutions, however suddenly they appear, have their roots in the past.

There are three factors to be considered in the development of the Church in Cuba.

First, the early missionary work started by Bishop Whipple. This first service was held on a gunboat in the harbor, as the authorities of the Church of Rome prevented him from holding services on shore.

The next week both the Prussian and the British consulates were offered him and on Sunday, March 18, 1871, be held a public service in the Prussian consulate, a thanksgiving for the restoration of peace between France and Prussia. These were the first public Protestant services to be held under Spanish rule in Cuba, though services of the Church of England were held in the building now used as a postoffice during the English occupation in 1762 and 1763.

Bishop Whipple was able to excite considerable interest at home and the Rev. Edward Kenney was sent down to act as chaplain to the British, Americans and Germans. For the first year the congregation had to row out to service on a gunboat stationed in the harbor, as the authorities would not permit him to hold service on shore. Finally, the Prussian and British consuls succeeded in getting him permission to hold service on shore.

Presently Cubans were attracted and Spanish services were started. This Spanish work continued under other chaplains after Mr. Kenney withdrew, and met with considerable success. But all this work was broken up by the revolution which started in 1895.

The second factor in the development of our work was found in the Cubans and Americans who were driven into exile during the revolution.

Large Cuban colonies were founded in Key West, Philadelphia and New York. In Key West a congregation was organized by the Rev. Juan B. Baez. Our senior Cuban clergyman was brought into the Church there. In New York the Rev. M. F. Moreno established a congregation. He was one of those driven out by the revolution. When the troubles were over he returned to Cuba, and died in our ministry soon after my arrival here.

Many Cuban families joined English speaking churches in the United States. Many American residents, forced to return to the United States, resumed their old Church membership. When the war was over they returned to Cuba. Many of these families are still members of the Cathedral congregation.

Two I must mention among the many coming up before my mind. Mr. Himely and Mrs. Farres, faithful friends, vital personalities. Mr. Himely was one of the managers of the Missionary Society which first requested me to visit Cuba in 1904 and Mrs. Farres was one of the faithful members who greeted me on my arrival.

In the church at Lon Alabos there is a tablet to the Himely family, who had owned a plantation in the neighborhood for over a hundred years, and the altar cross here was given by Mrs. Farres and her brother and sister.

The third factor in the development of our Church is found in the number of Americans who came to Cuba at the end of the Spanish-American War. Many of them, especially in the army, belonged to the Church and were anxious for its services. Governor General Wood was especially influential in the time soon after the war.

Many colonies were also started by Americans and their members were anxious for religious services. But we had no resident Bishop and so the work lagged. In 1904, the American Church Missionary Society asked me to visit the Island and report on the opportunities here.

It was evident that the opportunities were here, but the great need was for a Bishop. As a result of our representations to the General Convention, which met that fall in Boston, Bishop Knight was elected and sent to Cuba.

He arrived early in 1905 and was greeted by but three clergymen. The situation looked discouraging. But he had these three elements to fall back on. Those who had been reached by the early mission here, the returning exiles and the new coming Americans, British and Germans. We must never forget the helpful part the Germans played.

He soon organized these into a substantial congregation, the nucleus of the Cathedral of today. Bishop Tuttle told Bishop Knight when he came here that he was to lay foundations, they might be all covered up, but they would be there to build on. Bishop Knight did lay foundations, but he was fortunate enough to build on some of them. This Cathedral church will always remain a monument to his statesmanship.

I think of one earlier than Bishop Knight who did lay foundations that have been forgotten. When the Reverend Edward Kenney arrived here in 1871, Havana was one of the pest holes of the world. Yellow fever was epidemic. There was no hospital for foreigners and no cemetery where Protestants might be buried.

For his first year he was not allowed to hold service on shore. Finally he won a grudging permission to hold services in the city. He was isolated, the only Protestant clergyman here, hampered at every turn.

Presently he succeeded in getting foreigners admitted into a hospital where he could hold services for them. He established a cemetery, where Protestants might be buried. There are no records to show us where that cemetery is today, but he read the Burial Service over more than a thousand people who are buried there.

He was here for nine years and every year reported over two thousand calls.

When I first saw Havana, twenty-five years ago, yellow fever was a thing of the past. Life and property was as secure as in the United States. I held a service in the building we rented on the Prado without interference.

Now Havana has grown to be one of the great cities of the world. In the midst of it we have our beautiful Cathedral; we have our Anglo-American hospital, we have our schools and clubs.

But our advantages rest on these spiritual foundations that are covered up and forgotten. Faith, devotion, hard work and self-denial.

Bishop Knight took these three threads of Church life which he found here and bound them together into a growing Church, and since his time there has been more or less constant growth, interrupted at times by revolutions and strikes and cyclones. Three times our churches on the Isle of Pines have been destroyed by cyclones. Before the last cyclone we had five buildings there, now we have none.

The first enthusiasm of a new start has died away and we have settled down to the long, steady stride of the daily march, but every year sees the Cuban work grow. Our largest confirmation classes are found in the Spanish-speaking work.

So much for the past, what about the future? Bishop Knight's task was to organize these different elements of Church life he found and so needed a strong center; so his first task was the building of the Cathedral. He, by no means, neglected the work in the country, but my particular task has been to develop and strengthen that side of our work.

We have probably reached out as extensively as possible with our present resources, growth in the future must come from cultivating the field better. We have been skimming the cream, that is, we have been going out for those who are naturally interested in religion, but have been neglected. Now we must both keep hold of our children and interest the indifferent. That means better equipment and more schools and a ministry constantly on the qui vive. As I look ahead to the future of the Church in Cuba, I do not think that our numbers will ever be large. We will probably be one of the smaller religious institutions here, but I hope that we may exert a strong moral and spiritual influence.

I have three reasons for my hope:

Cuba is a land of extremes, but we are building up a middle class and the Church is one of the strongest influences in doing that. If we can develop a middle class, we will have with us the stabilizing influence of the community.

The thought of the student and scientist sinks down through the different strata of the community until it affects all. In the long run th eintellectual and spiritual leaders of the community are more powerful than its political leaders. Sta. Teresa is more influential in the life of Spain today than Philip the Second.

I believe that the Church has a strong influence over the religious-minded of these leaders. Our attachment to the past combined with our freedom to adapt ourselves to the needs of the present appeals to them. In this respect our influence stretches out beyond our membership.

While American colonies are not likely to grow, American influence in Cuba will not diminish. Americans will probably be found in increasing numbers in positions of influence in the industrial life of the nation and we already have many of them in our membership.

If we have our share in shaping the thought of the middle class and of the leaders in the intellectual and commercial life of Cuba, we will not lack influence over the whole life of the nation.

I can speak about our success because it has not been due to me. The Bishop does little of the real work of the Church. He is only an overseer, traveling about with words of encouragement and instruction. The real work is done by the missionaries of the parishes, going in and out of the homes of their people, instructing the young, helping the needy, ministering to the sick, and daily in life and word striving through Christ to bear testimony of His saving grace to all those they meet.

It is because of their faithfulness and zeal for the Church's work, in doing these simple and ordinary tasks that success has come.

THE MALINES CONVERSATIONS

IN the "Notes on the Conversations at Malines, 1921-25" by Viscount Halifax, dated "The Feast of the Epiphany, 1928," the following statement is made on page 3:

"On my return to England, both the English and French Reports, which had been for some time in the printer's hands, would have been published had not the Archbishop of Canterbury wished the publication postponed till the Revised Prayer Book had been submitted to Parliament."

The following verbatim quotations are taken from the official report of "The Conversations at Malines, 1921-25":

Page 6.—"In the autumn of 1921, Lord Halifax paid a visit to His Eminence Cardinal Mercier at Malines, and asked him if he would be disposed to receive some of his friends, members of the Anglican Communion, who like himself were anxious to labour for a rapprochement of the Anglican Church to the Roman Catholic Church."

Page 18.—"At the second meeting the same six persons met as on the former occasion, but the Anglicans now came with the friendly cognizance of the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, and the Roman Catholics with the knowledge of the Holy See."

Page 20.—"Attention was next drawn on the part of the Anglicans to the well known axiom, 'No foreign potentate hath any jurisdiction in this realm of England.'

"It was pointed out on the part of the Roman Catholics that the right of the Pope to intervene anywhere could not be surrendered; but it might be a question how far he need exercise it."

Page 40.—"The Church is a living body under the authority of the bishops as successors of the Apostles; and from the beginning of Church history a primacy and leadership among all the bishops has been recognized as belonging to the Bishop of Rome. Nor can we imagine that any reunion of Christendom could be effected except on the recognition of the primacy of the Pope."

Page 42.—"After some conversation as to the publication of any account of the proceedings of these meetings, it was agreed that the matter should be referred to the discretion of the Cardinal and the Archbishop of Canterbury."

Page 79.—"From explanations given to us, it is clear that the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion are not the insurmountable obstacle in the way of an understanding between the two Churches which the Roman Catholics had feared might be the case. In fact some Anglican theologians believe those Articles are susceptible of an interpretation which would reconcile them with the teaching of the Council of Trent."

Page 79.—"In the Eucharist the Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ are verily given, taken, and received by the faithful. By consecration the Bread and Wine become the Body and Blood of Christ."

Page 85.—"Supposing always that all matters relating to doctrine had been already settled, and an agreement had been reached upon a system of discipline, no difficulty would be made by the Anglican bishops about consenting to such an adjustment in regard to Ordination as might seem necessary to the Roman Church in order to place beyond doubt in the eyes of all the validity of their ministry."

Page 95.—"The Anglicans are ready to make sacrifices for the cause of union."

Still worse is the present position in the Church of England, where the new Archbishop of Canterbury has, with the approval of the majority of his Bishops, advised the Clergy of that Church that the negative of the House of of Commons needs not be respected. As the veto of the House upon the Book Deposited was based upon its reversion to Romish teachings and usage this declaration of the Archbishop is certain to have momentous consequences in Church and State. It is an encouragement of the Romeward Movement that will extend beyond England and will give new energy to the Romanizers amongst us.

Extracts from Report of Evangelical Educational Society of Philadelphia:

Based as our Society is upon the distinctive principles of the Protestant Reformation, and upon the Evangelical emphasis on personal experience of the power of the Truth, we are profoundly concerned for the future of our Church in view of the growing tendency among our Anglo-Catholic members to repudiate more and more decidedly our Protestant traditions and assimilate themselves more and more closely in teaching, ritual and aspirations to the Church, that, in the Creed of Pius IV (modifying and adding to the Nicene), proclaims itself as "the Holy, Catholic, Apostolic, Roman Church, the Mother of all Churches." If these tendencies continue unchecked and gather more momentum by success in Diocesan and General Conventions, it may become a question, as we said in our Annual Report of 1925, whether we have the right to use the funds entrusted to us for the education of men in Protestant principles, if they are to exercise their ministry in a Church that should repudiate those principles and should officially sanction the practices and doctrines which this Society was founded to resist and oppose. The position of our Society would be so anomalous under such conditions that it must be plain to people possessing any logical faculty, that it is abundantly justified in resisting any effort to sidetrack the Articles of Religion agreed upon by the Bishops, Clergy and Laity in 1801, or to remove them from the Prayer Book where they have been published since the reign of Queen Elizabeth and where they still stand in the English, Scotch and Irish Books.

Such a policy of resistance was formally agreed upon by the Society and carried out by republishing and spreading abroad Judge Marsilliot's pamphlet, "Shall the Protestant Episcopal Church be Destroyed?" Having satisfied ourselves that the facts set forth in that brochure were incontrovertible, we resolved to face the issue and disseminate this information and to support our further opposition by similar tracts, booklets and leaflets.

Of course, those who wish to Romanize our Church further were shocked by our activity, but the Board is unanimously of the opinion that the time for temporizing is past and that if our Church is still to be an upholder of a Christianity freed from superstitious accretions, and relying upon the power of the Truth, it must steadfastly refuse to give its official sanction to error and resist these Romeward tendencies.

Startling Declaration.

According to the Report of the Evangelical Educational Society of Philadelphia, it has been stated that 2,000 priests of the English Church signed the following declaration in 1928. It is said that very many have signed since.

As published in the English Churchman, this extraordinary declaration reads:

"In view of the grave unsettlement of mind which has been caused by recent discussion of Eucharistic doctrine, we, the undersigned priests of the Provinces of Canterbury and York, declare our belief as follows:

(1) We believe that in the Holy Eucharist the bread and wine become the Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ by virtue of the Prayer of Consecration, and that, therefore-

He Himself is truly present under these outward forms.

"(2) We believe that the Body and Blood of our Lord thus truly present are offered to the Father as a Sacrifice; that this Sacrifice is one with the Sacrifice of the Cross; and that it is the continual commemoration of our Lord's Death and Resurrection, and the continual application of His merits.

"(3) We believe that our Lord Jesus Christ being therefore truly and personally present in the Consecrated Sacrament is therein to be adored; and that inward and outward acts of adoration are due to Him in the Liturgy after the Consecration.

"(4) We believe also that our Lord is no less present in the Sacrament when reserved; and therefore is therein always to be adored with like acts of adoration."

Leadership of the Bishops.

It is with grief that we are forced to admit that the Bench of Bishops, our natural leaders, whether in the English or the American Church, cannot be trusted to withstand the flood of Ritualistic practices based on and teaching false doctrine—thrust out of the Church in its reformation on primitive lines—and this is made conspicuously manifest by the behavior of the late Archbishop of Canterbury in the matter of the suppression and withholding of the publication of the Report of the Malines Conversations, or, more correctly, his intentional failure to make or allow any report to reach the House of Commons till too late to aid them in forming their opinion of the changes embodied in the "Deposited Book."—(Sixty-Sixth Annual Report of the Evangelical Educational Society.)

THE TRUE STONEWALL JACKSON

By the Reverend J. J. Clopton

(Concluded from last issue.)

ANECDOTES OF STONEWALL JACKSON.

HOW Stonewall Jackson saved General Milroy's life. Told by E. C., 25th Regiment, Virginia Infantry, C. S. A:

In 1862, when Jackson was engaged in his Valley campaign, I saw a courier hand General Jackson a dispatch. He read it, tore it up and threw it away. Jackson after reading the dispatch immediately gave order to face about and we started down the Valley almost at double quick. When our General destroyed the dispatch I had curiosity to know its contents. I picked it up and put it together. I read, "Milroy is advancing with 5,000 men." Jackson, after reading the dispatch, gave orders to face about, and we started down the Valley. When we reached the enemy under Milroy, skirmishers were thrown out and soon we were in heavy skrimish fight. This was near Mt. Jackson, Shenandoah County. About 1,200 yards away we saw an officer ride under a tree and raise his glasses. Several of our boys determined to sharp-shoot him. One of our number at his first shot made the horse flinch as the bullet scattered the dust under him. "I'll get him next time," said the same soldier; but before we fired again, General Jackson, riding along the lines, passed us. "That is the General; you must not kill him," he said.

Jackson at Cedar Mountain. Told by J. W. G., 10th Virginia Infantry, C. S. A.:

When the "Stonewall Brigade" was lying just behind Pendleton's Artillery at Cedar Mountain, Jackson was in an exposed position at the front, sitting quietly on his horse writing a dispatch. An officer said, "General, we had better get away; the enemy have a good range." Just then a shell struck a pine tree so near Jackson that the bark and splinters fell on the dispatch. Jackson finished the dispatch, handed it to the officer, and quietly rode away.

Jackson's regard for his troop. Told by same soldier as above:

On the forced march before the battle of Second Manassas our men were almost worn out. Our commander, Jackson, would ride along the column and say, "Close up, men, close up."

How a young sentinel held "Stonewall Jackson" up: We were marching in Orange County, between Orange Courthouse and Gordonsville, and it was spring time. A young fellow, small and about seventeen years of age, and from Rockingham County, had been placed in front of an old lady's house as guard, to guard a cherry tree, with orders to let no one disturb it. Jackson and a few officers were riding by and he reached up to take a cherry. The young sentinel raised his musket and ordered him to desist. "Who gave you such orders," said Jackson, still pulling a cherry. He heard the click of the musket as the young soldier cocked his gun. "You can't take these cherries. I will shoot you if you do not stop. I suppose Jackson gave the orders and I am going to carry them out." Jackson took off his cap and said, "You will make a good soldier, my boy," and rode on.

Jackson at Second Manassas. Told by J. W. G., 10th Virginia Infantry, C. S. A.:

At Second Manassas, when our men were hard pressed, Jackson rode along the lines, "Hold on, men, and hold on; Longstreet will soon be here." The troop continued to hold on, and presently the shells from Longstreet's artillery began to burst in front of our lines, and we were safe from defeat.

Jackson's desire to fight between Richmond and Fredericksburg, and not at Chancellorsville. Told Dr. G. S. H., Captain of a Prince William County Company, and afterwards in Medical Department, C. S. A. Told by his uncle, G. S.:

I was at headquarters not long before the Battle Chancellorsville, Lee and Jackson came into headquarters, and noticing no one around, began an earnest conversation. The view was expressed by Jackson that General Lee should fall back and wait for reinforcements from Longstreet. General Lee listened with patience, and when General Jackson had finished, said: "General, I have gone over all that. But we must fight here, though outnumbered. I wish you to make as early a move as you can.' Jackson arose and, lifting his old cap, bowed low and said, "General, you shall be obeyed."

The nearby hillside was covered with the tents of Jackson's corps. In half an hour every tent, wagon and soldier had disappeared and his corps was on the march to Chancellorsville.

Jackson not to be killed. Told me by U. S. Veteran, 18th West Virginia Infantry:

We saw a horseman while we were in the Valley of Virginia ride up to a clump of trees and dismount. One of the members of the 10th West Virginia Cavalry, U. S. A., named "Big Frank A.," said, "I am going to kill that rebel." This same man told me he had killed squirrels at sixty-five yards with his rifle. He rode in range of the soldier, who was kneeling in prayer. He deliberately fired at him three times and missed every time. The officer never stopped praying. "That man can't be killed," he said, and mounting his horse he rode away. The kneeling soldier was "Stonewall" Jackson.

How Jackson lost his buttons. Told by W. B., Virginia Black Horse Battalion of Cavalry:

Just before the capture of Harper's Ferry, our army was passing through Martinsburg, W. Va. The ladies of the town had presented General Jackson with a fine new uniform; but so great was his haste to advance that he was unable to wear it. The hotel where General Jackson had his headquarters was filled with people, and the ladies literally stripped his old uniform of its buttons.

(The End.)

BIBLE QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

(Our readers are invited to send in their questions from time to time concerning Scriptural subjects in which they are perplexed or desire light. Our limited space necessitates brevity in questions, as well as in the answers which we will endeavor to maintain in strict accord with the Word of the Lord, which, after all, settles all argument. This column is therefore not for controversy, but for a testimony.)

Question No. 27.—"Since the laws of Nature are fixed, please explain how miracles were ever possible?"—C. E. W.

Answer.—Since God is the Author of the laws of Nature, it is an easy matter for Him to either temporarily suspend such laws in any stated case, or overcome them by a stronger reverse power. For example, take the law of gravitation, which draws a falling apple to the ground, yet I may catch the apple and produce an opposite effect, without violating the law which still remains in effect.

If man can thus interrupt a "fixed" law of Nature, how much easier can Almighty God do so, who is the Creator of all things. See Jer. 32:17 and 27.

Question No. 28.—"Why do we not see miracles performed today the same as when Christ was on earth?"—C. E. W.

Answer.—Here is where we need to "rightly divide the Word of Truth" (2 Tim. 2:15). In all of God's dealing with Israel, physical signs and demonstrations were in evidence, due to the fact that in Israel He purposed a people for His earthly glory and thus appealed to their physical senses.

Christ's Kingdom on earth being rejected for the time being, God turns to the Gentiles and is calling out a Heavenly "Body" for His Heavenly glory (the Bride of Christ). Hence He is dealing with the Church on a spiritual basis, and which, under the ministry of the Holy Spirit is an inward and silent work.

EVERY CHURCH WOMAN IN THE UNITED STATES PLEASE READ

American Church Mission,
Diocese of Shanghai,
January 22, 1930.

Mr. Editor:

This is a very important and very critical time in the history of China and in the history of the purely evangelistic side of mission work. Bishop Graves has, therefore, appointed an Advisory Committee to plan for the development of the Woman's Work in this Diocese. There is so much to be done, there are so many people to reach and so few people to do it, we are hoping and praying for twenty new workers—ten foreign and ten Chinese. Will you help us in our effort to interest ten foreign women by publishing the enclosed appeal in your paper?

Yours respectfully,
(Mrs.) A. R. Standing,
Chairman of the Advisory Committee.

The District of Kiangsu, China, is attempting a very difficult thing. Will you help?

We are appealing for ten educated young Chinese women to organize evangelistic work among their own countrywomen. Only so can the multitudes of Chinese women be reached—women working in the fields or washing clothes in the courtyards, women raising silkworms or working in modern mills, women learning banking or teaching school—with all the old principles swept away by the revolution, with an amazing gift of freedom poured over their heads and no knowledge of God to show them perfect law of liberty. We are appealing for ten Chinese girls, but for that we must have ten American girls to kindle the fire.

There are many educated Chinese girls who are devoted Christians, loyal, hard-working and self-sacrificing, capable also and very charming. But they have had no experience of initiating methods, of organizing forces. Now and for many years to come they will doubtless do only the same kind of work they see done by others. The first thing needed therefore is to show these girls the possibilities open to them in the way of evangelistic achievement.

American women have a priceless inheritance in their knowledge of their own power of accomplishment when they bind themselves together heart and soul to do a thing. Suffrage is ours, prohibition is ours. There may be a hundred different opinions as to the value of prohibition to the United States. There can be no question as to the agency which brought it about. The women did it—because they believed in it. Now we believe in God more than we, or our mothers, ever believed in suffrage or prohibition. Causes are only causes but God is the Author of all good. The victory of the anti-opium movement and other social work in the future of this great land of China will be a by-product of the first essential achievement, the making known to the women of the country of the nature and the strength of the Holy Spirit. As God has worked through women in the past, so it is our privilege to reveal Him as working through us in China now. We have our Master's promise for the success of our work: "The gates of hell shall not prevail against it," gates, you see, not armies, solid, inert barriers of pride and ignorance and selfishness, waiting for the attack. The task is gigantic, but God through history has given to the women of our nation the gift of faith. This faith we are now asked to share with the women of China.

It is interesting to note that ever since the nationalist movement has brought about such a wave of patriotism throughout China, the most thoughtful of the Chinese clergy are still urging foreign missionaries to come to China and throw their energy and experience into the almost overwhelming job of evangelizing the great mass of the Chinese people. No talent, natural or acquired will be wasted here, normal training or business equipment, love of literature or skill in music, public persuasiveness or a gift of friendship, experience in promoting clubs or managing children. Much has already been accomplished—the presence of educated Christian girls in the Church now is proof enough of this. But there have been too few workers to allow of the joyful enthusiasm which comes from corporate action. We want the Chinese girls to know this enthusiasm. We must first show it to them in operation. In city and country, among educated and uneducated women, there is no end to the development possible in this work—interesting outsiders to desire this new thing, teaching those who have come to desire it. It all depends upon whether you will come and help us.

Ten Chinese girls, ten American girls—shall we get them? If you cannot come yourself, will you pray that others may come?

If you would like to hear further details of this work, write to Dr. John W. Wood, at the Church Missions House, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y. He will be glad to answer all your inquiries.

> O Lord of the Vineyard, in Thy mercy receive now our prayer for Thy work among Chinese women in the District of Shanghai. Have respect to their great need, we beseech Thee, and send them twenty new workers if this is Thy will, ten Chinese and ten Americans, such as Thou hast chosen. Through Jesus Christ Our Lord. Amen.

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSE.

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice, eternal treasures, indeed. "Thy word have I hid in my heart, that I might not sin against thee," Ps. 119:11.)

This week the following verse was submitted by

Mrs. J. W. Ware, of Orange, Virginia:

> "For I the Lord thy God will hold thy right hand, saying unto thee, Fear not; I will help thee."—Isaiah 41:13.
> "I the Lord have called in righteousness, and will hold thine hand, and will keep thee."—Isaiah 42:6.

Who will send one from the far-away places as well as very near us?

FELLOWSHIP IN FAITH: Addresses Delivered at the Great Demonstration in Royal Albert Hall, London, on December 3, 1929. Paper. Pp. 30. Published by Marshall, Morgan and Scott, London, England. Price, 20 cents.

The four speakers are the Rt. Hon. Viscount Brentford, P. C., the Rev. J. Russell Howden, B. D., the Rev. John McNeill, M. A., the Rev. E. A. Carter, the President of the Bible Testimony Fellowship.

These addresses are heart-warming. That the Word of God can and does fructify in human lives with such a uniformity of expression is the proof of its divinity. Everywhere on this earth, the witness is the same; from cultured America or Europe to the new convert to the faith of Christ in China, Africa or South America it displays the sheen of gladness in the new vision and hope which are awakened in the soul. Only a living Lord Jesus can effect this result.

Such teaching as this little pamphlet supplies is staunch and strong for "the faith once for all delivered to the saints." Amid the incessant demands for a gospel for the age in which we live, an accommodating gospel which will humor the idiosyncrasies of unbelieving professors in our colleges who are inflaming our youth with rebellion against the truth, there still stands firm and unshaken this "impregnable rock" as Gladstone named it, pleading for the return of the prodigal, assuring of the Father's love and forgiveness, restoring the wasted years, implanting the germ of a new life and a holy hope.

Let us join Jeremiah in his exultant cry, "Thy words were found and I did eat them: and thy word was to me the joy and rejoicing of my heart."

DOUBTS AND DIFFICULTIES: By Cyril Allington, Head Master of Eton, with an Introduction by the Archbishop of York, and an Animadversion on the Rev. P. B. Clayton, M. C. Cloth. Pp. 196. Published by Longmans, Green & Co., New York. Price, $2.

The author's purpose is to interest in religious topics those who do not read the larger books in which the subject of religion is dealt with in a more adequate manner. The first part of the book deals by way of dialogue—sprightly and scintillating—with the doubts as to religion and revelation generally which pervade the mind of a college-bred man, whose whole training has been on the scientific side. The second section deals by way of letter with the difficuties in religious belief, experienced by his wife, an intelligent and earnest purposed woman of much charm without any special religious knowledge.

The book will make an excellent companion book to Dr. Atwater's Episcopal Church for Men of Today, which also uses dialogue to enliven and impress the great truths of the religious life and to make real and vital their appeal.

REDEMPTION: An Anthology of the Cross. Collected and Edited by George Stewart. Cloth. Pp. 323, with Inex. Published by George H. Doran Company, New York. Price, $3 net.

The Rev. Dr. George Stewart won at Yale the Porter Prize for the best research work of the institution, and this anthology shows the touch of a master hand in research and selection from the world's greatest poetry, the poems which bear upon the Crucifixion of Jesus, or the spirit of redemptive love as manifested on Calvary and in the heroic deeds of men.

An arresting prefatory essay of the compiler gives his interpretation to the great religious poetry and sets forth his appraisal of the dominant power of Calvary. An Index to First Lines supplements the Table of Contents by title and author of the two hundred or more selected poems.

While helpful at any time, this book may be particularly kept in mind for reading during the Lenten Season.

THE NEW PREACHING: By the Rev. Joseph Fort Newton. LL. D. Cloth. Pp. 187. Published by The Cokesbury Press, Nashville, Tenn. Price, $2.

All who know Dr. Newton will metaphorically smack their lips as they read this announcement. Something good is coming, we may be sure, when this prince of preachers seeks to treat the theme nearest his heart.

We are impressed by his statement, "Unless all signs fail, we are on the eve of a new era of assured and all-pervading religious life, and its flowing tide will bring us a new race of great preachers." And what he believes is coming, he longs to assist in arriving. For as a preacher, he talks to preachers, straight to the point, challenging in thought and heart-warming in aspiration.

And we must thank him for the postulate upon which he builds his thesis, namely that unless one lives his faith, he cannot give it to others in the ministry of the pulpit. The people of our day and the day that is dawning will demand that what they receive will come from personal conviction. A back-handed compliment was given by a Yale student, who in the days of compulsory attendance at church was present with his mother at a service. His remark was, "I don't believe that stuff Mr. M. got off this morning; but I know he does." Let us forever divorce ourselves from the temptation to preach what we should like to believe but do not. And yet, let us beware of passing on our crude and untried hypothesis for vital truth. Dr. Newton helps us to this true balance.

Here are his chapters: In the Vestry; The Sermon; The Preacher; What is Preaching; The New Keyboard; The New Srategy; The New Congregation; The Music of Preaching: My Master.

Ere taking up the book, one thinks anticipatingly, "He will surely mention Phillips Brooks." And he does; for the entire chapter, "The Music of Preaching," is a panegyric of this beloved genius of pulpit power.

Dr. Newton confesses to being swept off the old foundations by the tide of modernism; yet his confession is a frank admission of the latent strength of the faith he cannot fully espouse; for he says, "For my own part, it becomes every year more difficult to place Christ intellectually, and increasingly impossible to do without Him practically. . . When I come to Jesus with great questions, suddenly a silence falls upon me, and I know that He is questioning me; and the questions He asks me are so much deeper and keener than those I ask Him, that I am hushed."

Surely we can sit at the feet of such a man and love him for his frank avowal of desire for the fullness of the Lord's life in his own.

Kenneth Mackenzie.

PREACHING WEEK BY WEEK: By A. Boyd Scott, M. C., D. D. Cloth. Pp. 256. Published by Richard R. Smith, Inc., New York City. Price, $2, net.

If Dr. Newton is inspirational and ecstatic in his presentation of the preaching ideal, Dr. Scott is exactingly methodical as to how preaching and conducting the services shall be best achieved. His title suggests the weary minded parson who runs up against Saturday morning with a dry well and an empty bucket. But he shows just such forlorn men the secret of getting ready for the task, which as the years go on should be an event each week of joyous outpouring of the soul's enrichment. For with Dr. Newton, he holds the need of such a saturation of one's message as shall make its delivery the vital expression of the hidden springs which the Lord Himself has nourished in the intervening days of fellowship and impartation.

As this book contains the Warrack Lectures on Preaching, delivered to the divinity students of the United Free Church of Scotland, we at once catch the breeze of sturdy realization of the dignity and responsibility of the preaching office. For the students are trained to regard that calling as superior to mere conduct of services, though they are strictly considered in these chapters. There is not a nook or cranny of the field of the ministry of preaching omitted by Dr. Scott. From the little ones to those of hoary age, all conditions of men are brought into view as demanding and deserving the best possible care of the pastor of souls.

A thoroughly digested lectionary closes the book, by which the essential events and teachings of the Bible are brought to the mind of the preacher for public expression.

Kenneth Mackenzie.

FACTS CORRECTED AND ESTABLISHED.

Mr. Editor:

In view of a letter published in your paper of January 4, written by one who must not have been familiar with conditions here, and for fear that an erroneous impression has been given, I should like to make a brief statement of some of the things accomplished while Mr. ——— was in charge of this parish and since he left (having served as Junior Warden under both Mr. Ellis and Mr. ———, I am thoroughly cognizant of the situation about which I am writing.)

Mr. ——— realized keenly the necessity of a sound body as a foundation for both mental and spiritual training, and almost at once started upon a program conducive to that end. Particular emphasis was laid upon the children's health, and with the splendid cooperation of the local doctors and specialists in Harrisonburg, numerous clinics were held and any one who chose to take advantage of them received medical attention free of charge. In addition, a trained nurse was installed who devoted her entire time to work in this parish. But probably his most outstanding accomplishment along this line was the founding of a small hospital, or preventorium, for tubercular mountain children. In the management of this enterprise he had the benefit of much help and expert advice from the authorities of the Blue Ridge Sanitorium, and under the splendid direction of Miss Annie Park, the children received both spiritual and physical upbuilding. This hospital was such a success that now it is one of the features of the work done by the Episcopal Church in the Blue Ridge Mountains, and has had to be moved to larger quarters.

Though much had been done at Yancey and Rocky Bar in the way of buildings by Mr. Ellis, the southern end of the parish was not so fortunate, and a need for a parish house and workers in that section was great. To fill that want, Mr. ——— was exceedingly fortunate in securing the services of Miss Graves, to whose wide experience, skill and versatility, untiringly exerted in behalf of the parish, too much praise cannot be given. Due entirely to her efforts, funds were raised for the erection of a charming and practical stone house, which serves most adequately as a community center and a home for the workers. Another fine helper was added to the staff in the person of Miss Connor, who stayed for several years and greatly furthered the work of the Church among the mountain people, by whom she was greatly beloved. Then the Church at Lynnwood was tastefully remodeled, electric lights and a furnace installed, and a beautiful altar, carved entirely by Miss Graves, added. The very inadequate schoolhouse there was made comfortable and presentable, and another much-needed teacher obtained. At Yancey, the mission house was rendered much more convenient and modern by the installation of running water and a furnace, and electric lights were put in both there and in the church. The attractiveness of the grounds was greatly enhanced by the planting of large numbers of shrubs, etc., given to Mr. ——— for that purpose by friends. One of the mission buildings was converted into a recreation hall, where plays and other entertainments for the church were held.

Nor was the spiritual side neglected, as the number of services held in the parish was increased with special emphasis laid upon the Prayer Book. Holy Communion was and is celebrated on the average of once a month, with a marked increase in the number of communicants.

Since Mr. ———'s departure over two years ago, there has been no rector in charge, but the work has been ably carried on by Miss Graves and, later, by her successor, Mrs. Lohman, at Lynnwood, and Miss Price and Miss Orwig at Rocky Bar and Yancey, respectively. As for services, they have been faithfully conducted by the Church Army men, and others, who have been most acceptable to the people as a whole, and whose sincere and untiring efforts have met with much success. Of course, the parish has had the benefit of Archdeacon Mason's supervision and as many services as his over-crowded schedule permits; and both he and Archdeacon Neve (on the occasion of the latter's rare visits) are welcomed by large congregations testifying to the hold they have on the people's affections.

Lastly, another indication of the effectiveness of the work that has been and is being done here is the fact that not only have the three missions comprising this parish met their financial obligations in full but have over-subscribed their quotas and given liberally to the Advance Work of the diocese.

APPRECIATION.

Mr. Editor:

Your editorial, "A Word of Protest", is one of the keenest and finest I have ever read. I am indebted to you for such a calm analysis of the situation as it is today. My thanks to you for it.

Gleanings Here and There

Richmond Presbyterian Example: In a widely syndicated article on the rebuilding of Sunday schools, the restoration of religious influence and the reclamation of the young to the churches, William T. Ellis cites the example of the people of Grace-Covenant Presbyterian Church, Richmond, Virginia. Many of the members have subscribed formally to a standard of "Accredited Christian Homes." Signers pledge themselves to regular family worship; assistance by parents in preparation of Sunday-school lessons; at least one parent to accompany children to Sunday school and at least one to accompany child, or children, to church at least once each Sunday.

Cuba has sixty-three mission stations under our Church, with twelve native clergy and six foreign clergy, and about twenty lay readers.

Rather unexpected help for Church missions in Brazil has come from the many substantial Japanese resident coffee planters. Bishop Thomas, accompanied by the Rev. J. Y. Ito, Japanese clergyman, found cordial welcome, cooperation and practical help among the Japanese. Services were conducted in Japanese homes and a number of candidates were confirmed. At one place fifteen adults and thirty children were baptized and fifteen persons were confirmed. Two Episcopal churches are in process of construction.

Methodist Glimpses: All ministerial records of communities are challenged by the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Ann Arbor, Michigan. It has sent from its membership eighty-six missionaries, has furnished the Church with thirty-six ministers and eight wives for ministers and sixteen additional men and women giving whole or part time to Church work.

In Virginia, Ginter Park Church, Richmond, seems to lead in average individual contributions for Church purposes, its average for last year having been $100.08. Cabell Street, Danville, is next, $82.85.

The largest membership for one congregation in the Virginia Conference is Park Place, Norfolk, 2,023; Epworth, second, with 1,571. Charlottesville is third, 1,500; Centenary, Richmond, fourth, 1,369. Monument, Union Station, Broad Street, and Barton Heights, Richmond, are among the seventeen congregations of the Conference reporting over 1,000 members.

The Southern Methodist Episcopal Church has in Cuba an annual conference with over 6,000 members. In 1899, the denomination had no church on the island. Now it has more than 100. Work there has been chiefly under Bishop Candler. The population of the island has doubled since the Spanish and yellow fever were driven out by the Americans.

Visitors to the Washington Cathedral in 1929 numbered 313,714, and included President Hoover and Prime Minister MacDonald.

Virginia Baptist Goal: With the inssue of January 2, the Religious Herald, able, useful and staunch organ of the Baptists, published in Richmond, Va., completed its hundred and second year of continuous publication and announced the goal set for the denomination in Virginia. By authority of the General Association $400,000 will be asked for State and like sum for outside enterprises. Among the State activities are four mountain mission schools, Fork Union and Hargrave Academies, Orphanage at Salem and Hospital at Lynchburg. Beyond the State are home and foreign missions, three theological seminaries, training school, Bible Institute and a Hospital in New Orleans.

Diminishing attendance at services in village churches in England is attributed by an elderly correspondent of The Guardian, Church Magazine of London, to increased demands on the time and labor of the small farmer and his family caused by active competition and modern demands for speed and efficiency.

Old Horrors Repeated: While organized Atheists in this country clamor continually against what they describe as religious intolerance and cite Russia as the ideal country of perfect conditions, a writer in The London Morning Post recites recent incidents of Russian and Atheistic and Bolshevist tolerance and freedom of speech and thought. Among them are that the Archbishop of Perm was buried alive after having his eyes put out. The Bishop of Belgorad was plunged into quicklime. The Bishop of Yuriev had his nose and ears cut off and was finally cut in pieces. The Archbishop of Voronezh was hanged before the altar of his church, and in his arch diocese a hundred and sixty priests were shot.

Fred. Erwin Beale, one of the most prominent leaders in the Gastonia, N. C., cotton-mill disturbances and out on bail under sentence of twenty years for participation in fatal riot, has been arrested and held for trial for leading a riotous demonstration at New Bedford, Mass.

Southern Baptists increased their church income from $12,000,000 in 1916 to $39,000,000 in 1929, and in the same time received 2,700,000 members by baptism, more than in the entire previous history of the denomination.

Fourteen young men were received as ministers, on trial, at the recent session of the Virginia Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Church property in the Virginia Methodist Episcopal Conference is valued at $11,579,000, with debt of $1,837,000.

Church and Mill Workers: One of the Northern newspaper correspondents sent to report on the recent disturbances in Southern cotton mills returned to Washington and, in an address before an Atheistical organization,, declared that religion and the churches were the worst foes of the mill workers and that until both were overthrown there would be no hope for better conditions. A report to the recent session of the Methodist Episcopal Conference told of the special school maintained by that Church at Spartanburg, S. C. Started in 1911, it has a campus of twenty-five acres and endowment of $250,000. All students must be cotton-mill workers and a two years' collegiate course is provided. Expense of the course is $30 a month, including everything. One graduate of this school is chairman of the Finance Committee of the South Carolina Legislature and others are among the most useful and valued occupants of Methodist pulpits.

Mourning in Alaska: After suspension since July, 1927, the Alaskan Churchman, organ of the Church in Alaska, has resumed publication with the Rev. Michael J. Kippenbrock, rector of St. George's, Cordova, as editor. He replaces the Rev. Kent G. Robinson, to whom, The Churchman says, the Church in Alaska and everywhere is indebted for fine and faithful service. In the new issue there is a distinct undertone of sorrowful resentment against the drastic reduction in allowance of funds for continuing missionary and mercy work. Bishop Rowe had established nine hospitals, but the number is reduced now to three.

The Churchman is supposed to be published quarterly and each number represents overcoming of obstacles and discouragements impossible to understand in this country. Yet it gives out brave and cheerful note and gallantly exhorts the Churchmen to carry on, undaunted. It tells of four ordinations since its last number and publishes letters from native women to Bishop Rowe, telling, with the eloquence of absolute simplicity and frankness, of the good done their community by the establishment of St. Elizabeth's Church, Ketchikan, February, 1928.

The Rev. F. Ernest Warren, rector of Emmanuel Church, Bristol, Virginia, is President of the Kiwanis Club of that stirring community.

The Rev. Alfred R. Berkeley, rector of St. John's Church, Roanoke, is to receive the degree of Doctor of Divinity at the commencement of Virginia Theological Seminary, in June.

A Faithful Woman's Quarter: At the laying of the first brick for Memorial Hall, attached to Emmanuel Church, Staunton, Virginia, December 6, the Rev. J. Lewis Gibbs, rector, said that more than ten years ago Mrs. H. H. Henkel, of the congregation, had shown in Sunday School a quarter, which she said she would put aside toward the building of a parish house. Since then her faith never has faltered and her zeal has not relaxed and she was accorded the honor of laying the first brick—the brick given by the Baptists, who are building a church of their own across St. Clair Street, from the Emmanuel Church building.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND NEWS.

(S. C. London Correspondent.)

The Bishop of Exeter Discusses the Prayer Book Measures: The Bishop of Exeter would not describe himself as an Evangelical, but he has from the first taken a clear line in opposition to the policy of the majority of Bishops in regard to the Prayer Book Measures and episcopal action consequent on the rejection by Parliament of those measures. In his Diocesan Gazette he says the practical acceptance of, and use of, the 1928 Book, while professing to accept the 1662 Book is a fundamental error. "No ethical system can justify this action" is his expression. He then advocates that the King in virtue of an acknowledged right, should authorize additional prayers. By this means much that the Deposited Prayer Book contained, and to which no exception is taken by any one, could be allowed. He would not, however, permit any deviation from the present Office of Holy Communion in that way. He believes such an arrangement might be made "without recourse to the turmoil and controversy," which other means of introducing changes must produce.

This is not a new idea. It has been adumbrated again and again on "Truth and Faith" platforms. The best way to bring about a general permission for such changes, deviations or variations, which are generally acceptable and involve no controversial issue, would be to pass through Parliament a new Act of Uniformity Amendment Act, giving to the Bishops authority to permit such departures from the Book of Common Prayer as are in accord with the acknowledged formularies and consistent with Holy Scripture. At present the Bishops give no encouragement for any such thing, but a draft Measure is in existence in non-official hands ready for submission when occasion serves. It seems inevitable that further controversy on the subject of the rejected Prayer Book will be aroused through the resolution of which the Archbishop of York has given notice to move at the Church Assembly this week. Any debate in the Church Assembly at the present on such subjects as the relations of Church and State must carry on this long-drawn-out controversy.

The Church in India: The permission of the Bishops of the Church in India, Bombay and Ceylon to use the Deposited Prayer Book of 1928, is not regarded with great surprise in England. It is, however, regrettable in itself and may prove very damaging to the movement towards Reunion. The Anglican Church with which other Churches are seeking to be united in South India was regarded by them in the light of the 1662 Prayer Book. Some people see in this authorization of the new Prayer Book an astute move by the opponents of the South India Scheme of Reunion.

Last Book of Dr. Griffith Thomas: Those who know anything of the work, and works, of Dr. Griffith Thomas, who was once Principal of Wycliffe Hall, Oxford, and later Professor of Systematic Theology at Wycliffe College, Toronto, will welcome the announcement of the publication of his great work on the Thirty-Nine Articles, "The Principles of Theology." As Principal Gilbert, of St. John's Hall, Highbury, London, says the death of Dr. Griffith Thomas removed from our midst one of the foremost Biblical Scholars and teachers of our generation. He had completed this book before his death. Those who saw the manuscript recognized its worth and have now brought it out. It is a large volume of necessity of over 500 pages, but is arranged in that masterly and precise style typical of its author. It will undoubtedly take its place among the great works on the Articles, and will prove an inestimable boon to those who have to study or to teach with a view to ordination, and to any who would know clearly the teaching of the Church of England as set forth in her Book of Common Prayer and Thirty-Nine Articles.

The Church Assembly: The most important subject before the Church Assembly at its Spring Session this week (February 3) has been that concerning the relations of Church and State. The actual resolution submitted by the Archbishop of York (Dr. Temple) was as follows:

That whereas in the words addressed to the Church Assembly on July 2, 1928, by Archbishop Davidson, with the concurrence of the whole body of Diocesan Bishops, "it is a fundamental principle that the Church—that is, the Bishops, together with the clergy and laity—must in the last resort, when its mind has been fully ascertained, retain its inalienable right, in loyalty to our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, to formulate its faith in Him and to arrange the expression of that Holy Faith in its form of worship," it is desirable that a Commission should be appointed to inquire into the present relations of Church and State, and particularly how far the principle stated above is able to receive effective application in present circumstances in the Church of England, and what legal and constitutional changes, if any, are needed in order to maintain or to secure its effective application; and that the Archbishops be requested to appoint a Commission for this purpose.

Had the resolution merely asked for an enquiry into the relations of Church and State with a view to enabling the Church the more effectively to give expression to the Faith that is in her, there would probably have been no opposition. There can be nothing disturbing in an occasional enquiry in the course of history into these relations with a view to some adjustment rendered necessary or desirable by changing circumstances. But the preamble definitely linked the resolution with the Prayer Book Revision controversy, and was in the nature of a response to the action of Parliament in rejecting the Measures. It was inevitable, therefore, that there should be some amount of feeling engendered. Most people seem to have thought that it would have been better to avoid stirring up strife afresh, and many believe that the Bishops would have been serving their own interests better had they not brought forward this resolution (the Archbishop made it quite clear he was the mouthpiece of the House of Bishops). Whether now on reflection they have come to think the same, cannot be said, but this much is certain, they have in the general opinion lost prestige through the debate, even if they have obtained their desire.

It must not be thought from the foregoing that there was much display of feeling during the debate. On the contrary, it was carried through with admirable restraint, and this was due in no small measure to the quite excellent way the Archbishop of York moved the resolution. He disavowed any intention of reopening the Prayer Book controversy, but inevitably drifted to the subject again and again, always, however, with a suavity void of offence. "The difficulty confronting them at the moment," he said, "was not primarily administrative, but moral." He acknowledged that whenever he instituted an incumbent to a benefice and required of him the ordinary oaths, including the promise to use the form prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer "and none other, except so far as shall be ordered by lawful authority" and when he recalled his own ordination vows he had an uneasy conscience. "The course taken by the Bishops since July, 1928, was, he believed, the right and inevitable course, but he also believed that it was morally indefensible unless they were at the same time setting their hands to deal with the situation," which created the problem now facing them. He thought that to take no step such as the resolution contemplated, would cause more controversy in the country than any which would arise through the setting up of the commission asked for. He did not anticipate that the commission could report for three or even five years.

Among those who supported the resolution was the Bishop of Durham (Dr. Hensley Henson). He is the foremost advocate of disestablishment and as such is, as he put it, in a small minority and, he added, being in a small minority is not wholly unfamiliar to him. It is quite possible that in estimating the value to the Bishops of his speech, he would be again in a small minority, for it cannot have been regarded by them as helpful. The great cry nowadays is that the Bishops are all working along a common line in regard to discipline and permissive variations from the Prayer Book, but the Bishop made it clear that each was following his own line, and doing what was right in his own eyes.

Of those who spoke in opposition to the resolution, Sir Thomas Inskip was the most prominent. He contented himself with asking the Archbishop to withdraw the motion as inexpedient at the present time. He shewed it was more likely to be a hindrance to the work of the Church than a help. The debate was closed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, who made a long speech to a tired house, and ended with a pathetic appeal to the members, specially of the House of Laity, to give assistance in what he conceived to be for the interests of the Church, and finally based that appeal on personal considerations of his own "harrassed and pressed life." No doubt this appeal made a difference to some; anyhow, it secured the withdrawal of a compromising amendment, but it lowered the Archbishop in the estimation of most people. Great questions are not rightly solved on grounds of personal considerations. The final voting was overwhelmingly in favour of the resolution, and we must now regard the relations of Church and State as a subject for thought and discussion if not of controversy for the coming year. It may prove a soporific for the Bishops' uneasy consciences, as the Archbishop of York seems to think, but it cannot justify what has been this week frequently described as "extra-legal administrative action," a more pleasant sounding phrase than the more usual illegality.

St. Faith's House, Tarrytown.

This is not an appeal for money. It is not even a plea for mercy. It is a cry for justice, for the discharge of duty. "Women and children first!" That claim cannot be slighted without shame and dishonor, and what claim in this regard is more insistent than that of the ignorant, unmarried mother, herself still a child, who was baptized at the Church's font, and communicated at her altar? St. Faith's House, at Tarrytown, is, so far as I know, the only place in New York State in which the Church provides shelter where such a mother can come with her infant, and not be cut off from the saving sacraments of cleansing and renewal. Shall the Church prove to such an one a mother, or a step-mother? Will not those who read this remember that this shelter exists, and guide thither those who need what St. Faith's House stands ready to give, and has given to scores of girls, many of whom are now living happy married lives?

Russians Risk Their Lives to Get the Gospel.

The American Tract Society is furnishing tracts, in Russian, to counteract the movement of the Soviet Republic to make Russia a Godless country. Twelve thousand tracts have already been distributed in Russia and twenty-four thousand more are being sent by the urgent request of missionaries who are carrying on their work in spite of the drastic restrictions of the authorities. The parts of Russia reached are not named because of the danger to those who are risking their lives to get the Gospel.

Philippine Notes.

Bishop Mosher made a special visitation to Balbalasang in order to confirm a class before the Rev. A. H. Richardson's departure on furlough. This was the fourth class confirmed there, the figures being 10, 12, 18 and 20. The Bishop found much evidence of a deeper understanding of all that the Church means. Mr. Richardson's furlough was due and it was necessary for him to take it, but there is no priest to appoint in his place and apparently Deaconess Massey may be left alone there for eight months.

Another vacancy exists at Zamboanga where Canon Harvey has been filling in for several months instead of doing his special work as missioner, discovering and ministering to isolated Americans throughout the islands. The important work among the Moslems is at Zamboanga, results from which are slow and difficult to secure. Some one writes of it:

"When recruits to the personnel staff and gifts of money seem to go more readily to those phases of the work of the Philippine Mission which produce the larger number of baptized and confirmed persons, we who work among the Mohammedans wonder if the Church at large is not losing sight of the command of our Lord to tell the Gospel to all men irrespective of their apparent or immediate response to it."

The work in Upi is developing in unforeseen directions. It was at first expected that this would be almost if not entirely confined to the Tirurai tribe, but the whole Cotabato Valley is opening, new people are crowding in, taking up land and settling permanently Non-Christians who come to the church are being baptized and confirmed, some who have been confirmed are being received. The entire number presented to the Bishop at his last visitation was forty-one, of four or five races or racial mixtures.

The Bishop writes of the beauty of the trail, which goes through magnificent forest. One stretch of the trail crosses a mountain stream about thirty times and exhausted the whole party. Nearly all the hob-nails were worn off the bishops shoes, and a new sole gave way entirely in five days. Yet this trail is on the probable line of a projected highway, and it is not in the least unlikely the region may be easily accessible by motor within the next few years. There is the more urgency that the Church's work should be adequately supported.

St. Stephen's Chinese Mission, Manila, suffers by the death of a Chinese gentleman, who in the past twenty years developed from a non-Christian boy into one of the finest Christian characters ever known to Mr. Studley, the head of mission. Mr. Lo Fo Hing was a trusted adviser and co-laborer for more than fifteen years, treasurer of the mission for more than eleven years of that time, delegate to various synods, including the triennial synod of the Chinese Church in 1924; a lay reader, who gathered the congregation, read the services, interpreted the sermons when he did not deliver the address himself. He brought his wife, ten children, and at least six cousins, to baptism, as well as many others.

Brent School, Baguio, was visited recently by the governor-general of Hongkong, Sir Cecil Clementi, and Lady Clementi. The school is full, and has many urgent needs of larger equipment as well as endowment.

February 10 to 14 are the dates of the twenty-second annual convocation of the Philippine Mission, with its accompanying conference, to be built around the theme, The Evangelistic Work of the Mission.

World Day of Prayer.

March 7, 1930, has been designated as a 'World Day of Prayer" by the Council of Women for Home Missions and the Federation of Woman's Boards of Foreign Missions of North America. They have issued:

A CALL TO PRAYER

"And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me."—John 12:32.

You are earnestly invited to join with Christians of all lands in a World Fellowship of prayer on March 7, 1930, by attending the service in your community on that day; also to unite with others in daily prayer with one accord during this nineteen hundredth anniversary of Pentecost.

"Evening, and morning, and at noon will I pray . . . and He shall hear my voice."—Psalm 55:17.

The following subjects for prayer, which were outlined for us by a young woman of the Philippines, may well claim our waking moments each new day:

Sunday Pray: That all those in the Church of Christ may, in preparation for the World Day of Prayer, March 7, 1930, give themselves earnestly to the ministry of intercession.

Monday Pray: That we may be filled with the spirit of the Master, and may manifest the devotion and sacrifice of the early disciples, among them women, who followed Him.

Tuesday Pray: That the Light of God's Word may dawn upon the minds and guide the lives of all earnest seekers after righteousness.

Wednesday Pray: That there be an awakening among Christians to their opportunity to witness for Christ, and that those who have not yet come to know the Lord may find Him through a vital Christian experience.

Thursday Pray: That the Youth of the World may consecrate all their powers to the building of God's Kingdom and may with rejoicing testify to Him and His power through their lives and message.

Friday Pray: That the spirit of love may rule in the affairs of men, and that through a better understanding all races may be drawn into a universal brotherhood.

Saturday Pray: That in 1930, on this nineteen hundredth anniversary of Pentecost, the Christian Church in all lands may experience anew the power of the Holy Spirit, and that Jesus may again be lifted up through a revival of the simple daily witnessing of His followers.

Pray for Cessation of Russian Persecution.

Persecution of Christians and of peoples of any religion whatsoever has reached such an unbelievable and fearful extent, in Russia that protests are coming from all around the world and prayers are being offered.

The Southern Churchman adds its voice to that of Bishop Manning in urging all Church people, on March 19, to join in united prayer for their fellow Church people, suffering persecution in Russia today.

From the pulpit of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York City, Bishop William T. Manning, on Sunday, February 16, said:

"In view of the facts brought to public attention in the past week, I feel called upon to make a statement this morning from the pulpit of this cathedral in regard to the religious persecutions which have been carried on and are now being prosecuted even more relentlessly by the Soviet government in Russia.

"You have doubtless read the solemn protest against these crimes made by His Holiness Pope Pius XI in Rome and by the Archbishops of Canterbury and York in England, and as Bishop of this Diocese of New York, I feel that I must speak, as I hope the ministers of all faiths will speak, in support of these protests.

"It is not necessary to elaborate. We all know that the Soviet government is seeking, by propaganda and by force, to destroy religion and to destroy also those moral ideals which religion has given to the world and that its attacks are directed not against those of any one faith but against all who believe in God. I myself have seen the most blasphemous, revolting and obscene pictures issued as a part of this propaganda in papers published and circulated under the auspices of the Soviet government.

"The Archbishop of Canterbury says, 'It is not easy to get accurate information about anything happening in Russia, but none can question the truth of the long and shocking tale of imprisonment, exile and deliberate putting to death of prelates and parish priests, of monks, and nuns and of the humblest folk. It is not only one form of religion that has been assailed; it is every sort of belief in God. As Christian men, here and now, as Christian bishops, we cannot keep silent.'

"His Holiness Pope Pius says that 'the horrible, sacrilegious iniquities which have been committted grow worse every day' and urges all Christians to join him in prayer on March 19 for the cessation of the Bolshevist persecutions. In accordance with this suggestion, made by the head of the great Roman Catholic communion, I ask all our clergy and people in this diocese, in their churches, in their homes, and wherever they may be on that day, to offer up their prayers to God for the ending of these persecutions, and I announce that on the Sunday nearest to that date, March 16, at 4 P. M., we shall hold in this cathedral, in conjunction with the Greater New York Federation of Churches, a special service of prayer and intercession in behalf of those who are suffering from these persecutions and also for their persecutors, that they may repent and find forgiveness from God for their deeds.

"At this service of intercession, people of all faiths are invited to attend and ministers of all faiths are invited to seats in the choir.

"I ask you all to make it known that we are to hold this special service of united prayer and intercession for our brethren in Russia and, in the meantime, to offer your prayers daily to God that He will give help and relief to those now suffering persecution in that unhappy land."

Rabbi Stephen S. Wise of New York City has added his protest and expressed approval of the plan for a service of intercession.

Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin, President of the Union Theological Seminary, said that he was very much in sympathy with the idea of the service.

The Rev. Dr. Selden P. Delany, rector of the Church of St. Mary the Virgin, New York City, announced that a period of special intercession for the people of Russia would be observed by his church on St. Joseph's Day, March 19.

The Rev. Dr. William B. Millar, executive secretary of the Greater New York Federation of Churches, said that many ministers of all denominations would invite their congregations to pray on March 19 for those persecuted and to participate in the cathedral service on March 16. Dr. Millar said that the protest was strictly the idea of Bishop Manning and that the service would be one for intercession and prayer rather than for any formal protest.

In Munich, Baravia, Cardinal Faulhaber in a sermon on February 10, said:

"Before our eyes terrible tragedies are being here enacted—the attempt of Russian Bolshevism to rule a nation without God, to erect a State that ignores the Ten Commandments, to build up a new system of culture without belief in the soul or the world hereafter and to teach a political economy that refuses to recognize private property.

"During the years 1919 to 1929 laws have been enacted in Russia for the systematic destruction of all religions. Russia today offers a terrible picture of moral depravity and misery of children that appeals to the heavens. Adolescent youth is without any distipline, marriage and family life have sunk below the level of African tribes.

"What is the attitude of the other European powers to this situation? Not only Europe but the whole world is deeply concerned in this matter, if only by its material aspect. Wages in Russia today are lower than anywhere else in the world.

"If England raises her voice against the Russian's sanguinary justice, can Germany remain silent, or have our diplomatic relations to Russia shut our mouth? German people, sell not your soul for a copper mine."

The Church of England Newspaper carries the following extract of a letter written from Belgrade to the Bishop of Chelmsford (Dr. Wilson) by the Metropolitan Antony, President of the Russian Episcopal Synod:

"According to our latest information, thirty-one Bishops, 1,560 clergymen, and more than 7,000 monks and nuns have been killed without trial or hearing solely for acknowledging our Lord. Forty-eight Bishops, 3,700 clergymen, and more than 8,000 monks and nuns are languishing in prison. The Books of Holy Scriptures are being banished from libraries; their reading aloud, especially to children, inflicts a death sentence; public burnings of gospels and saints' images have been organized. Innumerable churches have been transformed into taverns and cinemas."

The paper also quotes Bishop Nikolai, head of Russian Orthodox Church in London, who has addressed a letter to Christian Protest Movement, in which he says: "We have before us the case of the graduate of the Spiritual Academy of Moscow, a teacher in the seminary of Voroneizh, Father Nectarius. He is first beaten and dragged by the feet through the garden. Then his arms and legs are broken, his genital organs are ripped off, and wooden nails are driven into his head, his temples and his nails. Then they pour molten lead into his mouth, thus sacrilegiously deriding the Sacrament of the Holy Eucharist, and finally throwing him into a cauldron of boiling water. . . .

"Andronicus, Archbishop of Perm, was dragged along the streets of the city with his eyes poked out and his cheeks cut out, in the eyes of his flock, which had lost its reason from terror. And later he, together with Theophanes, Bishop of Solikamsk and forty others, men, monks, priests and Archimandrites was killed. Who could imagine the possibility of such terrible human slaughter in the Twentieth Century?

"Archimandrite Demetrius had the skin of his head cut and ripped off, together with the hair, and only then was killed. Theodore, a priest of the Diocese of Oerenburg, was 'dispatched' by a winding process. A cobbler's thread was soaped, tied round his head, a nail was put through the thread, and the thread was wound round it till his skull broke away from the head like a cup. Then, in the presence of their wives, who had completely lost their reason, two priests were killed—one who had just finished celebrating the Liturgy was crushed in a vice, the other was crucified.

"Hermogen, Bishop of Tobolsk, was tied up alive to a steamer's wheel. Bishop Ambrose was tied to the tail of a frenzied horse. Bishop Isidorus was put on a stake alive. And the Benjamins, the Vladimirs, the Platos, and the tens of thousand of the priestly, monastic and lay orders whose names are known to the Lord alone, the terrible mystery of their sufferings is concealed by the dark crypts of the grim 'Cheka.' And the seventy-five Orthodox clergymen who were recently shot at Khabarowski, about one of whom it was cynically stated that for six years he was kept in such unendurable conditions that 'even a dog would have died from them'."

Rt. Rev. H. St. George Tucker, Bishop.

Christian Men's Convention.

A convention for Christian men under the auspices of the Laymen's Missionary Movement, will be held in Richmond, March 3 and 4.

Sessions at 10:30 A. M. and 2:30 P. M. will be held both days in St. Paul's Protestant Episcopal Church. Evening sessions will be held in the First Baptist Church at 7:45 P. M.

The Convention Committee, of which Mr. Oliver J. Sands is chairman, has issued the following call:

The rallying call for every one who acknowledges Jesus Christ as Saviour and Lord should be, "The Kingdoms of this world must become the Kingdoms of our Lord and of His Christ"—must if man's chief end is to be attained; must if civilization itself is to endure. Nothing approaching in importance such a consummation is, or could be, proposed in the world today. The extension of the Kingdom of God into every part of the earth is the supreme demand of the hour.

The Laymen's Missionary Movement was inaugurated in order to quicken men into a recognition of this task as being the thing most worth while. Hence, the plan to gather into conventions the men of the different communions for the purpose of learning and prayerfully considering the facts, the conviction being that such information and consideration will result in stimulating them to effective action.

It is for such a convention that this call is issued. It will be held in the city of Richmond, Va., March 3 and 4, 1930, and will be addressed by men who are directing and participating in the missionary undertaking both at home and abroad.

The Convention Committee.

John B. Sleman, of Washington, D. C., a layman, impressed by the unselfish devotion of hundreds of young men and women volunteers for missionary service attending the Student Volunteer Movement Convention in Nashville in 1905, conceived the idea of an unaffiliated companion movement—the Laymen's Missionary Movement.

This is a voluntary movement and is purely educational and inspirational, all communions or denominations participating unofficially. It is neither a federating nor a unionizing movement nor an agency for collecting money.

It purposes to enlist and quicken laymen into fuller allegiance to our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ in efforts for the advancement of His Kingdom throughout the world—through loyal service within their respective communions.

All Convention expenses are provided in advance, each man paying a registration fee of one dollar for a delegate's ticket.

Address all communications to: Laymen's Missionary Movement, 911 Grace-American Building, Richmond, Virginia.

GEORGIA.

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

Executive Meetings.

Meetings of the Diocesan Departments and of the Executive Council were held February 19 and 20, in Christ Church, with the Bishop, the Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., presiding at the meetings and being the celebrant at the service of the Holy Communion held in the Chapel of Christ Church. At the meeting of the Executive Council, before receiving the reports from the various departments, Bishop Reese paid a tribute to the late Presiding Bishop, the Most Rev. Charles Palmerston Anderson, lamenting the great loss the Church has sustained in his death and citing instances of the splendid work he had accomplished in the three months he held the office of Presiding Bishop.

The Rev. David R. Covell, Secretary of the Field Department of the National Council, addressed the Council with reference to two missionary projects he believed the diocese would be interested in taking up to forward the Pentecostal year; the building of a rectory at Christiansted, St. Croix, V. I., and the other a chapel at Calienthe, Nevada, at a cost of $2,500 each, the Woman's Auxiliary to do away with the Corporate Gift this year and assist in raising this amount. The Council decided to accept the two projects and will so notify the Diocesan Convention when it meets in May. The Rev. Mr. Covell will attend the convention and address the delegates on the subject to the intent that they may carry back to their parishes complete and enthusiastic information on the subject. The offering for the two projects will be presented on one of the Sundays after the Epiphany in 1931.

The Department of Religious Education reported that the Diocese of Georgia now has 672 N. A. T. A. credits, fifteen diploma teachers and a diocesan teaching faculty of seventeen. Twenty-two Church Schools sent Christmas boxes as assigned them and the Birthday Thank Offering is growing in popularity, nearly half as much having been received in 1929 as was given in the three previous years, when, at the General Convention, Georgia stood fifth from the top.

The Bishop has offered, as is his custom, a banner to the white and colored schools having the largest per capita Easter offering. Mrs. F. B. Screven, who has completed a course in writing Braille, has offered her services to the Diocesan Department of Religious Education and is ready to send Current Events to those of the diocese who furnish her their names and addresses.

The Department of Christian Social service has sent out a questionnaire to every Diocesan Department of Social Service in the country for information as to the work being undertaken by each diocese. As soon as answers are received from fifty per cent of the questionnaires, the information will be compiled and used in a social service survey of the diocese. In the meantime a questionnaire sent to the parishes and missions of the diocese by the Rev. H. S. Cobey, Vice-Chairman of the Department, shows a tremendous amount of unrecorded, but constructive Christian social work is being done by them. The next meeting of the Council will be held the day before the Diocesan Convention convenes at Thomasville, in May of this year.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., Bishop

Washington Cathedral Sunday.

In accordance with a custom of long standing the Sunday nearest Washington's Birthday, February 23 this year, was observed as Washington Cathedral Sunday. This practice has been followed for many years to enable parishes throughout the country to aid in bringing to fruition our first President's plan for "a Church for national purposes" in the Capital of the Nation.

Members of the Episcopal Church in the Senate and House of Representatives were specially invited to attend the People's Evensong in Bethlehem Chapel of Washington Cathedral, at 4 P. M., when the Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, Bishop of Washington, preached the sermon. This service and sermon were broadcast over WRC.

At the eleven o'clock morning service at the Cathedral on February 23, the preacher was the Rt. Rev. Samuel B. Booth, Bishop Coadjutor of Vermont, who has been in Washington attending a Conference of the College of Preachers. He also addressed the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, which held its Annual Corporate Communion, breakfast and conferences on Mount Saint Alban, on February 22.

The Washington Federation of Churches is planning its annual noonday Lenten services, which will begin March 17 and continue for five weeks. They will be held daily, from 12:20 to 1:00 o'clock in the First Congregational Church. Speakers will include Dr. Ralph W. Sockman, pastor of the Madison Avenue M. E. Church, New York City, and Dr. Peter Ainslie, pastor of the Christian Temple in Baltimore, each of whom will give addresses for five days.

This is also true of Dr. J. R. Sizoo, pastor of the New York Avenue Church of this city, and Dr. A. Earl Kernahan, evangelist leader, who is making his home here.

Five local pastors have accepted invitations to speak during the series.

The annual Easter sunrise service will be held at seven o'clock Easter morning at Temple Heights. In this service various young people's organizations of the District will cooperate.

Courses of Lectures.

Washington Cathedral will again sponsor several courses of lectures during Lent, as has been done for several years. The series for this Lent will be as follows: "The Holy Spirit in the Church and in the Christian," by Bishop Rhinelander, in St. John's Church, Sixteenth Street, on Thursday, beginning March 20, at 8 P. M.

A course of lectures by Canon Stokes, in St. Paul's Church, Rock Creek Parish, Wednesdays, 7:30 P. M.

The "Sermon on the Mount," by Mr. William C. Sturgis, in St. John's Church, Georgetown, Wednesdays at 8 P. M.

Lectures by Canon Freeland Peter in the Chapel of the Resurrection, Washington Cathedral.

M. M. W.

MARYLAND.

Rt. Rev. E. T. Helfenstein, D. D., Bishop.

St. Johns' Church, Hagerstown.

The Rev. Walter Byron Stehl, D. D., rector of St. John's Church, Hagerstown, Maryland, will be the Lenten preacher at St. Peter's Church, Albany, March 24-27, and at St. Paul's Cathedral, Buffalo, April 7-11.

Dr. Stehl has also been asked to hold a Mission at Berkely Springs, W. Va., the date to be announced later. He will preach in Baltimore, April 2.

St. John's Parish paid its full quota of the apportionment for 1929 ($4,675), the largest amount in the diocese outside of the largest parishes in Baltimore. St. John's has pledged the same amount for 1930.

Three delegates from St. John's attended the Young People's Conference held during January at All Saints' Parish, Frederick, Maryland, and made a report later.

On Sunday evenings before service, there is a musical prelude on the Brugh Memorial Organ, a four manual organ and one of the largest in the State, recently installed in St. John's Church.

On a recent Sunday a picture was taken of the large vested choir with the magnificent altar and reredos as a background. This photograph will go in the Magazine of The Federated Musical Societies of America, of which Mrs. J. C. Byron of Hagerstown, is regional president.

COLLECT FOR QUINQUAGESIMA SUNDAY.

O Lord, Who hast taught us that all our doings without charity are nothing worth; send Thy Holy Ghost, and pour into our hearts that most excellent gift of all virtues, without which whatsoever liveth is counted dead before Thee. Grant this for Thine only Son Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

COLLECT FOR ASH-WEDNESDAY.

Almighty and everlasting God, Who hatest nothing that Thou hast made, and dost forgive the sins of all those who are penitent; create and make in us new and contrite hearts, that we, worthily lamenting our sins and acknowledging our wretchedness, may obtain of Thee the God of all mercy, perfect remission and forgiveness; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Day-Star.

There is only one place in the New Testament, as far as I know, wherein the term "the day-star" is used, but we have an echo of the same idea in the Apocalypse wherein our Lord Himself is made to say: "I am the root and offspring of David, and the bright and morning star." Closely resembling both is the famous Pauline expression: "God who of old commanded the light to shine out of darkness hath shined in our hearts to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ."

The beauty of the image employed in each case renders it the most appropriate that could have been chosen to express a truth of the spiritual life that urgently needs to be recovered today. We can have, we ought to have, knowledge of Christ as a positive personal possession, something we are absolutely sure of, a divine guiding light within our souls, the harbinger of the glory that awaits us when the veil between sense and spirit is done away for ever. We can anticipate in a measure, as it were, through habitual communion with our ever-living, ever-loving Lord, the blessed consummation towards which the gospel points. As Dr. Swete would put it, an earnest of the life eternal thus become ours here and now. The principal value of the Christian revelation is that it really does put us in touch with what is beyond and above all that is merely of the natural man, all change and decay, all darkness and death. It really does unite us to the immutable and imperishable good for which we are constituted and are meant to achieve; in a manner of speaking it puts us in immediate possession of that which will survive when this world and everything therein has vanished like clouds and shadows before the ascending light of the morning.

By its ability to do this the religion of Jesus stands or fails If people only understood better what it is and what it promises they could not possibly view it with indifference. Christianity is not primarily a set of rules for good behavior; it is not a code of conduct; it is not principally good advice as to how to live. It is the infusion of a new principle into our hearts in response to faith; it is the letting through of the love of God and the joy of heaven into our earthbound souls, the shattering of the dominion of a delusion, the delusion of materiality; it is a perpetual miracle, the miracle of the impartation of God's own life to the believer through Jesus Christ our Lord. This is the literal truth; it is the secret of the vitality of the Gospel in the world today as in every other day, our title to participate at once and indefeasibly in the eternal and divine substance whence all goodness flows.—Rev. R. J. Campbell.

The Church's Call to Laymen.

"The laymen of the Church today constitute our greatest undeveloped resource, and the enlistment, training and direction of these laymen in organized personal evangelism is our most urgent need and duty. It is a common saying that ninety per cent of the work of the Church is done by ten per cent of the members, and too often this is true. We hear much about the problem of reaching the unreached, but that is not our real problem: that is simply our task. Our real problem is employing the unemployed; getting idle Christians and nominal Christians frankly to accept their personal responsibility for definite Christian service. Too many Christians have a merely negative religion, a futile piety; as some one has said they are "good, but good for nothing." They are nonentities, so far as definite service in the spread of the Kingdom of God is concerned.

We join in singing the great martial hymns of the church, "Onward Christian Soldiers, Marching as to War!" "Stand up, Stand up for Jesus, Ye Soldiers of the Cross!" but in too many parishes the Church reminds us not of an army going forth to battle, but of a hospital with a large number of patients and a few over-worked nurses. There are many rectors that are kept busy nursing sick Christians so that they have no time for going out into the highways and hedges to constrain others to come in.

While we all rejoice in the increased number of Confirmations recorded last year (1928). It is well for us to remember that a large proportion of these represent simply our own children growing up in the Church School, and some of the others are persons already Christians, but members of other Communions who have for one reason or another come into the Episcopal Church. If we take the number of adult baptisms as representing approximately the number of conversions, of non-Christians led into fellowship of His Church, we shall find that (according to the figures in the Living Church Almanac), it takes 109 communicants in the Church a whole year to win one convert. And if we estimate that (as is probably the case) at least half of these are brought in by efforts of the clergy, it would mean that not one layman in two hundred has by definite cooperation brought in a single soul to Christ during the entire year."

The above soul-searching message is given to men by men—the Brotherhood of St. Andrew through its Secretary, Mr. Leon C. Palmer, calls the laymen to halt and ask, "Lord, is it I?"—Exchange.

George Washington: The Imperial Man.

Under the historic old elm at Boston, in 1875, the one hundredth anniversary of Washington's taking command of the American army, James Russell Lowell wrote his immortal poem on Virginia, beginning with these words:

"Virginia gave us this imperial man
Cast in the massive mould
Of those high-statured ages old,
Which into grander forms our mortal metal ran;
She gave us this unblemished gentleman."

Washington is still our imperial man, despite the criticism of some modern biographers who apparently take pleasure in emphasizing every possible flaw or weakness in his personal conduct and judgment. In biography and history let us have the truth, "though the heavens fall," but what is to be gained by emphasizing the faults or infirmities of our great men—as if it were of greater importance to know their defects than their virtues and achievements

It is true that Washington has suffered at the hands of some of his early biographers, like Parson Weems, who put him on a pedestal and made him a super-human being—"he could not tell a lie." (No wonder Mark Twain, in his characteristic way, said: "I'm greater than George Washington. He couldn't tell a lie, but I can—but I won't.") But modern biographers, seeking the truth, do not have to take the other extreme to prove that Washington was a human being of flesh and blood.

One of these biographers, however, pays Washington this tribute: "His strongest quality was fortitude. The fighter who stays in the ring as long as he can stand on his feet, the man who keeps his business alive while his clothes are threadbare and his stomach empty, the captain who clings to his ship while there is a plank afloat—that is Washington."

But is the restriction he hastens to add either necessary or just? "This quality implies sincerity, courage, and honesty of purpose, but it does not imply intellect or good judgment."

Is there any reason why we should no longer trust the judgment of Washington's contemporaries as to his ability and character? How was Washington regarded by the men of his day who were well acquainted with him and his achievements? Did they consider him a poor general and incompetent leader, whose intellect was mediocre and whose judgment was not very trustworthy? Henry Lee (the father of Robert E. Lee) had been a gallant soldier in the Revolutionary War, and was a member of Congress when Washington died. He was chosen to deliver a memorial address, and his opening words were these: "Our Washington is no more! the hero, the patriot, and the sage of America. . . . the man on whom in times of danger, every eye was turned and all hopes were placed . . . lives now only in his own great actions, and in the hearts of an affectionate and afflicted people."

Chief justice John Marshall, in the closing paragraph of his life of Washington, says: "Endowed by nature with a sound judgment and an accurate discriminating mind, he feared not the laborious attention which made him perfectly master of those subjects, in all their relations, on which he was to decide; and this essential quality was guided by an unvarying sense of moral right, which would tolerate the employment only of those means that would bear the most rigid examination; by a fairness of intention which neither sought nor required disguise; and by a purity of virtue which was not only untainted, but unsuspected."

To these testimonies we may add one more, that of Thomas Jefferson, who certainly was not under any hypnotic influence of Washington. Jefferson said: "His integrity was most pure, his justice the most inflexible I have ever known, no motives of interest or consanguinity or friendship or hatred being able to bias his decision. He was indeed, in every sense of the word, a wise, a good, and a great man."

Few came in touch with Washington without feeling the greatness of the man. Woodrow Wilson says: "The singular majesty and poise of this revolutionary hero struck the French officers as infinitely more remarkable than his mastery in the field and his ascendancy in the council. They had looked to find him great in action, but they had not thought to see him a great gentleman, a man after their own kind in grace and courtesy and tact, and yet so lifted above the manner of courts and drawing-rooms by an incommunicable quality of grave sincerity that they were at a loss how to describe it. No one could tell whether it were a gift of the mind or of the heart. It was certain only that it constituted the atmosphere and apotheosis of the man." —Dr. H. H. Smith, in Exchange.

INTO THE LIGHT.

I had a grief so hard to bear
I hid it from the Master's sight.
I said to Him, "It is not there."
Alone I tried to make it right.

But O the darkness and the pain,
The bitter loneliness and grief
Of searching for some hidden gain,
Some secret pathway of relief!

"Alone, alone!" my spirit cried,
And then I looked through tears to see
The Christ was standing by my side
To share my lonely grief with me.

I bear it still, my bitter cross,
But I have seen beyond the tears
The smile of One who feels my loss
And will sustain me through the years.

An Object Lesson.

Dora N. Kromer.

The 'phone bell rank sharply just as I took my seat by the window to finish some sewing. It was my friend, Mrs. White, on the other end of the line and she had a tale of woe to pour into my listening ear. She lives in another part of the city and she had been more than annoyed by some children of the neighborhood, especially a "certain bunch of boys, who were vicious in the extreme and couldn't even play games properly. The world is getting worse and worse every day," she said, "and as for the churches, they were accomplishing very little to remedy such conditions."

Mrs. White is not a member of any church and seldom attends one, except to hear some exceptionally good music or a celebrated clergyman. I sympathized with her as well as I could, ignoring her fling against churches and sat down again to my sewing, a trifle disturbed.

A shout from outside drew my attention to a number of boys, playing football in a vacant lot nearby. I am not familiar with the rules of the game. I have seen several games, too, and my impression was that it was a decidedly rough game, sometimes ending with serious injury to some player.

In this "bunch of boys" was one, a little taller than the others and another one, who had lost one leg and used crutches. I never before saw football played the way they played it. The tall boy had a very quick eye for the movements of that ball — seemed to know just about where it would land and just when to push back into safety the crippled boy and just when to let him stay near it, so he could touch it with the tip of his waving crutch and the otherboys joined in the game in the same spirit. There was a radiant look of joy upon the face of the boy who must carry through life his terrible affliction. I recognized the rule of that game. It was the "Golden Rule," and as I watched them play and recalled the stories, centuries old, of nations whose rule it was to destroy the crippled and maimed children, as useless, my heart warmed with this evidence of Christianity and I only wished that my friend, Mrs. White, could be near by to see it, too.

Einstein.

No. This is not an effort to comment on relativity; but to speak words of appreciation of the man himself. Mr. Einstein seems to have greatly surprised the cocksure cynics when he frankly declared in an interview in The Saturday Evening Post the other day that he is "enthralled by the luminous figure of the Nazarene." They evidently expected him to sneer at Jesus as our superficial young smart alecks in America have been doing lately, as, for example, young Barnes of Smith College; but Mr. Einstein didn't curl his lips and sneer. Rather, he seems to have reverently declared his desire to "see Jesus." Hear him in this interview:

"To what extent are you influenced by Christianity?"

"As a child, I received instruction both in the Bible and in the Talmud. I am a Jew, but I am enthralled by the luminous figure of the Nazarene."

"Have you read Emil Ludwig's book on Jesus?"

"Emil Ludwig's Jesus," Einstein replied, "is shallow. Jesus is too colossal for the pen of phrasemongers, however artful. No man can dispose of Christianity with a bon mot."

"You accept the historical existence of Jesus?"

"Unquestionably. No one can read the Gospels without feeling the actual presence of Jesus. His personality pulsates in every word. No myth is filled with such life. How different, for instance, is the impression which we receive from an account of legendary heroes of antiquity like Theseus. Theseus and other heroes of his type lack the authentic vitality of Jesus."—Christian Index.

A Prayer For Unity.

"O God, who didst plan the Gospel for an undivided Church, refuse not, because of the misunderstandings of its message which rend the unity of Christendom, to continue Thy saving work in the broken order of our making. Prosper the labour of all Churches bearing the name of Christ and striving to further righteousness and faith in Him. Help us to place the truth above our conception of it and joyfully to recognize the presence of Thy Holy Spirit wherever He may choose to dwell among men. Teach us wherein we are sectarian in our contention and give us grace humbly to confess our fault to those whom in past days, our communion has driven from its fellowship by ecclesiastical tyranny, spiritual barrenness or moral inefficiency, that we may become worthy and competent to bind up in the Church the wounds of which we are guilty and so to hasten the day when there will be one flock under one Shepherd, Jesus Christ, our Lord."—Bishop Brent.

YE WEARY.

F. B. Stone.

"Come unto me, ye weary,
And I will give you rest."
Not wait until the end of life,
Come, every day be blest.

I am the way of life, not death,
And life is what you need,
More life for every day and hour,
To follow where I lead.

On earth I oft was weary, too
And sought my Father's rest
And as He gave new life to me
I would have thee, too, blest.

O come to me, my life receive,
For body, soul and mind,
And as you use it for my sake,
Life more abundant find.

"He Became Poor."

Poverty has always been something which Jesus understood. Himself a member of a lowly home, where there was no regular income and every coin had to be expended cautiously, Jesus has always understood the grim nature of the struggles of the poor. Often, on His preaching tours, did He stretch Himself at dusk upon the green grass of some quiet hill, not because He loved the friendly silence of the stars and the caress of the breeze upon His bronzed skin, although He did love them, but because there was no other place for Him to lay His head. The illustrations which He used, show His intimate acquaintance with the vicissitudes of the poor, and one of the characteristics of His work and of the work of the Apostles, a characteristic so striking that it was thought worthy of comment, was that the poor had the Gospel preached to them.—From an article in Canadian Churchman.

A LITTLE PRAYER FOR THE MAN IN THE AIR.

I never hear
The growling diapason of a plane
Up there,
The deep reverb'rant humming of a plane
Up there,
But up to God I wing a little prayer,
Begging His care.
For him who braves the dangers of the air.

"God keep you, Bird-man, in your plane
Up there!
Your wings upbear, your heart sustain!
Give you good flight and oversight,
And bring you safe to earth again!"

I, too, have hostages with fortune up above,
And what may come to you may come to mine.
So, once again—"God speed you as you rove!
Both you and mine to His care I consign."

A CONFESSION OF FAITH.

Charles Nevers Holmes.

In God our Father we believe,
Who gave us soul and birth,
And grants the blessings we receive
Throughout this life on earth.

And we believe in Christ our Lord,
The Christ of peace and love,
The sacred, saintly Son of God,
Who reigns with Him above.

In Christ of Virgin Mary born,
Who for all sinners died
And rose again on Easter Morn,
Our Saviour crucified.

In Holy Ghost that dwelleth here
Upon this earth below,
Our Comforter, unseen and near,
Throughout life's weal and woe.

And we believe that we shall live
Beyond the grave, again,
That God's great mercy will forgive
Our many sins. Amen.

Dao's Sunday School Prize.

If there was one scholar at the Lotus Hill Sunday School who was proud of his attendance record, it was young Dao, generally called Teh-ming ("Life obtained"). He was in a Junior class, and his Chinese teacher was well pleased with him in every way.

"See! Teh-ming," he said, "if you keep right along to the end of this month, you will have beaten all the others. Forty-nine Sundays without a break, and your home the very farthest away of all our scholars!"

The boy grinned with delight; he surely meant to get those three more marks, no matter what happened. He was very keen on his class, because his heart was forever saying, "Tell me more about Jesus." Indeed, if he had not been nyih-sing ("hot-of-heart"), his home folk might easily have damped down the fire. His father—an innkeeper—was of that type so common in China today, a "no-religion man." His mother was careless, though she believed that the idols (and still more the dead ancestors) required some worship, but she was always so busy attending their Kah ("Road-guests") that she had little time for anything else. It was only the old Granny who feared and faithfully followed the Buddhist religion with zeal and strong determination. She would not let Teh-ming sing any of the Christian hymns in or near the house, terrified lest "they might offend the spirits, and cause bad luck." Indeed, she seemed to have an uncanny genius for hearing him if he attempted to sing anywhere around, and would come after him in a rage.

"Be quiet, thou foolish little earth worm, thou stupid puppy dog barking on a dust heap, just asking for a beating." Then Granny would flourish her heavy red lacquer stick which Teh-ming had learned to dread. Though the old lady spoke like this, she was really very fond of the boy, and only afraid lest some "listening" evil spirit might become jealous of her love and cause him to fall sick. She never dared call him Teh-ming ("Obtained life") for fear it might be changed to "Obtained death." Most of her extreme earnestness in worship was to preserve him alive, so that he might offer food and other things at her grave. She only beat him because she thought by so doing to hoodwink those wicked, envy-filled spirits, so that they would not know he was reckoned so precious.

Teh-ming's mind was full now of getting the prize offered for a year's unbroken attendance at Sunday School. It happened to be a very handsomely bound, gold-lettered New Testament, and he had once heard his father remark, "If the Foreign Jesus book is so valuable, why is it printed and sold much cheaper than any of the Chinese holy books?" It was bound in such a poor common style that he was sure it must be of little account.

The boy hoped that if he secured that special copy as a prize, his father would be proud of him, and examine it carefully. The following two weeks he managed to attend, but with increasing difficulty. His Granny had been taken sick and she happened to be worse on "Big Worship Day", so she was sure it was all because Teh-ming was offending the Great Spirit of sickness.

"The influence, if bitter, bad," the Buddhist priest had declared, so Teh-ming was strictly forbidden to go on the third Sunday. It was useless to plead with his father, who was completely ruled by his old mother.

"But, Honorable One, let me go this one time—only once, that I lose not my reward," begged Teh-ming with breathless anxiety.

"What matter? A grandson who desires the useless Foreign Book of lies more than the recovery of his father's most honorable mother is an evil one—a disgrace to his home, and shall surely be punished. Thou shalt not go again."

Poor Teh-ming! Bitterly disappointed he rushed out of the house into a thick bamboo grove, and flung himself down under the trees in despair. At first hot rebellious thoughts of disobedience surged over him, but gradually he remembered his teacher's earnest words about "winning his home folk for Christ." It would certainly not help them to accept the new teaching if he went in defiance of his father.

Teh-ming was no coward. He would willingly have taken any punishment, however severe, but he felt perhaps there was "a more excellent way," and he firmly believed God could make it for him. The last Sunday's lesson had been the passage of Israel through the Red Sea, and the boy believed he had just the same Almighty God today. His prayer was brief, but to the point: "Please take me to Sunday School tomorrow in your own way." He hadn't an idea how it could be done, but he could trust. Next morning at dawn he looked wistfully out of the window, and as the hours passed "his heart began to fall down under his feet."

Suddenly a traveler—a European doctor—came to the Inn, having been held up on the road during the night by bandits and stripped of all his possessions. He was thankful to reach any refuge, and as soon as he heard of the old Granny's illness he asked to see her at once.

After a brief examination he said reassuringly, "I can, with God's help, heal her, but my stock of medicines has been taken with all the rest. I will write a note and prescription to a Chinese doctor I know in the nearest town, and you could go fastest, small brother. While waiting for the medicine, just look in at the Sunday School next door; the girls and boys have such a happy time there."

Teh-ming laughed for sheer joy. Did he not know all about that? The way he started off, he might have been running in a Marathon race. Never was there a quicker messenger that morning than he! He was able to put in an appearance at his class for a short time, so obtaining his mark in the circumstances, and then he started back for home, which he reached in record time.

With God's blessing, his New Testament prize was used to bring his father to Christ. And old Granny, in her gratitude for her recovery by means of the wonder-working foreign medicine, afterward joined them in the Way.—S. S. Times.

The Bell.

Before the war there was a bell in Cologne Cathedral bearing the inscription, "I am the Emperor's bell; I proclaim the Emperor's honour." It had been made out of cannon captured by the Germans from the French, and they evidently did not think it derogatory to God that it should proclaim in the Church honours won in the war.

When I went into the Cathedral two years ago I missed the bell, and asked the janitor what had become of it. "Oh," he said, "in 1918 we had to take it down and melt it to make munitions." What irony of history! War material melted to make a bell, and after more than forty years of proclaiming the Emperor's honour, the bell goes back to make fighting material once more. So much for the honours that can be won in war, and the Empire that can be built with the sword.

"But," said the janitor to me, "we have a new bell now, and a better one." Let us hope that the new bell in Cologne Cathedral is a symbol of new ideals and aspirations, proclaiming, as it should in a church, only the glory of God. I would remove all war trophies from churches, and indeed from everywhere, and put old tanks and guns in the earth or in the sea beyond reach and sight.

When Dr. Stresemann said these words at Geneva: "A real progress has been made in the reconciliation of peoples. Those who deny it are blind or pretend to be blind. The heroism which always manifests itself on the field of battle must, in future, manifest in the conflicts of life, where the true heroes are those who facilitate better relations among men," I thought I heard Germany's new bell.—Rev. T. Rhondda Williams, in Canadian Churchman.

OPEN THE DOOR.

Open the door, let in the sun;
He hath a smile for every one;
He hath made of the raindrops gold and gems,
He may change our tears to diadems—
Open the door!

Open the door of the soul; let in Strong, pure thoughts which will banish sin;
They will grow and bloom with a grace divine,
And their fruit shall be sweeter than that of the vine—
Open the door!

Open the door of the heart; let in Sympathy sweet for stranger and kin;
It will make the halls of the heart so fair
That angels may enter unaware.

You Saved the Mission Fields!

How?

In these four outstanding ways which every Churchman ought to know:

(1) Despite financial depression you paid a greater sum for 1929 than the most optimistic estimate, a total indeed of 100.3% of the sums your Dioceses told the National Council to expect.

(2) Dioceses and Districts did their utmost in pledges for 1930.

(3) Individuals keen to sustain the missionary standards of the Church subscribed liberally beyond normal pledges through the parish.

(4) We cut the appropriations for work centered at the Church Missions House.

For these reasons, based on your loyalty, the National Council was able to say:

THERE WILL BE NO CUT IN MISSION FIELDS IN 1930

Thanks!

Yes, a matter for thanksgiving, but why not make it easier this year by regular monthly payments and constant education in the scope and meaning of the work itself so that parish quotas will be fully met and regularly paid.

ICE BOUND ARCTIC GIVES TRAPPER HEALTH SECRET

Letter from far North tells how he gets through hard Winter full of pep

FROM the far and frozen North—from where man has to fight not only wild animals but still more savage Arctic cold, W. S. MacPhee, trapper and prospector, writes us his secret of health.

Just as he is shut in by the ice and snow of the Northern winter, so most of us are shut in by business or household cares. We cannot get enough exercise, and often we are not able to have proper diet. How simple a thing it is then to keep ourselves buoyantly happy, full of energy, seeing the bright side of life, by taking advantage of this discovery. There is a harmless method of bodily lubrication which gently, naturally, and surely sweeps away the poisons out of our bodies—regularly as clock work.

"Especially in the spring before the ice breaks up and the open water comes," writes Mr. MacPhee, "all us trappers are apt to be in pretty bad shape. In the summer of 1924 I first discovered Nujol. The idea of internal lubrication appealed to me. Soon I found that the irritable, nervous, no-pep feeling was gone. Nujol has certainly given me a different outlook on life."

Remember Nujol is not a medicine; it contains no drugs; it is as colorless and tasteless as pure water; it is not absorbed by the body; it is non-fattening. The only way for you to prove what Nujol can do for your happiness is to start in today. Buy a bottle of Nujol at any drug store and try it for a couple of weeks. It does not work over night; it is not a violent cathartic; you must not expect results until you have been taking Nujol for a little while. It costs but a few cents and it makes you feel like a million dollars. Millions of people are healthy because they are using Nujol. Why shouldn't you be happy, too? Get Nujol today!

A PRAYER FOR THE CHURCHES.

O God, within whose sight
All men have equal right
To worship Thee,
Break every bar that holds
Thy flock in diverse folds;
Thy will from none withholds
Full liberty.

Lord, set Thy churches free
From foolish rivalry!
Lord, make all free!
Let all past bitterness
Now and forever cease,
And all our souls possess
True charity.

—John Oxenham.

The will of Justice Lamar, of the United States Supreme Court, contained these striking and memorable sentences: "My friendships, many and precious, I leave to my family, in the hope that they will be cherished and continued. I know of no enemies, but if such hereafter unhappily arise, let them be forgotten."

The Eternal City

"And the foundations of the wall of the city were garnished with all manner of precious stones. The first foundation was jasper; the second, sapphire; the third, a chalcedony; the fourth, an emerald; The fifth, sardonyx; the sixth, sardius; the seventh, chrysolyte; the eighth, beryl; the ninth, a topaz; the tenth, a chrysoprasus; the eleventh, a jacinth; the twelfth, an amethyst."

Revelation Ch. 21. vs. 19, 20.

John, the beloved disciple, in the above, endeavors to express in human language the most transcendant spiritual beauty and permanence of the heavenly city,—the everlasting city. He selected, singularly enough, to describe the foundations thereof, beautiful crystalline gems, every one of which appears in the minute crystals of

Winnsboro Granite

"The Silk of The Trade"

When the surface of this granite, which is a composite of these actual precious stone crystals, is highly polished, all the scintillating beauty and color of these jewels become visible.

How peculiarly fitting that monuments to loved ones be erected of lasting granite, containing the very gems which the Apostle John mentions in this metaphorical description of the foundations of the walls of the everlasting city, the city of our resurrection hope.

Be sure that "Winnsboro Granite" is specified in your contract for monuments. Like other high quality materials, there are many inferior substitutes, which resemble this granite on first appearance, but do not possess its lasting qualities and permanent beauty, because they contain more deleterious elements, such as water, lime and iron. These elements tend to disintegration and discoloration.

Have your monument dealer furnish you with a personal guarantee from the quarries that the monument you purchase is cut in genuine Winnsboro Granite.

The certificate of the quarries is signed by B H. Heyward, Treas., and General Manager, whose signature insures genuine Winnsboro Granite. A facsimile of this signature is reproduced below.

of St. Michael and All Angels, Baltimore, was held recently at the Lord Baltimore Hotel. Judge Williams, who was an outstanding citizen of Baltimore, was Chief Judge of the Juvenile Court for many years. He also served as President of the Baltimore Press Club, as for about thirty-seven years he was engaged in newspaper work, first with the Hagerstown Mail and later with the Baltimore Sun.

The speakers at the service, which was presided over by Mr. Walter Hough, President of the Baltimore Press Club, included the Honorable Albert Ritchie, Governor of Maryland; the Honorable William Broening, Mayor of Baltimore, and Messrs. Paul Winchester, Folger McKinsey, and Robert Biggs, of the Press and local charitable organizations. The final speaker was the Rev. Charles E. McAllister, rector of the Church of St. Michael and All Angels.

Judge Williams, who was Senior Vestryman of the Parish, died very suddenly, while attending a meeting of the Vestry of St. Michael and All Angels. In addition to being an outstanding citizen he occupied many high positions in the diocese and his loss will be keenly felt.

"The Power Unseen."

The Church at Work was represented in pageantry in "The Power Unseen" under the auspices of the Church Service League of the Diocese of Maryland in the Maryland Casualty Auditorium, Baltimore, on Thursday, February 13.

The pageant was under the direction of Mrs. William Bauernschmidt, Jr., and the music was furnished by St. Paul's Boys' Choir, under the direction of Mr. Edmund S. Ender, Choirmaster.

The St. David's Players presented the pivotal scene from the pageant, a representation of a house party in which the Church work and its value was discussed, and the work of the Church was reviewed as if on a screen. The work room in the Dioecsan House was shown, where many women were engaged in packing jellies, periodicals, surgical dressings, clothing and supplies for hospitals, orphanages and homes. Then each field was represented, showing the worth of the work done by the women and the destination of it all.

Chinese children and women who appeared as patients in the scene depicting a Clinic at St. Elizabeth's Hospital, Shanghai, and the Japanese girl in the scene entitled, "In the Shadow of Fuji-Yama", were fascinating.

Scenes in a Rancher's Home in Arizona, in the Mountains of Virginia, in a Missionary's Home in Northern Minnesota, and a Mission in Alaska, were also enacted.

The most impressive scene was the Epilogue when the Good Spirits carrying lighted tapers, following the Cross, singing "The Church's One Foundation" triumphed over the Evil Spirits.

The pageant was written by Mrs. Herman K. Harrison and Mrs. William H. Laird, and closed a three-day Educational Conference held by the Church Service League in the Church of St. Michael and All Angels, Baltimore. The Rt. Rev. R. E. L. Strider, D. D., and Mrs. Harper Sibley were among the speakers at the Conference.

Memorial Service for Bishop Murray.

In Old St. Paul's Church, Tuesday evening, January 21, Maryland held a Diocesan Memorial for the late Bishop John Gardner Murray, who for twenty years prior to his death on October 3 last had been her strong leader.

The Rev. Dr. Arthur B. Kinsolving, rector of the church, read Evening Prayer, assisted by the Rev. S. Hilton Orrick.

The Rev. Dr. Arthur Chilton Powell, President of the Standing Committee and Mr. Edward Guest Gibson, Chancellor of the Diocese, made the addresses.

The Church Club of the Diocese had the Rt. Rev. Rocksborough Remington Smith, the Lord Bishop of Algoma, as their guest Monday night, February 17, in the clubrooms, 202 South Nineteenth Street, Philadelphia, dinner at 6:30 and at a meeting at 8:15 o'clock the Lord Bishop gave an illustrated description on "Burma", where he spent a number of years as a missionary before he was made a Bishop, and transferred to his work in Canada.

Shakespearian Actor Speaks From Pulpit.

At the invitation of the rector, Bishop DuMoulin, the pulpit of the Church of the Saviour, Philadelphia, Sunday night, was occupied by Mr. Fritz Lieber, the Shakespearian actor and leading member of the Chicago Civic Shakespeare Society, now appearing at the Chestnut Street Opera House, Philadelphia in a repertoire of Shakespeare plays. Mr. Lieber made an address on "The Bible and Shakespeare." Mr. Lieber is a communicant of the Episcopal Church and during Bishop DuMoulin's rectorship in Chicago, the actor was one of his active workers.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. Albert S. Thomas, Bishop.

Typical Southern Churchman Gone.

Walter Hazard, prominent and active Churchman, died suddenly at his home, Georgetown, S. C., February 6, aged seventy years. He was a member of the standing committee and the executive committee of the diocese and represented the diocese in the last three General Conventions. Graduated at Princeton in 1877, he became an active and successful lawyer. He was South Carolina's orator at the Jamestown Exposition, President of the Winyah Indigo Society—probably the oldest American social organization, the membership limited to descendants of the founders—and founder and owner of the Georgetown Inquirer. He had served a number of terms in both houses of the South Carolina Legislature.

He was buried in the ancestral burial place of his family from the Church of St. George, Bishop Thomas officiating, assisted by the Rev. H. D. Bull, the rector. He is survived by two daughters, Misses Paula and Minnie Hazard.

Name of Church Changed.

The name of Christ Church, Charleston, S. C., is to be changed to St. Peter's, according to decision of the Supreme Court of South Carolina. St. Peter's Church is no longer active, but has accumulated funds amounting to about $50,000. The land on which Christ Church stands was conveyed with the proviso that the church always should be known as Christ Church. The court decided that the name of Christ Church should be changed to St. Peter's, to allow funds and land to be combined.

Consequently, Christ Church becomes St. Peter's, and the new rector, the Rev. John H. Morgan, called from Wakefield, N. J., has taken charge. Mr. Morgan is a former resident of Charleston, having officiated as rector there of St. Peter's-by-the-Sea several years ago.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D. Bishop

The Archdeaconry of Williamsport met at Christ Church, Williamsport, on Tuesday, February 11. The Holy Communion was celebrated by Archdeacon McCoy. At the meeting following nominations for the office of Archdeacon were made by the Bishop, the Ven. Charles E. McCoy being reelected Archdeacon for a term of three years. The Tuesday Luncheon Club of Christ Church entertained the visiting clergy at luncheon. At the afternoon session the Rev. Lewis Nichols, of Lock Haven, read a paper on "Anglo-Catholicism." An interesting discussion of the Clergy Placement Plan was led by Bishop Darlington.

The Rev. Francis B. Cannon is now taking care of St. John's Church, South Williamsport, along with other places. It is expected that St. John's will be joined with Milton under his care.

A new heating plant, costing $1,200 has been installed in Trinity Church, Jersey Shore. A payment of $600 has already been made, and the parish hopes that the balance will be paid by Easter.

The clergy of the City of Williamsport are planning Lenten noon-day services at Christ Church. There will be one each Tuesday. The preachers will be drawn from the diocesan clergy.

LEXINGTON.

Rt. Rev. H. P. Almon Abbott, D. D., Bishop.

Dedication of Parish House.

Bishop Abbott dedicated the new Parish House of St. John's Church, Versailles, Kentucky, on Saturday morning, February 15. The rector of the parish, the Rev. Robert J. Murray, and the Coadjutor Bishop of Tennessee, the Rt. Rev. James M. Maxon, D. D., assisted in the service. The new parish house has been given by Senator Camden and Miss Tevis Camden, in memory of Susannah Preston Hart Camden, a former devoted member of the parish. The parish house and chapel, the latter to be dedicated shortly, have cost approximately $75,000. The new buildings complete the necessary equipment of St. John's Church, and they are among the most serviceable and beautiful in the diocese.

Unveiling of Window.

A beautiful window, in memory of the Rev. Jacob S. Shipman and his wife, was unveiled in Christ Church, Cathedral, Lexington, Ky., on Sunday morning, February 16. Bishop Herbert Shipman, of New York, and the Rev. Chas. E. Craik, Jr., Acting Dean of the Cathedral, participated in the unveiling exercises. The sermon, appropriate to the occasion, was preached by the Bishop of Lexington.

Departments Organized.

In accordance with the new canon passed at the recent Convention of the Diocese of Lexington, the Executive Council and Departments was organized on Friday, February 14. A full representation was present, nineteen in all, on call of the Bishop of Lexington. The chairmanship of the departments resulted as follows:

Missions and Church Extension, The Venerable Theodore S. Will.

Religious Education, the Rev. Harold O. Boon.

Field Department, Mr. John Marston, Jr.

Publicity, The Rev. Robert J. Murphy.

Social Service, The Rev. Edward W. Baxter.

Finance, Mr. A. C. Hunter.

Personal Notes

The Rev. Everett H. Jones, formerly rector of Grace Church, Cuero, Texas, accepted a call to St. Paul's Church, Waco, Texas, and left Cuero to assume his new duties February 17.

The Rev. Harold B. Whitehead, formerly of the Diocese of Colorado, has succeeded the Rev. Hubert G. Wrinch as assistant rector of Gethsemane Church, Minneapolis, Minnesota, and took up his duties February 1.

The Rev. Robert Coolidge Masterson, formerly rector of Trinity Church, Lumberton, North Carolina, assumed the rectorship of the Church of the Advent, Washington, D. C., on February 1.

The Rev. Alvin Lamar Wills, formerly pastor of a large Christian Church at Covington, Kentucky, has been appointed assistant rector of the Church of the Epiphany, Washington, D. C. He has been confirmed and will be ordained by Bishop Abbott of Lexington. He will assume his new duties about March 1.

The Rev. J. Jarden Guenther, former associate rector of the Church of St. Paul, Overbrook, Pennsylvania, has accepted a call to Trinity Church, Swarthmore, Pennsylvania.

The Rev. Paul Rafael Rupes Reinhardt, formerly minister-in-charge of St. Luke's Church, Kankakee, Illinois, has been appointed by Bishop Taitt as missionary-in-charge of St. James' Church, Prospect Park, Delaware County, Pennsylvania.

The Rev. W. Herbert Caley, rector of St. Paul's Church, Oaks, Pennsylvania, has accepted a call to the rectorship of St. Alban's Church, Roxborough, Pennsylvania, and assumes his new charge March 1.

The Rev. John R. Crosby, in charge of St. Elizabeth's Church, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, has accepted a call to the rectorship of St. Luke's Church, Seaford, Delaware, and leaves for his new charge at the end of February.

The Rev. Godwin R. Pierce, curate of Christ Church, Ballston Spa, New York, has accepted appointment as curate of St. John's Church, Norristown, Pennsylvania, of which the Rev. James M. Niblo is rector. Mr. Pierce succeeds the Rev. Alonzo Le Wood, who resigned February 1 to spend some time on a trip abroad.

The Rev. Richard I. Brown, of St. Stephen's Church, Louisville, Kentucky, has accepted a call to the South Baldwin rural field, with residence at Fairhope, Ala., in succession to the Rev. Joseph W. Fulford, resigned. Mr. Brown comes to his new field the first of April.

The Rev. T. H. Evans will shortly return to his parish, Christ Church, Tuscaloosa, Ala., from Asheville, North Carolina, where he has been recuperating his health since November last. Mr. Evans' physician pronounces him in fit physical condition to resume the duties of his important field.

The Rev. John Lewis Jenkins, recently of the Methodist Church, on the first of February became assistant to the Rev. R. Bland Mitchell, rector of St. Mary's-on-the-Highlands, Birmingham, Alabama. While preparing for canonical examinations under the guidance of Mr. Mitchell, Mr. Jenkins' special work will be in connection with the newly-developed congregation of All Saints, Homewood, a suburb of Birmingham. Mr. Jenkins comes into the ministry of the Church splendidly equipped and highly recommended by Bishop Dobbs and his other brethren of the Methodist ministry, who kindly refer to him as one of the brightest and most highly educated of their younger clergy.

A MESSAGE FROM GOD.

when I come, Ye who are ready, warn the people. Tell them of My near coming. If they do not heed thee, tell them again. Blow the trumpet in Zion, sound the alarm; your words, if from Me, shall not return void. I will make them burn like fire. Warn the people, whether they hear or forbear, that they may be without excuse. There are many hearts which are hungry; these must be reached. Go ye, My heralds, and sound out the glorious news of My soon coming. My reward is with Me.

My eyes are running to and fro throughout the whole earth to show Myself to those who hunger and thirst after Me. They shall be satisfied. I will pour water upon him that is thirsty and floods upon the dry ground. Open your hearts, O My people, let Me fill you with My infinite fulness. Let Me fit you to go forth into all the world to show forth My glory in renewed lives, in signs, miracles and wonders. Go swiftly, time is short. Wait not, only to tarry for the full endument. Cease from so much talking, be still and know that I am Jehovah in the midst of thee. As Captain of the Lord's hosts am I in the midst of thee.

Not by might, not by organization, not by human planning, but by My own right hand will I lead thee, and grant unto thee power over all the power of the enemy. Move forward. Am not I calling thee? I will girdle the earth with My glory.—Christian Workers' Union.

BISHOP HEBER'S LETTER ON DRUNKENNESS

My Worthy Friend:

I am about to address you on a subject which has long weighed much on my mind, and which I have often wished to mention. Nobody is more convinced than I am of your good heart, your kindness to your family, your laborers, and the poor; your strict honesty, and the other good qualities for which you are known and respected in the neighborhood. Yet there is one point which I would fain see altered in you, and which I cannot help noticing as, perhaps, the last mark of my good wishes for you which I shall ever have in my power to show, now that I am leaving England for a far distant land, and have ceased to be rector of Hodnet. You must be aware that I mean your fondness of liquor. Why should you let this one sin get the better of you, and rob your good qualities and your good principles of their reward? You are as yet young and healthy, and therefore cannot say you need drink to keep you in good spirits—but you yourself well know that neither health nor cheerfulness can long continue to be the portion of a drunkard. Even so far as this world is concerned, how necessary is it that a man should be sober in order that he may prosper. But, when we think on the other world, can we help recollecting that the drunkard is wasting not only his body and his goods, but his immortal soul? I need hardly remind you how often and how earnestly God has forbidden the practice in Scripture. Of all strong drink we find it observed by Solomon, Prov. 23:32, that "at the last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder." "Woe unto them" (saith Isaiah, chapter 5, verse 22,) "that are men of strength to mingle strong drink." "Woe" (he says again, chapter 28, verse 1,) "woe to the crown of pride, to the drunkards of Ephraim." All the other prophets are full of the same declarations, and the texts in the New Testament are still more awful. "If that servant" (saith our Lord) "begin to say in his heart, my lord delayeth his coming, and begins to beat the men-servants and maids and to eat and to drink and be drunken, the lord of that servant will come in a day when he looketh not for him, and in an hour when he is not aware, and will cut him asunder, and appoint him his portion with the unbelievers." "Take heed" (he said in another place) "lest your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, and so that day take you unawares." In the same manner St. Paul, in his epistle to the Romans, bids us "walk honestly as in the day, not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying," where you see he puts drunkenness down in the same list of crimes with whoredom and quarrelling, and puts it first of the three because, indeed, it generally leads to the other two. Thus also we find in Galatians, chapter 5, verses 19, 20, 21, drunkenness classed on the same footing with the very first sins, and those most hateful to God, such as idolatry, and witchcraft, and murder. These things will prove to you that a fondness for strong drink is no trifling matter; that it is a crime marked with the Almighty's heaviest displeasure, and for which, no doubt, a very grievous punishment is in store in another world. Do not suppose, my good friend, that I name these things to you out of disrespect or a desire to give you pain; we have long been neighbors, and you have been a kind and friendly neighbor to me. I sincerely esteem you and wish you well. But it is because I esteem you and wish you well that I send you this long letter; and now I earnestly desire to call upon you as with a voice from the dead, to the number of whom, in my long and perilous voyage, I may perhaps be added, to desire you to lay these things to heart, to fly from temptation, and to remember that your health and prosperity, your life and immortal soul are in danger if you do not fly from the sin which does most easily beset you. God bless you and guide you! May He turn your heart to see the things which belong to your peace, and give you in this world grace and happiness, and in the world to come, everlasting glory.

My best wishes are with you! Believe me ever your sincere friend,

REGINALD HEBER.

—P. R. Nugent.

Not for one single day
Can I discern the way;
But this I know,
Who gives the day
Will show the way,
So I securely go.

To-day well lived makes every yesterday a dream of happiness and every to-morrow a vision of hope.

"Because I live, ye shall live also."

"Whosoever believeth in Me shall never die."

We seem to give him back to Thee, dear God, Who gavest him to us. Yet as Thou didst not lose him in giving—so we have not lost him by his return. Not as the world giveth givest Thou, O lover of souls. What Thou givest, Thou givest not away, for what is Thine is ours always if we are Thine and life is eternal, and love is immortal, and death is only a horizon, and a horizon is only the limit of our sight. Lift us up, strong Son of God, that we may see further; cleanse our eyes that we may see more clearly; draw us closer to Thyself that we may know ourselves nearer to our beloved who are with Thee; and while Thou dost prepare a place for us, prepare us for that happy place that where they are and Thou art we too may be; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

If we seek Him we shall find Him, for He also is seeking for us.

I desire no other evidence of the truth of Christianity than the Lord's Prayer. —Mme. de Stael.

"Love's secret is to be always doing things for God, and not to mind because they are such very little ones."

There is no greater mistake than to suppose that Christmas can impress the world by compromising with it.—Selected.

Our best prayers are intercessions. To thing of others, of our friends, our relations, our enemies, and the whole world is to follow the Master's example.—Floyd W. Tomkins.

Fear not, O little flock
Upon the storm-swept hill;
The Shepherd knows thy path,
He guides thy footsteps still.
His nail-pierced hand shall keep
And hold thee safe and fast:
Fear not, O little flock,
He'll bring thee home at last.
—Adelaide A. Pollard.

The restlessness and dissatisfaction and the feeling after something better, higher and fuller than we have yet experienced is a sign of the leading of the Holy Spirit, who is kindling that hunger and thirst in the souls of men that only He can satisfy.—Healing Church.

The pain of sorrow is readily perceived, but the gain of sorrow is not so easy to recognize. Yet to no experience of our human life do we owe more for the development and the perfecting of our personal character and for the bringing of us into right relations with our fellows and with our God than to the experiences of sorrow.—Henry Clay Trumbull.

You remember the biography of Robert Moffat? There he stands by his broken down wagon, his wife beside him, and ten poisoned spears pointed at his breast. "Slay me if you will," he says. "We have come to bless you. When you have slain me others will come to take up my work." The spears were dropped. "This man has ten lives," said the chief. "There must be another life beyond." Christianity advances by testimony.—Presbyterian Banner.

LET US STAND TRUE

All who study the recorded facts of world history and national and local history must be impressed by the frequency with which calamities have brought rich and enduring blessings. We find it so, too, in our individual lives, experiences and observations. Most of us, looking backward, can trace some of the sweetest happiness and best successes to what we thought disasters. For nations, communities, peoples, war, pestilence, famine, defeat, have brought established peace, health, prosperity and stability and power for good.

Slavery, the overthrow of slavery, the destructive war by which it was overthrown, the resulting period of poverty and distress, have combined to make the South the conservative force of this country in religion, morals, ethics, politics.

> "The Lord loveth whom he chasteneth; and scourgeth every one whom he receiveth."
> "If ye be without chastisement then are ye bastards and not sons."

according to Holy Writ.

Again, the great Shakespeare says in Troilus and Cressida:

> "In the reproof of chance lies the true proof of men."

We have been trained and inured to striving, have learned through years of stress to trust in God, to seek help from Him, to be humbly thankful for what mercies are vouchsafed us. We have been delivered from the twin evils and dangers of the idle rich and inundation of foreign adventurers, perverts and disturbers. Such immigration as we have received has been of congenial kind and readily and happily assimilated. We have in our cities no pest holes of bolshevists and anarchists, in our colleges and universities no centres of native or imported filth, heresies, lunacies and degradation.

Responsibility for maintaining our religious integrity and faith, our established standards of refinement, decency and propriety, is on us now of this generation. The time is now for us to decide and determine by our acts what we shall do. We have struggled bravely, and with God's help, from the slough of material despond. The men and women who lived through the fire and battle and desolation of the Confederacy led us out. It is for us to say whether we shall guide our children and successors to the pit of spiritual darkness and social degeneracy.

Increasing wealth always has brought increasing tendency to religious, moral and social laxity. The atmosphere of the rich North is rank with the poison of atheism, wearing a large variety of names, of corruption spreading itself stealthily or grossly and openly. Much of the Northwest is impregnated with treason against our institutions, disguising itself as "liberalism" or progressiveness, represented in the United States Senate. While the forces of organized labor are learning conservatism from advancing intelligence, betterment of conditions and growing understanding of the mutuality of interest with capital and outbreaks of violence lessen steadily, imported and native teachers in institutions supposed to be centers of trained thought insidiously and with diabolic craft sap the foundations of character and virtue, endeavor to take from us the best we have, giving in return dust and ashes and chaos. Many of the so-called psychiatrists, with their professional jargon and hopeless confusions of expositions are worse foes to society, the Church and civilization than the most ruffianly thug who wields black jack or revolver or bomb. Professors of sociology and kindred "Sciences" are inculcating and suggesting depravities baser, more sickening, grosser, than are found among the vilest and most degraded sects of India.

Our danger, here in the South, is that as we gain wealth we may become fascinated with that much misused and misunderstood word "Culture", and with pretentious and self-vaunting educational institutions pretending to it and entrust our sons and daughters to the guidance of apostles of hideous follies. Unhappily, the strange, repulsive doctrines already are creeping Southward. An outstanding example is Dr. John Broadus Watson, now of Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore. He was confided to the influences of the University of Chicago. Here is what he got and proceeds to disseminate:

> "Most mothers should be indicted for psychological murder. Most fathers should be punished for the idiotic 'parental duty' dogma they try to instill in their young. Parents are so greedy for attention and power over their children that they can't keep their hands off them, and wreck their lives."
> "Watch any other group of animals. The mother will suffer privation for her young. She will give them her life until the time comes when she feels she will be more harm than good to them. Then she kicks them out.
> "She actually gives them a good slap of her loving paw, or a viciously tender bite, and tells them to live their own lives. That's a good lesson for most parents. I am going to do that very thing shortly with my own little boys."
>
> "Children don't owe their parents anything. By making their children believe that something is due the parents for having brought them into the world, parents are only building for their own future happiness—and being little better than leeches.
> "A lot of this filial devotion is simply 'necking.' I hate to see it going on between parents and children. I agree with Freud about it, and you know how unwholesome he thinks it."
> "Parents should leave their children alone when it comes to trying to own their little souls. The trouble with religion is that it has the same grip as parents. When parents leave you alone at twenty-one, religion takes you up."

That is bolshevist exactly. The family is to be destroyed. Human beings are to be brought to the level of animals. That is the teaching of Freud and Nietzsche.

Going North, to Smith College, instituted by a pious woman for the education of young women, we have Professor Harry Elmer Barnes, of Smith College, Northampton, Mass., writing and publishing a book from which this gem is taken:

"The Seventh Commandment, which forbids adultery, might be accepted as sound in general practice, but one can conceive of many conditions in which adultery would not only be permissible but even commendable. Indeed, adultery would seem frequently to be socially, indispensable in certain areas like South Carolina, where there exists no legal ground for divorce."

Then we have Dr. Henderson, of the University of North Carolina, rapturously praising George Bernard Shaw. Mr. Shaw is a writer of books and a tireless seeker of publicity, British. He seeks notice by outrage on every instinct of decency, by assailing all that ennobles man, lifts him above the brute, demonstrates his kinship to divinity. In the expressed and reiterated opinion of Mr. Shaw the love of the mother for her child is "horrible" and "marriage is the most licentious of institutions." Patriotism, he declares to be "disgraceful," and a North Carolina teacher, entrusted with the training of Southern young men, commends to them Shaw as a leader of their thought.

These specimens are presented for consideration of Southern people, especially those charged with the training and mental equipment of young men and women. They are taken from the newspapers which publish also some of the questionnaires submitted by professors to students of both sexes, most of which are so repulsive to decency, so regardless of modesty that they could not have been contrived or promulgated by anybody with the ordinary instincts of civilized humanity. It is a lamantable fact that many of our newspapers have fallen into the keeping and direction of coarse, common, half-baked, vulgar men, delighting in the salacious and sensational. Which marks another danger point.

The old South had its follies and sins, but it had also its special virtues and glories which beautified it and which, in time of supreme test, wrote in history examples of supreme devotion, courage, patience, faith, which glorify humanity and make its annals splendid. It is for us to retain the beauty and the purity of it, its family life, the tender and enduring love of parents for children, children for parents, the loyalty to cause and belief. At the North are many like us, whose hearts are with us, whose voices are suppressed because in them is no dirt. Here in the South we can be, and are, the representatives and exponents of the fine and beautiful and faithful old South, the citadel of the conservatism that believes in God and Christ and the Bible, the sanctity of marriage, the mutual obligations of children and parents, that does not parade itself with endless pictures of divorced women, displaying their teeth and legs.

There is no fear about Christianity. It survived Paine and Voltaire and it will survive the feeble assaults of Freud and Nietzsche and Shaw and Darwin. We have had in each generation diligent teachers of atheism, anarchy and destruction. All have passed. Most are utterly forgotten. The opportunity for the Christian people of the South now is to discountenance, with their growing wealth to discourage, the villainies and heresies, the indecencies and defiances of all pure and lifting thought, evidenced by the proclaimed methods of the centres of "culture." We should hold steadily to our institutions where we may know the teaching is American, where the teachers are of our own kind—clean and straight and decent—and atheism, socialism, bolshevism, free love, contempt for God and the Bible are excluded.

Langbourne Meade Williams.

A TRUE VINDICATION OF THE SOUTH

By Lacy M. Norwood

Southerners, read a justification of the Southern States and the principles for which they fought in "A True Vindication of the South," by Thomas M. Norwood, former United States Senator from Georgia.

THE study of law has naturally convinced me of the constitutionality of the Southern States in withdrawing from the Union. There is nothing in the Constitution which forbade it either by implication or direction. But crushed and overpowered by numbers we were forced back into the Union. And only once since then has there been a Southern President, and he was not of Southern residence. By national legislation we have been continuously and consistently discriminated against; misrepresented by Northern writers of supposed histories, distorting facts, misinterpreting the Constitution against us, we have been held up to the American public and the world at large as "rebels" and this has been done by such skillful sophistry that far too many of the present generation of the South and of Europe have been misled into believing the South was wrong in withdrawing from the Union.

The young men and women of the South do not seem to realize how great is their heritage nor have all the other Southern States yet risen and given Virginia the full meed of praise due her for all she did in our great struggle and for all she did before that time in making America worthy of the name. Virginia, in generosity, gave territory that other states might spring into being and grow great. In courage, she has been "the model of her own and an example for future times." In oratory, she produced the "tongue of the Revolution"; in constructive state-craft, "the pen of the Revolution" and in war, the "sword of the Revolution." In Presidents, she produced the one who standing above all others, as President, was sans peur et sans reproche. In womanhood, she gave the world an ideality that left nothing to be attained. In religion, she furnished a constancy unshaken. In generalship, she brought forth two military geniuses, Lee and Jackson, who were acknowledged by European critics as possessing the military skill of Alexander Hannibal, Caesar and Napoleon. In chivalry, her star burned as brightly as that of Sidney and Bayard. And last, but not least, she has worn the robes of that pure patriotism which has ever given all and asked nothing in return. She has embodied more than any other spot on earth, in modern times:

"The glory that was Greece"
The grandeur that was Rome."

Some day Virginia's history shall be written,
It may be when Time has made her old.
But the hand that truly pens her story
Will tell of greatness and of glory;
One of the noblest stories ever told.

BIBLE QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

(Our readers are invited to send in their questions from time to time concerning Scriptural subjects in which they are perplexed or desire light. Our limited space necessitates brevity in questions, as well as in the answers which we will endeavor to maintain in strict accord with the Word of the Lord, which, after all, settles all argument. This column is therefore not for controversy, but for a testimony.)

Question No. 29.—Is it wrong for a Christian to consult with "mediums," or attend so-called "spiritual circles?"—Mrs. S. K.

Answer.—It surely is wrong, as "Spiritualism" is condemned in God's Word in clear and unmistakable language, and every one should be warned of the solemnly serious business of attempting to thus communicate with the unseen or spirit-world.

Under the lure of representing departed loved ones, wicked spirits and hordes of demons seek to operate through mediums, usually in darkened rooms and while there is much deception, there is at times real communication with the powers of darkness, ever seeking human control.

This mysterious yet awful communication can readily be distinguished as evil, through being vague or incomplete and largely limited to trivial affairs of this present life. At times a jocular coarseness prevails, and a strange absence of those verities which by the sure Word of God, surround those who have been called to be forever with the Lord.

An unfailing guarantee of the awful character of this Satanic delusion is that Spiritualism has no place for Christ and shrinks from any mention of the glorious atonement. See 1 John 2:22; 1 John 4:3; 1 Chron. 10:13, 14; 2 Thess. 2:7-9.

"Regard not them that have familiar spirits, neither seek after or be defiled by them" (Lev. 19:31).

HOW FAITH OVERCOMES EVIL

By Reverend S. M. Shoemaker, Jr.

(Sermon preached at Calvary Church, New York City, Sunday morning, February 23, 1930.)

I TAKE for our consideration this morning one of the grandest themes in all the rich catalogue of the Christian experience. It is a truth that I love to preach on. I have so often taken my stand upon it, when some one drove me to express my own final judgment upon life as I see it. I so often think of it as the one impregnable position of faith, and its most enviable position, of which the world outside must ever in its heart be jealous. It is the thought of St. Paul in which I believe is the most inspired verse of the most inspired chapter he ever wrote, Romans eight, verse twenty-eight: "We know that all things work together for good to them that love God."

I wonder whether you ever listened to a great artist play the piano, and after it was all over and everybody had gone home, you sat down and fingered over the keys with one finger, and felt as if you would give your soul to be able to bring out of that instrument what he brought out of it. I sit down that way this morning before this verse. If I could draw out of it and put before you one tiny fraction of all the force and beauty and peace that lies within it, I could send you home possessed of faith forever. I feel sure that it gladdens the heart of Almighty God when He sees us take hold of a truth like this, chew it, swallow it, assimilate it, till it builds itself into the muscles and sinews of our souls, and gives to us resistance, by the health of true spiritual faith, against the germs of fear, disillusionment, sorrow, sin and despair. There is no equipment in this world, for the warfare of life, that equals the making of that kind of faith your own. And I ask you to listen this morning, in the hope that even with poor playing you can make out the tune, and go home singing it for the rest of your life. "We know that all things work together for good to them that love God."

Now, there are a good many things that keep people from believing in God. Some feel that they must bolt end-on a theology which is too intricate and stiff for them to accept it. Some know that they cannot pass from occasional questionings to the unwavering assurance which they think faith to be, because they confuse intellectual assent to philosophical statements with faith. Some simply flit from one idea to another, never thinking anything through, either because of want of enough brains, or more often through an unsteady and unsettled emotional life which never lets their minds attend to anything long enough to come to a conclusion. Very many times, as I have reminded you, people throw up the barriers of intellectual difficulty when the real trouble lies elsewhere, in the cost of the Christian life, in the moral challenge which it presents, to change our ways.

But there is another cause of unbelief with which we must reckon, for it is a constant element in our lives, and we must find some interpretation of it, if faith is not to remain forever an unreachable mirage. I mean the fact of evil in the world. Most of us can forget it comfortably enough, while we are well, or pleasantly occupied, or filled with a good dinner. But soon or late, evil will invade our privacy and make us face its ugly countenance. We may be philosophical enough about war in general, but one sight of a lad with half his face shot off, or of a man cursing God while he dies, or an actual exposure to long, hard months of discomfort, danger and falsely stimulated cruelty, will make any man shrug his shoulders and say, "A God—behind this?" We have all seen a fair young life cut off in its prime and its happiness, a life full of possibility and promise, loving to live and having everything to live for: and suddenly swoops down a germ that lays that life low in death or in permanent invalidism. And we have all seen others left here beyond their time, with no reason to live and no will to—just sad relics of selves, longing to be released, but kept on in their loneliness. Sometimes we are so baffled about what to do. Some one near us does a cowardly, dishonest thing, involving the happiness of a whole family. We want to help, but we do not know what to say or do. The bad people don't seem to care, and the good people seem to be incompetent. We would give our souls to help, but we are unable to help because we do not know how to deal with people And so we feel frustrated and useless. And then there is the ever-present fact of human pain, coming alike to just and unjust, withering little children into shadows, and tormenting chronic sufferers through wasteful stretches of time. These are the things, my friends, that make us say that no good God would create a universe in which such things could happen: and, therefore, there is no good God, and maybe no God at all. It is not the callous and indifferent who are afflicted with such dark thoughts as this: it is the just, the sensitive, the delicately organized, and often the persons who normally believe in God, but are twisted off their base by some unusual occurrence of tragedy.

Now we must try, if we can, to see what were the central problems of creating man at all. We are inclined to say that God should have made a better universe. And if the aim was a perfect, static and final creation, then He might as well have made us without the possibility of evil. But mark what you do when you postulate a universe like that. You cut out all growth, all progress, all development, all struggle, and therefore all character. He might have sent us off like children into Elysian fields to play our way through eternity. But we should only have been happy automatons, without character, and therefore without genuine significance and meaning. We could do nothing, because everything was done: we would become nothing, because we should be already arrived. No such thing as goodness or sacrifice or genuine love would have been possible. Good is only good by contrast with evil. Virtue is only virtue when it is contrasted with sin. Growth is only possible from an imperfect towards a perfect. I do not see how there can be such a thing as good without at least the possibility; the real, actual, moral possibility of evil. And the minute you admit the actual possibility of it, you admit the thing itself; we are infinitely curious, and Adam and Eve proved very early in the game how near possibility and realization lie together. It is a much more complicated and difficult matter than we think to reorganize the universe, or to postulate a better one than the one we have. We had better begin just where we are, therefore, and see what we can do with what we have.

We have in recent years been discovering that a vast portion of the evil in the world is of our own making, and may be of our own dispelling. A few centuries ago a plague was looked upon as a judgment of God: now it is looked upon as a failure of the sanitary departments of government, because we have gotten at the foul water supply and the impure milk; we have the knowledge of germs, and we know that they can be managed. Slowly science is pushing back the frontiers of suffering and sickness by discoveries of prevention and cures! China today is suffering from an unprecedented famine. I believe that that famine is due to their own failure to control river floods, and to institute systems of irrigation, which would prevent crops from being killed by drought or flood. And there is always the problem in that unhappy country of financial graft, and I am quite sure that most of the railroad officials and town authorities demand their share of "squeeze" before they will allow food to be got to the sufferers. It is a hideous picture of human cruelty; but it cannot be blamed on the universe—it is part of man's inhumanity to man, and it can be cured by the transformation of the human will. If we added up the total amount of suffering which came directly or indirectly from sin, it would be a very large proportion of it: and if we got at it through the eradication of human sin, we should clear up vast areas of pain, misfortune and tragedy. This does not take account of all evil, particularly of that which we call natural evil—earthquakes, lightning, storms at sea. But even here, we know now the zones of earthquakes, and we could move elsewhere did not our sentiments and our cupidity keep us rebuilding where destruction has come before. Did you ever notice that our friends from San Francisco never refer to the earthquake, but always to the "fire?" We take our own risks when we go to live in earthquake zones, as much as we do when we go to live in mosquito swamps without draining or oiling them. We have learned to ward off some strokes of lightning. We can build large enough ships to withstand most storms at sea, and I understand that the locality of storms can also be ascertained. Therefore, even the power of natural evil can be, and is being, reduced.

Nevertheless, there is pain and sorrow and evil in the world. And it all becomes desperately important and pertinent when it comes near us. We have got to find some working solution, or we cannot bear our own existence.

In the face of the existence in which we find ourselves, religious faith says to us that we must remember that there is a distinction between what befalls us and what interpretation we make of that event. For the same misfortune can be taken in different ways. One man loses his wife, and is plunged by it into abysmal grief and self-pity; while another sees in it a reminder that he has been living too much for this world, gives his grief to God, sets about to build faith, and has been very really blessed by his loss. A woman is injured in an accident, and never can walk again; she becomes rebellious, hard, stoical, and fights her life; but another in the same case surrenders her sorrow to God, seeks the finest employment of her increased time alone, develops a rich devotional life which blesses all who come to see her, so that her room is a place of pilgrimage for those who need to be encouraged. This is a matter of how you meet the event, what you bring to it, what your basic courage is. Of course, philosophy knows this fact, and the Stoics always emphasized it. But it is faith in God alone which can sweeten and mellow our interpretation and take all sting out of what has happened and how we think and talk about it.

In this connection I should like to say again what I have often said before, that faith is not primarily giving assent to an intellectual proposition: faith is a kind of primary loyalty to life and the universe which wills to see things in the best light. It is not like choosing a philosophy, it is like becoming attached to a friend, in whom we intend to believe even though he may do things which are unworthy of our faith in him. Faith is much more like loyalty than it is like philosophy. It roots quite as much in the courage of the will to hopeful interpretation, as in the conclusions of the mind. And it justifies itself by its works, for it is constantly recreating admittedly evil situations and turning them into good, or at least bringing good out of them. John Wesley had a sister, Patty, who was a great friend of Dr. Johnson's, and who married a miserable minister, named Westley Hall, with whom she suffered untold misery with great courage and patience. She said once, "Evil was not kept from me, but evil has been kept from harming me." That is the way faith overcomes evil. The power of evil has been broken before it touches a life like that. Faith has not changed the event, and like events befall many others: but it has wholly changed what the event means to the individual.

But I think that our text carries us to an even more helpful viewpoint. What we have been saying puts the matter up to us in the last analysis. And precisely what many of us are suffering from is that this semi-Stoical attitude of the will has never been infused with the grace of Christian faith: we are attempting to do for ourselves what only God can do. Therefore, we need a larger faith in God's Providence, which transcends even our own powers at helpful and hopeful interpretation: and which gathers up all the broken fragments of our life, the good and the ill, the happy and the sad, and over all hangs the canopy of an all-inclusive love at the heart of the universe. "We know that all things work together for good to them that love God."

Now, let me remind you, that verse gives us no reasons whatever for the existence of evil in the world: nothing that has ever been thought or said by man, not even by Jesus Christ, has taken all the heart out of the mystery of evil. It seems to assume trouble in our life, as does its context even in one of the most exalted passages in human literature. But it reminds us of the mission of suffering in our life, and it tells of a chosen few who discover the meaning of suffering in their own lives.

That chosen few are chosen, not by arbitrary selection of God, but by their own selection: they are those who "love God". And by that I take St. Paul to mean, not those who possess an emotional attachment to God which issues in ecstatic hymns and prayers; but rather those who actually share with God in creation, those who by the merging and submission of their private wills to His will, have come under His vast purpose for creation, and are doing their own part, where their responsibilities lie, for the fulfilment of that purpose. "If ye love Me," said Jesus, "keep My commandments." Love is unity of will, the bond of a single purpose. Not all of us can be developed mystics, who find their whole life's meaning in contemplation of God. But all of us can love God by deliberately choosing His will instead of our own. We can bias ourselves in favor of His desires as against our own. We can say, if we are even reasonable we shall say, that His purpose for creation is more important than our purpose to have our own way. And therefore the overcoming of evil begins, where all other great wisdom about life begins, in our own self-subjugation to the will of God. The verse makes a magnificent affirmation which the world would like to take unconditionally and leave without its final modification. "All things work together for good.' But the sting is in the tail. The point lies in those last five words, "to them that love God." Some of you this morning are in deep need and search for a way out of your suffering. Do you love God? Do you love Him till His will is yours, and you are more interested in getting His will done than your own? Will you submit your sorrow with yourself to Him, and His supreme wisdom? Fulfill the final condition, and then God can carry out the promise!

Now, let us go back to the promise. "We know that all things work together for good to them that love God."

"We know." He takes it as an assumption, as though all were agreed upon it, as though he had a whole Christian community whose lives and experiences testified with unbroken witness to the truth of what he was saying. That was just the same. Few human eyes have ever looked upon more persecuted lives than St. Paul's—yet from it all he comes with this pronouncement—"We know."

"That all things"—not some things, not those we can understand only, or those which come out well in the end, but those which were dark to us when we went through them, and are dark still, those which have seemed unrelieved tragedies right up till this day. "All things work."

"All things work together for good to them that love God." It does not say, mark you, that all things are in themselves good: for that we should all have to reject. We know events, some brought on by ourselves, some which were hopelessly beyond our control, which were definitely evil in themselves. But, by love for God, and by the interpretation of faith, events untoward in themselves are transformed and "work" towards good.

And they must be taken "together," not separately. You must weigh misfortune with privilege, and see that both had a place. We must understand the sweep and development of life, and not judge by cutting into any one section of it. The slow moulding of events is what fashions character, once we have faith to start with.

And they work together "for good," not always for pleasure or success or immediate satisfaction. Good is a large word and stands for a large conclusion. It takes a magnanimous mind, in some sense an impersonal mind, to see what he means by the word "good." But I defy any man or woman to obey the final condition of that tremendous statement of St. Paul, and then find that the rest of it is not true. Get under the burden with God, seek to see from His viewpoint, surrender your trouble to Him, and see if He does not show you how "all was for best."'

This, verily, is the faith that overcomes evil, and that overcomes the world. This is the faith that was in the heart of Jesus, and enabled Him so to transform the meaning of events that His Cross, which marked the utmost degradation to which our humanity ever stooped, became the symbol of humanity's redemption. Without faith which went on till the end believing that all things work together for them that love God, the Cross might have been for Him the mark of tragedy and failure. We cannot say that it was good that Jesus was crucified: yet we can, nay we must, say that the Cross "worked" for good. And I ask you to lift up your problem of trouble under the great shadow of it, and to find there both your interpretation and your peace. Jesus did not explain evil by a philosophy: He interpreted it by an act. In the Cross He shared wholly with us the mysteriousness of our own existence: but in it also He showed us the way to victory. The words of this text were never heard by Him. I almost wish I could see the look on His face if He heard them, for I believe that He would not only approve them, but that something very nearly like them lay at the back and the bottom of His mind, coloring all that He said and did, the way He lived and died.

But we have heard them. They are spirit and they are life. I beg you to grave them deep upon your minds, by repetition, by meditation, and by the long proofs of experience. Let it be but a text for your life: and I have no fear for the sermon your life will preach.

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSE.

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which appears here each week; including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice, eternal treasures, indeed. "Thy word have I hid in my heart, that I might not sin against thee." Ps. 119:11.)

This week the following verse was submitted by

Miss Charlotte H. Hitzel, of Buffalo, N. Y.:

> "Fear thou not: for I am with thee; be not dismayed; for I am thy God; I will strengthen thee; yea, I will help thee; yea, I will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteousness" (Isaiah 41:10).

Who will send one from the far-away places as well as very near us?

BRAZILIAN APPRECIATION OF BISHOP KINSOLVING

THE Standing Committee of the Church in Brazil sends the following message to Mrs. Kinsolving and her children:

"The Standing Committee of the Brazilian Episcopal Church assembled on the tenth of January, 1930, in the Library of the Southern Cross School, desire to express to you their sorrow at the loss of the eminent prelate, the Rt. Rev. Lucien Lee Kinsolving. Deeply sympathizing with you in your bereavement, the Committee beg to offer you their heartfelt condolences.

"Never shall this Church forget the inestimable services and the Apostolic life of your esteemed husband and father, now entered into his well merited rest. He has earned the everlasting gratitude of more than three thousand Episcopalians who in this part of South America, following the salutary and paternal counsels of our Bishop and shepherded under his tender and loving staff have become followers of the faith and life of the Gospel.

"The construction of churches, rectories, parochial edifices and schools; the founding of a diocesan school and theological institute; the preparation of a native ministry conscious of its high responsibilities; the extensive Sunday-school work; the development of parochial activities and of evangelical publications, and above all the ever increasing addition of members to the Church of God, are all fitting credentials of the especial place occupied by our Bishop in the generous heart of our people, whom he evangelized and ever loved.

"Signed,

"Joao Baptista Barcellos da Cunha,
"President.

"Americo V. Cabral."

Note: Barcellos is one of the younger Brazilian clergy and at present editor of our Church paper. Archdeacon Cabral is one of our first adherents in the old days who was made deacon by our great Bishop Peterkin.

Jose Severo da Silva, the rector of the autonimous Church of the Redeemer in Pelotos, writes:

"Our well-beloved and ever-remembered friend and brother, the Rt. Rev. Lucien Lee Kinsolving, D. D., has ended his earthly pilgrimage. A great prince in Israel is fallen.

"The Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States of America and the young Brazilian Church weep together for the loss of this illustrious bishop, whose name will stand indelibly written in the annals of the evangelization of Brazil.

"Over the place where he lies, we bow in the spirit of deepest respect. We would scatter there an armful of flowers bedewed with our tears—tears expressive of our gratitude and of our personal loss."

George Krischke, the rector of Trinity Church in Porto Alegre, the strongest congregation in the field, writes:

"Bishop Kinsolving was indeed a great bishop, a veritable father in God. He has every right to the title of a Prince in the Church, not only because of ability, eloquence and learning, and consecration to the cause which he espoused, but also for the splendid results of the thirty years of his notable episcopate. We who shall no more in this world behold his genial and gracious face, his glance so penetrating and tender, make our own, as if graven upon immemorial bronze, the words of King David—Know ye not that a prince and a great man is fallen, in Israel?"

A layman, Jose Casagrande, tells of his conversion:

"On January 25, 1901, I was by chance passing the little Chapel of the Mediator in Santa Maria, when the ringing voice of a passionate orator made me stop and enter. A splendidly appearing man, in ecclesiastical vestments, was in the midst of a mighty sermon on St. Paul's Conversion. Under the preacher's inspiration I had a vision of that long ago vision that Saul of Tarsus had, when the lightning flash from heaven blinded his eyes, and illuminated his spirit. It was there, in that little chapel, that, lifted out of myself, I heard for the first time our great missionary bishop, Dr. Kinsolving.

"At the close of the service, the Bishop and his companion came to the door to greet the people. He grasped my hand and thanked me for paying such close attention to his sermon. Overwhelmed by such attention to so insignificant a member of the assembly, I then and there in the secret of my heart resolved never more to separate myself from the light that St. Paul received on the Damascus road.

"The great missionary is dead! Thousands in Brazil are his devoted friends; for he knew how to be as truly a Brazilian as any one of us. To his noble wife and her dear children, may the consolation of God be granted."

In a private letter, our brilliant and devoted Athalicio Pithan, writes:

"We wish to express to you our assurance of deep Christian sympathy in the loss of your greatest friend, Bishop Kinsolving. His death was a sad surprise to us all, we did not expect that he would so soon depart to receive the crown of life. We had here an impressive memorial service. Never will the Brazilian Church forget the beloved name of her first bishop. The Gospel of such sweet consolations and such sure promises, the same which was brought to us by our glorious missionaries, whose names are deeply graven in our hearts, that Gospel of life and of peace and of comfort, is a strong shield at this hour."

Timotheo da Silva, one of our younger clergy, who is the assistant of the Rev. Mr. Osborn in the City of Rio Grande, writes in a personal letter:

"The death of our venerated Bishop Kinsolving has stirred to the depths the heart of the Church of which he was one of the original founders. With apostolic tenderness he planted it and watered it, so that by the grace and power of the Spirit of God it has grown and increased. Never shall we who have had the privilege of knowing our great Bishop, forget him. He loved and served Brazil with the love of the best Brazilians—Brazil that so needs, as she rapidly grows and expands, help to establish those principles, that shall best regulate and conserve her life, both material and spiritual. Bishop Kinsolving was one of those men of God who, even after he has passed from this earthly scene, leaves after him influences that bless future generations."

THREE THINGS NECESSARY.

In "The Witness" of February 20, 1930, Bishop Johnson says:

There are three things necessary if your religion is to be a vital factor in your life. I would say that the first of these essentials is conviction. I would like to send some of these modern liberals, whose message consists largely of what they do not believe, as missionaries to the savages and see what they would accomplish with their vacuum pump.

It is the business of the prophet to proclaim revealed truth rather than personal opinion. The liberal usually occupies a pulpit that was erected by people of convictions and he addresses a constituency who owe what faith they have to the traditions of their fathers. If he hasn't anything to do but to pump out whatever is in the cistern he will run out of usefulness in a very short time.

I think that the second essential in the cultural ascent of man is discipline; whether he is striving to be a scientist, an artist, or a saint. And discipline does not consist in heckling the athletes in the arena, but exercising some development of one's own supply of charity. It is so easy to be a bleacher athlete. And so futile. Discipline is a matter of submitting yourself to the rules of the game and training yourself in the practice of charity.

And the third ingredient of a Christian life is worship, which does not consist in watching some one pray for you, but in participating in doing that which a Christian has been commanded to do.

* * * *

There are two leaders in the Church, known as priests and prophets, each of whom has a different function to perform and each of whom is liable to the sins of his order.

* * * *

Now, in the history of religion the priest has been the custodian of the faith, the teacher of discipline and the leader in worship. The prophet has been the one to point out abuses, to rebuke sin and to emphasize righteousness. The prophet has always had the greater popularity because he is eloquent and energetic and stimulating. He tells you what to think and does not demand any personal sacrifice as a continuous obligation. Like the spectators at the games you can look on and applaud without serious effort.

The priest's task is more exacting. He is there demanding that you do something. That is irritating to all. The philosopher or the preacher says think so and so, and you will be right. Well, maybe you do and maybe you don't, but in either case it soothes you to think how much the other fellow needs this advice. But the priest says, "Thus saith the Lord," "This is the faith," "Confess your sins," "Do this." Only those who have the mind to work welcome these obligations.

* * * *

The urge for moral improvement is the work of the prophet; but the insistence upon the essentials of the faith is the duty of the priest. It is this which our liturgy conserves. Our clergy may preach this or that in their zeal and they may do it sincerely, but the Prayer Book reveals in its liturgy the faith which does not alter. The latter will remain long after the fiery words from the pulpit are forgotten.

The prophet affects his contemporaries. The liturgy carries on to posterity. We need a synthesis of the two if we are to be witnesses unto Christ and not purveyors of our own opinions.

THE CHURCH AT WORK: By Clarence H. Benson. Cloth. Pp. 155. Published by the Biola Book Room, Los Angeles, California. Price, $1.25; mailing, 13 cents.

The author displays fertility of thought and thoroughness of comprehension in his ability to write as he does in his "The Earth the Theatre of the Universe," from a scientific point of view and then, as in this instance, to put before us the ideals and methods of church organization and administration.

And to this task he brings his scientific acumen to play in the apt illustrations which are as windows of clear glass. The Church is truly defined as the living expression of awakened men who are on the alert to get others to share with them the opportunities for service and the glorious privileges which belong to the household of faith. And what inspires the confidence of the general public in the Church is the adaptation by the Church of such thorough-going principles and practices as mark the business world. While according to the Holy Spirit the planting in the life of the germinal seeds of living force, there is no contradiction in assuming that God loves order as well as inspiration.

This most commendable textbook deserves the attention of all parts of the society of which the Church is composed. We have here the duties of the officials, the Sunday-school teachers and officers, the missionary and other guilds and the congregation at large. What a fine thing it would be if, as he suggests, every woman should call upon every other woman in her block with a view to evangelism and every man the entire community! How few scholars would be missing from the class, if the teacher should conscientiously call upon the mothers of the members committed to her care! And what a transformation, when the pastor takes his people into his confidence and orders his way according to the best thought of his charge!

This book is an incentive and an instruction of possibilities within the reach of all for the glory of our Lord.

PREACHING OUT OF THE OVERFLOW: By the Rev. William L. Stidger, D. D., Litt. D. Cloth. Pp. 238. Published by the Cokesbury Press, Nashville, Tenn. Price, $2.25.

Another good book on preaching, the reputation of the author being the guarantee of its excellence.

It is temptingly broken up in sections, so that one can dip here, there and elsewhere at his heart's content. And every section has its distinct message. We promise the preacher a riot of joy as he gets into this splendid appeal.

What Dr. Stidger means by "overflow" is that we can preach only as we are so full that we cannot help passing on the good we have absorbed. This suggests that one cannot give out what he has not taken in. And if he has taken only a little in, it will betray itself in his attempt to deliver it. Well did our Lord say to the Twelve, 'Freely have ye received; freely give."

Now, this opens to us a perplexing challenge. How can a man who has incessant calls during the day and all sorts of meetings at night, with an accumulated correspondence to meet daily, rise to the measure of Dr. Stidger's pattern? Every man must answer that for himself. There must be an answer if he is to maintain a public standard for good preaching. Dr. Stidger is himself the model. He has all these distracting currents rushing into the steady stream of his life; but he gets the better of them and thinks highly and with due importance of that face to face and heart to heart message he will be expected to give when he looks upon his congregation the next day of worship.

To this end, while he must be a man of affairs, that he may know men, he must as well delve in books to acquire the vision and unction of present or past leaders. A balance of the two factors will hold him in form. And Dr. Stidger urges our acquaintance with Nature and her ways. And finally, there can be no overflow unless preaching is a thing of joy.

CANON 23.

Mr. Editor:

Bishop Manning's ruling against the rector and vestry of St. George's Church, New York, in the matter of their proposed lending their church building for ministration by others than those episcopally ordained, has an unhappy repercussion upon that particular phase of Church effort which is entrusted to our diocesan missionaries. In many small places—and some not so very small at that—we have groups of Church people but no building. Hospitality is offered us by some other congregation and this is appreciated and accepted. I imagine there would appear many such instances if the details were at hand. Certainly, in my own activities, I gratefully acknowledge such kindnesses which have made possible some of the most interesting and fruitful phases of my work.

But what if Bishop Manning's interpretation of Canon 23 is correct and the Canon debars our clergy from ever offering such hospitality on our part? Are we not estopped by ordinary self-respect from accepting that which we cannot reciprocate?

I am led by these very vital considerations affecting our Missions to offer you the late Dr. E. A. White's concluding paragraphs in his exhaustive discussion of the origin and history of this Canon 23, which would seem, so far as his authority goes, to upset Bishop Manning's ruling. The quotation is from "Constitution and Canons of the Protestant Episcopal Church," published in 1924, by order of the House of Clerical and Lay Deputies of General Convention.

"A case involving the construction of this Canon recently occurred in a certain diocese. The rector of one of the parishes therein arranged a watch night service to be held in his church and invited, among others, a Jewish rabbi as one of the speakers. . . . The Bishop declined to give his canonical consent to the officiating of the said Jewish rabbi at the said service. The rector of the parish then changed the place of holding the watch night service from the church to the parish house . . . and the Jewish rabbi officiated at said service. The Bishop . . . presented the said rector for violation of the Canon. The whole question would seem to depend upon whether Canon was framed to protect the church building or the congregation from false and erroneous teaching (black mine). The history of the Canon would seem to indicate that the framers of the Canon had in mind the people who compose the congregation, rather than the church building itself. The first Canon on this subject, enacted by the Convention of 1792 forbade any person not a minister of this Church 'to officiate in any congregation of this Church'. The title of the Canon would appear to bear out this interpretation; it reads: 'Of Persons, not Ministers in this Church Officiating in any Congregation Thereof'. The Canon itself declares: 'No Minister in charge of any Congregation of this Church . . . shall permit any person to officiate therein, etc.' The word 'therein' clearly refers to the word 'congregation.' If the Canon was not intended to protect the congregations, then it would seem as if the Church had left herself unprotected."

Must we not conclude then, conversely, that if the Canon was intended to protect the congregations, it was not intended to protect the mere fabric of brick or stone? There is, indeed, the Bishop's declaration in the Consecration of a Church or Chapel, that it is thereby "separated from all unhallowed, worldly and common uses", but I imagine there are few of us who would be willing to accept such a characterization of the uses that might be made of our Church buildings by ministers who lack episcopal ordination. If the Church has made any other formal declaration on this subject, I am not aware of it.

OFFICIATING IN CONGREGATIONS OF THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

Mr. Editor:

As the discussion of this matter pertains mostly to the regulations of the Protestant Episcopal Church concerning the qualifications of those who officiate in churches of that body, it is well to begin by quoting the law on the subject, which is as follows:

Canon 23.

"No minister in charge of any congregation of this Church, or, in case of vacancy or absence, no Church Wardens, Vestrymen or Trustees of the Congregation, shall permit any person to officiate therein, without sufficient evidence of his being duly licensed or ordained to minister in this Church; Provided that nothing herein shall be so construed as to forbid communicants of the Church to act as Lay Readers; or to prevent the Bishop of any Diocese or Missionary District from giving permission to Christian men, who are not ministers of this Church, to make addresses in the Church, on special occasions."

The term "officiate" evidently refers to the performance of the functions pertaining to the orders of Bishop, Priest or Deacon, which are named in the Preface to the Ordination Services of this Church. (See prayer Book.)

The Preface begins thus:

"It is evident unto all men diligently reading Holy Scripture and ancient authors, that from the Apostles' time, there have been these orders of Ministers in Christ's Church—Bishops, Priests and Deacons."

This Preface further states:

"And, therefore, to the intent that these orders may be continued, and reverently used and esteemed in this Church, no man shall be accounted or taken to be a lawful Bishop, Priest or Deacon, in this Church, or suffered to execute any of the said functions, except he be called, tried, examined and admitted thereunto, according to the Form hereafter following, or hath had Episcopal Consecration or Ordination.'

Here it may be noted that the word Priest is an abbreviation of the word Presbyter (Greek, Presbuteros), which in the English New Testament is translated "Elder". The functions of a bishop, while including those of the priesthood, carry the exclusive authority of general oversight, confirmation and ordination. The Canon Law of this Church permits duly licensed laymen to preach, and the Church recognizes the right of lay baptism in certain cases.

Only a Bishop or Priest may lawfully celebrate the Holy Communion in a congregation of this Church, make the Declaration of Absolution or give the Benediction at the close of the Communion Service. Being a minister of the Gospel, a Deacon may assist at the Holy Communion, preach and baptize.

The Episcopal Church makes no declaration concerning ministers who are not of its faith and order, it merely declares the qualifications and requisites for "officiating in this Church." We thank God for all of the good accomplished by our non-Episcopal brethren and we recognize their ministers as such in their several denominations. On occasion such ministers have preached in our churches, including the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, in New York; they sometimes assist in parts of our Burial, Lenten and other services, but they cannot lawfully "officiate" as Bishops, Priests or Deacons in this Church.

With permission of the Bishop, church buildings have been loaned to non-Episcopal congregations, without a place of worship, for their own services, conducted by their own ministers. But in a "united" service held in an Episcopal Church by representatives of various denominations, if there be present and participating, regular members of that parish, in the opinion of the writer there is in law and in fact "a congregation of this Church."

This being true, the celebration of the Holy Communion at such time and place by a non-Episcopal minister would be unlawful.

It would be profitless to discuss here the right or wrong of such regulations as have been defined; every Christian body has doctrines, laws and customs peculiar to itself, subject to criticism or defense, but to no alteration or repeal except through regular process and by a majority vote.

All denominations have their share of traditionalists, heretics, zealots, law-breakers and trouble-makers who sometimes furnish situations that strain church laws and fraternal relations to the breaking point.

Notwithstanding unpleasant incidents, we Churchmen loyal to our own standards, shall continue working together in Christian fellowship with our brethren of other faiths and orders for the welfare of Christ's Kingdom and the ultimate unity of His Church in one body that is Catholic and Apostolic.

A FRIEND OF LONG STANDING.

Mr. Editor:

I enclose check for $6.00 for subscription. It is certainly kind and noble in you to allow my subscription to run so long. It is far more than a secular paper will do. I have been reading the Churchman for over fifty years, some member of my family having been taking it since the seventies of last century, for I remember it was published in Alexandria, Virginia, at my earliest remembrance of it. I think I have been a subscriber for more than twenty-five years and would surely miss it. Hope to be able to continue it the rest of my life.

With best wishes and success.

The Famine in China.

Stories of the suffering of the starving millions in China are increasing. The China Famine Relief has issued the following account:

New York.—"The Trail of Death" is the caption which has been given by the Rev. G. Findlay Andrew of the China Inland Mission at Lanchow to a "first hand" report of the famine conditions scourging five of the largest provinces of Northern China, which has just been received by Dr. S. Parkes Cadman, Chairman of the National Committee, and David A. Brown, Chairman of the Board of China Famine Relief, U. S. A. Mr. Andrew made a tour of the famine zone at the request of China International Famine Relief Commission at Peiping, and traveled over five hundred English miles by land and water in the performance of his task. Time and again, he says in his report, he was so moved by the misery of thousands of starving men, women and children, he encountered, so horrified by their suffering, that he distributed his own daily food supply among them.

In addition to describing the terrible catastrophe which has overcome the men, women and children in the famine sections, the Rev. Andrew told of the methods adopted by the Commission to distribute relief. Wherever possible, work was provided with food as pay and in other sections seeds were given for planting to assure a fair harvest.

In his report he said in part: "To write in detail of all the terrible things I saw during my journey would far exceed the limits of this short report. I will just relate a few of the incidents which dwell in my memory from the journey on that veritable 'Trail of Death". The district between Pingliang and Anting furnished the worst conditions I was destined to see and in this area the famine was almost entirely due to drought. It was indescribably sad to revisit this district, which one had known in other days, and to see the change and witness the suffering. Never shall I forget a midday halt we made at a little village at the top of a high hill; a little place at which I have stayed in former years and where I then had some acquaintances. On this occasion we found the village with only about one-tenth of its inhabitants left and these were mere walking skeletons. We had made a practice of carrying a supply of bread with us, from whatever places it could be purchased, and of surreptitiously distributing this along the way. Had the starving beggars known that we carried such supplies, we should have been mobbed. At this particular village, of which I now write, the starving inhabitants crowded round our carts while the animals were being fed with very restricted fodder rations. The carters fed their animals out of large round baskets, which were set up on portable wooden trestles, which were carried on the carts. The people gathered round these baskets and the peas which the animals spilled out of the baskets, or out of their mouths, were carefully picked up and eaten. One of the carters inadvertently scattered a little bran on the ground. An old man, almost too weak to move, literally fell upon the spot, and scooping up the minute quantity of bran, with the dust with which it had become mingled, crammed the lot into his mouth. Saddest of all sights was to see the families moving listlessly along the highroads, wandering anywhere where there might be the smallest possible chance of obtaining food, and to see the parents, when the strength of the children gave out, urging themselves forward in order to get out of earshot of the moans of the little ones who were thus abandoned to their fate. Right throughout this region the trees had been stripped of their bark which was powdered and mixed with the sweepings of coarse flour of various kinds in order to eke out the food supply. Those who were able to find edible roots on the hillsides, or some of the coarse clove, counted themselves fortunate beyond measure."

We had heard it frequently said and also had read in the newspapers that it was impossible to reach the famine stricken areas with food. Therefore, we wrote to the National Headquarters and received the following letter from Mr. D. O. Lively, National Director of China Famine Relief, U. S. A.

"The quotation mentioned in your letter of February 8, applies to one specific area in China. With 30,000,000 people facing starvation in an accessible area of 450,000 square miles, the fact that in Shensi the transportation difficulties are almost insurmountable, should not deter us from pressing forward in every way possible to get food to those who can be reached.

"In an experience extending over two years, we have found it possible to administer relief in China without loss worth mentioning and without interference, but on the contrary, with every possible cooperation from the authorities. Food can be delivered into Shansi and into Kansu where the conditions are at the zenith of terribleness and where a plan is under way now to organize a transport into Shensi to deliver $200,000 worth of beans to be planted so as to supplement the grain crop.

"Seven of our Directors have lived in China. Three of them have been engaged in famine relief work. Two of them speak Chinese fluently. They are enormously busy men and yet their knowledge of China and their desire to be of help causes them to attend meetings and work diligently to render every possible aid to the millions of people who, through no fault of their own, are dying in such great numbers."

As previously stated, the Department of Missions of our National Council has considered at several of its meetings what recommendation should be made to the people of our Church regarding China Famine Relief. The most careful investigation of the whole subject was made. Conference was had with the American Red Cross and with our Bishops in China, in order that the Department might take the wisest action in the case.

There has been no question about the need of relief. The only question was as to the possibility of getting relief to those who needed it most. In response to a cabled inquiry to Bishop Graves, who is a member of the International China Famine Relief Committee in Shanghai, for advice on this question, the Bishop has replied:

> "Need unquestioned. Limited funds can be used in few areas under foreign supervision. Writing."

In view of the information received the Department of Missions at its February meeting, felt that it should emphasize to the clergy and the people of our Church the fact that several million people in China are suffering indescribable privations as a result of present conditions, and that the Department will gladly receive and forward to the Bishop of Shanghai gifts for their relief, to be distributed by him in consultation with such advisers as he may select.

The Southern Churchman will be glad to forward any contributions for this most needy cause.

The Alaskan Fund.

Anvik, Alaska,
January 3, 1930.

Editor, The Southern Churchman,
Richmond, Virginia.

Dear Sir: We have received word from Bishop Rowe that the anticipated "cut" in the salaries of Alaskan missionaries will not be necessary, thanks to your efforts in raising a fund to make up the deficit.

As one of the missionaries who had a personal interest in the matter, I wish to thank you and all those who responded to the appeal which you made on our behalf. Our hearts are full of gratitude to the people who came to our help so generously.

Sincerely yours,
Henry H. Chapman.

A Blind Indian Boy.

One of the Navajo Indian boys brought up in the Episcopal Church's mission at Fort Defiance, Arizona, is blind. He has nevertheless completed high school, helped support himself by tuning pianos, learned to play the violin well, led the Boy Scouts in his school, and passed every test for an Eagle Scout except swimming, which he had no chance to do on the reservation. He has just entered the University of New Mexico, where, along with the regular curriculum, he is going to learn to swim.

Dr. Glazebrook in Atlanta.

Dr. Glazebrook, Lay Worker of the National Commission on Evangelism, completed his three and a half months' itinerary in the seven Pacific Dioceses and Districts on February 20, and will be in the Diocese of Atlanta (Georgia), March 1-15.

The Trinity Parish Church Paper, Seattle, Washington, writes of Dr. Glazebrook's recent visit to the Diocese of Olympia:

Dr. Larkin W. Glazebrook has come and gone, yet he hasn't gone except in so far as the physical eye can see.

The doctor preached for us two Sunday evenings—he spoke to our Men's Bible Class—twice he appeared before our young people's organization and he had an intimate session with a group of about twenty men after the service last Sunday night. We were particularly fortunate in having so much of the doctor because of a last minute change of schedule in another diocese which gave him several extra days in our city too late to arrange for any other appointments.

It is the opinion of the bishop and clergy that no one has come to the diocese with a more valuable spiritual message.

Our men have been inspired—and great things may therefore be expected of them in the way of personal work for the Kingdom of Christ.

Dr. Glazebrook is sounding a note—not new—but not heard so distinctly for some time. The personal challenge to accept and follow Jesus, to know Him and love Him better and to tell others about Him. It was the emotional emphasis and we need to hear it every so often.

We thank God for the opportunity he has given us and we hope to profit by it.

The doctor left this little prayer with us and I pass it on with the suggestion that we use it every day:

"O God, give me an opportunity today and make me equal to it."

Bishop Perry's Prayer for Russia.

At the last meeting of the National Council, on February 12, there was adopted a resolution that Bishop Perry of Rhode Island be asked to prepare for use in the Church, subject to the approval of the Bishop in each diocese, a prayer for the Church in Russia. The Holy Orthodox Church there is now undergoing persecution in the definite attempt on the part of the Soviet government to obliterate the worship of God within the Republic. In response to the request, Bishop Perry has prepared the following prayer:

"Almighty God, the Protector of all who are oppressed; Look with pity, we beseech Thee, upon the sufferings of Thy Church in Russia. Grant to Thy servants in their adversity patience to endure to the end, and courage steadfastly to continue in the faith once delivered to the saints. Stretch forth the right hand of Thy majesty to maintain their cause; And finally bestow upon them faithful unto death the crown of everlasting life: Through Him who suffered and was buried and now liveth ever to make intercession for us, Thy Son our Saviour Jesus Christ. Amen."

Picture of the Rev. S. L. Kerr Sought.

The "Sanctuary Guild" of St. John's Church, Jacksonville, Florida, has undertaken to collect the photographs of all of its rectors.

Miss Gertrude N. L'Engle, chairman of the work, writes that of the twelve, nine have been secured. She says that of the remaining three, she believes there is very little possibility obtaining photographs of two: the Rev. David Brown and the Rev. Isaac Swart.

Information is desired concerning the third, the Rev. S. L. Kerr, who was at St. John's from November 8, 1858, to January 1, 1861.

Miss L'Engle writes: "As he pronounced his name 'Car', I conclude that he must have been from Virginia.

"Any information that would put me in touch with a member of Mr. Kerr's family, or a photograph that I could get would be most happily received."

Address, Miss Gertrude N. L'Engle, 514 Market Street, Jacksonville, Fla.

New Bishops.

Within the last few weeks, no fewer than four new bishops have been elected. In St. Louis, the Very Rev. William Scarlett, Dean of Christ Church Cathedral, becomes Bishop Coadjutor of the Diocese of Missouri. Dean Scarlett is widely known throughout the country for his interest in the relation of the Church to questions of social justice and better human relations. At the present time, he is the chairman of a committee which is planning for a seminar of Catholics, Protestants and Jews, to consider ways of eliminating misunderstanding and prejudice.

In Southern Ohio, the Rev. Henry W. Hobson, of Worcester, Mass., has been elected Bishop Coadjutor. On account of the ill health of Bishop Theodore I Reese, Bishop Paul Jones, formerly of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, has been serving temporarily.

In the Diocese of Western New York, the Rev. Cameron J. Davis, of Trinity Church, Buffalo, N. Y., has been consecrated Bishop Coadjutor, succeeding the Rt. Rev. David L. Ferris, who became the head of the Diocese upon the death of Bishop Brent.

In Chicago, the Rt. Rev. Sheldon M. Griswold, Suffragan Bishop, has been elected to be the head of the diocese, succeeding Bishop Charles P. Anderson, whose sudden death occurred some weeks ago. The necessity now rests upon the House of Bishops to elect a new Presiding Bishop in the place of Bishop Anderson, who held the position for only a little over four months. The bishops will meet in Chicago March 26.

Philadelphia Divinity School Alumni Honored.

Word was received here from China announcing that two native Chinese alumni of the Philadelphia Divinity School, were among those awarded honorary degrees of Doctor of Divinity at the recent commemoration of the Semi-Centennial of St. John's University, Shanghai. The men honored, both of whom are widely known in religious and educational circles in this city, are the Rt. Rev. Philip Lindel Tsen, and the Rev. Tsoong-Moo Tong. Dr. Tsen was recently consecrated Suffragan Bishop of "The Chung Hua Sheng Kung Hui," or "Holy Catholic Church in China," corresponding in faith and doctrine to the Episcopal Church in the United States, and the outcome of the latter's missionary service in the foundation of a native Chinese branch of the Episcopal Church. Dr. Tong is also one of the leaders in the native Church. Bishop Tsen, while preparing himself for the ministry in Philadelphia also was a student at the University of Pennsylvania, and received his Master of Arts degree from that university.

Choirs.

Choirs of more than twenty-five Protestant Episcopal Churches were united in a public musical service in the Church of the Advocate. The service was conducted in the interest of a general movement to develop new interest in the part of music in religious worship.

There were about 275 selected voices that comprised the chorus with Harold W. Gilbert, organist, and choirmaster of Old St. Peter's Church, as conductor, and Newell Robinson at the organ.

The Rev. John W. Morris, president of the the Choral Art Society of Philadelphia, and rector of St. Luke's Church, Bustleton, officiated in singing the priest's part of the service. The Rt. Rev. Francis M. Taitt, Bishop-Coadjutor of the Diocese of Pennsylvania, delivered a special address and the Rev. L. W. Caley, dean of the Convocation of Germantown, read the Lesson.

With the exception of the Bishop's address and the Lesson, the entire service was sung. The service was held under the direction of the Festival Choir Association of the Diocese of Pennsylvania.

According to students of Church music, the tradition for choral evensong stretches far back into the history of the Christian Church and in Hebrew worship the service was always choral.

MARYLAND.

Rt. Rev. E. T. Helfenstein, D. D., Bishop.

A Choir Record.

Fifty-four years of faithful service in one choir, director for sixteen years of this period, and not once the cause of any dissension in the church—think of it!

This remarkable record was made by Thomas H. Disney, who is now retiring from the choir of the Church of the Messiah, Baltimore.

His first connection with the church dates back to 1872, when Dr. Penick, later the first Bishop in Liberia, was rector. He then served through the fifty year rectorship of the late Rev. Dr. Peregrine Wroth. The present rector holds him up as an ideal parishioner.

In addition to his comprehensive knowledge of music, Mr. Disney is an acute Bible student, familiar with both his Vulgate and King James Version; is an excellent sermon critic (think of his experience!); and probably knows more about Baltimore City than any man alive.

He laid out much of it in his capacity as a surveyor.

On his retirement from the choir, his church honored him with a dinner on February 24, to which were invited all those who had sung with him. This was followed by a public reception and concert, and the presentation of a purse of gold.

Lectures on the Jerusalem Conference.

Tuesday afternoons in Lent, at five o'clock, the rector of St. Paul's Church, Richmond, the Rev. B. D. Tucker, Jr., will give a series of lectures in the auditorium of the Parish House on "The Jerusalem Conference of the International Missionary Council." The lectures will have as a text-book, "Roads to the City of God—A World Outlook from Jerusalem," by Basil Matthews.

Laymen's Missionary Movement.

The two-day sessions of the Laymen's Missionary Movement held in Richmond March 3 and 4, are receiving enthusiastic support from men and women. Seven hundred people assembled in St. Paul's Episcopal Church Monday morning, and large congregations attended the afternoon lectures as well as the night sessions in the First Baptist Church.

Foreign Missions is the main topic of discussion. All of the speakers seem inspired with power from on high. It is hoped that a detailed account of their addresses may be carried in this paper next week.

SACRAMENTO.

Rt. Rev. Wm. H. Moreland, D. D., Bishop.

Diocesan Convention.

The Twentieth Annual Convention of the Diocese of Sacramento, met in St. Paul's Church, Sacramento, California, February 11-12.

Bishop Moreland in his address singled out three events of prime importance in the advance work of the diocese, which had taken place in the past year.

First, the Rev. Claude Whitehall Silk, M. D., both a minister and a physician, whose wife is a trained nurse, has been secured for the work among the Indians. The bishop said:

"I want the whole diocese to feel the glow of enthusiasm over this new epoch in our Indian work. Dr. Silk will need your support, your prayers, financial aid, missionary boxes, medical supplies. His salary will be $2,100, and he has a family. Here is evidence to the world of what the Christian religion is. Where will you find a graduate physician and surgeon, capable of earning large fees, who is willing to live on as small a salary, save one who is consecrated to Christ's service? The power of Christ's cross is the motive of chivalry and heroism the world over. The world looks on in amazement. It can admire, it cannot imitate such sacrifice."

Another forward step is the placing of a city and suburban missionary in Sacramento and environs. The Rev. Arthur Julian Mockford has been appointed to this post.

The third event is that the Committee on Diocesan Endowment has commissioned the Rev. Webster L. Clark as a Traveling Financial Secretary to secure gifts, pledges and legacies over a period of years until $100,000 has been added to the endowment funds.

The bishop, speaking very earnestly, gave two reasons for the Churches not being better attended, and supported. One reason he said is that "our churches talk much and act little. This is a practical age. People want to serve. They do not know how. People stay away from church because eloquent sermons and artistic surroundings are not enough to hold them. If the Church could provide a task for every soul that burns with love of Christ and humanity our churches would be thronged.

"We are reversing our Lord's plan. He did not urge worship first, but first He trained men. Before we can win America to Christ we must train Americans to win men. The individual Christian must be trained to use his initiative, his love, his integrity and his sacrifice to the end that these may be used for the Kingdom of Christ.

"It is cheering to note how the layman will accept the job laid on him, if he thinks he can do it. He is willing to be vestryman, trustee, treasurer, because he understands how, and he grows better by practice. He is not willing to evangelize, teach, invite other laymen to church and confirmation, because he doesn't know how. When a convert is brought in or a candidate confirmed, nothing is required of him to do for Christ, save to attend a service or hear a sermon.

"The Church is putting its emphasis on food when its greatest need is exercise.

"The Episcopal Church is in a position of wonderful advantage. Its reverence, its influential appeal and open-mindedness, its moderation, aloofness from partisan politics and its glorious past commend it to the American people. But its life is stagnant. Our programs are feeble and meagre. We accomplish little because we attempt little. If we could offer every communicant a definite objective of service for Christ, requiring earnest, sustained action, and this not as a private, individual, affair, but as part of the united, corporate purpose of the whole Body we would transform our churches.

"This leads to the second primary cause of our Church's weakness. We are not organized to carry out the purpose of Christ.

"We are frequently told that parishes are over-organized, that our clergy are slaves of a machine. The truth is, we are not organized to do the right things.

"We have splendid women's societies and they accomplish the things they go after. But we have hardly any men's organizations at all. We have vestries, whose chief concern is to hold titles and pay bills. Our Lord said, 'Go, make disciples'. What group of men or women have we pledged to do this? 'If one member suffers, all the members suffer with it; if one member rejoice, all the members rejoice with it' (1 Cor. 12:26). What organization have we to dispense Christian fellowship and sympathy, to visit the sick, to find employment, to seek out fellow Christians who are lapsed and indifferent, to visit strangers and newcomers? A few parishes have a group system which attempts these things in a half-hearted way. Most parishes do nothing.

"Americans believe in publicity—except the Episcopal Church. We are not organized for publicity.

"We hear how hard it is to raise funds. What live body of laymen have we developing resources and reaching prospects in our parishes?

"The National Church has put before us a magnificent program. It includes some of our own best workers, our Indian mission at Orleans, several of our most valued clergy, but our parishes are not organized to put it over. The great mass of our laity have no idea of the glorious work our Church is doing at home and in all parts of the world. They have not been told. There is no organization to inform them, to inspire them, to hold them up to the quotas asked of them. The result is, quotas are unpaid. Our Diocese of Sacramento is humiliated by being lowest in the list of dioceses and districts of the Eighth Province in the scale of contributions to the National Quota. We have no right to say that our people are indifferent or ungenerous. We have not asked them. We simply have nobody in our parishes outside the rector who cares. We have not laid it on the consciences of the people, that we have no other reason for existence than to carry out the program of Christ.

"We can correct this situation and should do so at once. We can go home from this Convention and form a group of men and women for evangelization, committees for Christian Fellowship, for systematic financing of parishes, publicity, a special group to promote the Church's Program by missionary meeting, education and appeals. We can do these things and a thousand more if we will set free the latent power of our laity and link them up with definite tasks of service.

"Money is not the chief concern. There is plenty of money. It goes for what people are interested in. The trouble lies deeper. Sometimes a parish gets walled up until the people can't see over the parochial fences, with the result that enthusiasm dies. Religion is love in action. Christianity is adventure, sacrifice, heroism. Where the people are not organized to carry out the purposes of Christ the parish loses its spiritual power, until it comes to resemble an engine chained to the track, pulling nothing, getting nowhere, using up its fuel in making its own wheels go round."

Concluding his address with a plea for unity, Bishop Moreland reminded his hearers that this year is the nineteen hundredth anniversary of the first Pentecost, when was created the Catholic Church, the Divine Society which the Holy Spirit inspired with eternal energy. He stressed the necessity that the average Churchman of today should share in the revelation of the Universal Kingdom, which so amazed the apostles then.

"When a body is torn with wounds and broken, the remedy is to increase the flow of life. We must recognize the Holy Spirit as the Giver of Life. Let us yield ourselves to the Spirit, try to speak to every man in his own tongue, see things with other men's eyes, appreciate their difficulties, honor their sincerity, see the best in every system, have a kindly regard for all people.

"But through it all let us hold up the Catholic Church as God's new creation. Lovers of Christ will ultimately come to see that the only solution of Christian unity is to go on adapting the Catholic Church to every age by the power of the Holy Spirit."

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., Bishop

Miss Boyer Addresses Enthusiastic Audiences.

Widespread interest among the Woman's Auxiliaries in the country, and city parishes, was shown in the visit to Washington recently of Miss Laura F. Boyer, Vice-President for Education of the Woman's Auxiliary, of the Diocese of New York. She spoke on the Jerusalem Conference at All Saints' Church, Chevy Chase, where representatives of twenty parishes gathered to hear her, and to lunch together afterwards. Twice she talked to B Branches of the Woman's Auxiliary, on the same subject; and at the Church of the Epiphany she spoke on Personal Evangelism. Miss Boyer is a great favorite and her hearers expressed themselves as being very thankful that they were able to secure her services.

Bishop Freeman Prays for Chief Justice Taft.

Washington Cathedral took on a truly national aspect during the past week, when the voice of Bishop Freeman calling the Nation to prayer for former President and Chief Justice Taft went out of Bethlehem Chapel over a coast-to-coast network of radio stations, as William Howard Taft lay in the shadow of death at his Wyoming Avenue home.

The prayers were spoken from the little Bethlehem Chapel of Washington Cathedral, wherein lie the bodies of another former President, Woodrow Wilson; Admiral Dewey, Melville Stone and other famous Americans.

The service, which went out on the Columbia Broadcasting System network from WMAL here, was the first of the sort ever broadcast and was put on the air without regard to the religious convictions of Mr. Taft, who is a staunch Unitarian.

Listening in while Bishop Freeman prayed, "Hear, O Lord, we beseech Thee, our prayers as we call upon Thee on behalf of this, Thy servant, William Howard Taft, and bestow upon him the health of Thy merciful consolation, through Jesus Christ, our Lord," were Mrs. Taft and the former Chief Justice's daughter, Mrs. Helen Taft Manning, both of whom have stayed close to the bedside of the stricken jurist since he became ill.

Bishop Freeman prefaced the service with the following announcement:

"From the Cathedral in the Capital a Nation-wide call to prayer is made at this hour in behalf of one of America's foremost sons. Former Chief Justice Taft lies critically ill in his home. His incomparable service to the Nation as Secretary of War, President of the Republic and Chief Justice of the Supreme Court gives him unique place in our history. We bid our people to prayer for one who universally is held as the most beloved of the Nation's outstanding public servants. May the God and Father of us all have him in His gracious care and keeping."

During the service the boys' choir of the Cathedral sang the Twenty-third Psalm, "The Lord Is My Shepherd," and the One Hundred and Thirtieth, "Out of the Deep I Called Unto Thee, O Lord." The hymn was "My Faith Looks Up to Thee."

The service was conducted by the Rev. Raymond L. Wolven, Canon of Washington. Music was under the direction of Edgar Priest, organist and choirmaster of the Cathedral.

Men of the Church.

The Men of the Church in Washington have been actively engaged recently by a stirring gathering of members of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew on Mt. St. Alban, February 22, and the Laymen's Fellowship Dinner in honor of Bishop Freeman on February 25.

About one hundred and fifty men and boys in all attended this annual Corporate Communion and service of the Brotherhood, and felt one and all ar added enthusiasm for the Brotherhood of St. Andrew.

The Fellowship Dinner on Tuesday February 26 was held at the Hamilton Hotel, and about six hundred men attended. At the head table were found the members of the committee in charge, which included: Major F. Granville Munson, chairman; Edwin A. Halig, secretary; N. W. Dorsey, treasurer; H. D. Amiss, chairman of arrangements; Hugh T. Nelson, J. W. Chambers, Admiral S. S. Wood, J. Harris Franklin, Arthur Anderton, R. C. Henry, Bussey Howard; Commissioners Le Duen, Dougherty and Taliaferro, the Bishop of Washington, Dean Bratenahl, the Rt. Rev. Charles Fiske, D. D., LL. D., Bishop of Central New York, and others.

Fellowship, the name given to the dinner was truly the keynote of the evening, and good fun and feeling were present in the remarks of the presiding officer and the principal speakers. There was also a serious note, and hymns, prayers and fine addresses by the two Bishops were most impressive to all of those present at the dinner, and the many who looked on from the outside. The late Commander T. C. Jewell and Colonel John H. Finney, prominent laymen of the diocese, who have entered into Life Eternal during the past year were remembered in prayer, while all the men stood in tribute to their lives of service and devotion to the Church's work.

Church of the Heavenly Rest, New York.

Two interesting events are characterizing activities at the Church of the Heavenly Rest, for the spring months.

On Monday, March 3, at 9:30 A. M., a private day school kindergarten was opened under the auspices of the Church School with Miss Ellen M. Shore, of the Harriet Melissa-Mills Kindergarten and Primary Training School, in charge. This school has been opened for the benefit of children in the neighborhood of the church, where all kindergarten facilities are taxed beyond their capacity. It will be operated on day school methods, but in the religious environment of the church and under the general supervision of the Director of Religious Education, the Rev. Robert M. M. Redenbaugh. Enrollment is practically completed for this initial term and registrations are now being accepted for next fall.

On Friday of last week (February 28) at this church, Dr. Adelaide T. Case, Associate Professor of Education at Columbia University, began a series of lectures on principles and methods in modern religious education. In this course eight lectures will be supplemented with eight field work sessions on eight Sunday mornings, when students will do practice work in the Church School of the Heavenly Rest. The course will deal with the reconstruction of the modern Church School; present tendencies in religious education; project method; and industrial arts and fine arts in their relation to the Church School. This is the first time Columbia University has given full credit for a course in religious education offered in a church and where the Church School is used as a laboratory for the course. Two credits toward advanced degrees at Teachers' College will be granted by the University.

Lenten services at the Church of the Heavenly Rest will open with Holy Communion on Ash Wednesday at 7:30 and COLLECT FOR FIRST SUNDAY IN LENT.

O Lord, Who for our sake didst fast forty days and forty nights; Give us grace to use such abstinence, that our flesh being subdued to the Spirit, we may ever obey Thy godly motions in righteousness, and true holiness, to Thy honor and glory, Who livest and reignest with the Father and the Holy Ghost, one God, world without end. Amen.

A PRAYER IN TIME OF STRESS.

Eva T. Harrington.

God of the Spirit Clean,
Look down upon things unseen—
Like human hearts;
Seest Thou the pain, the woe—
Puzzles which perlex me so—
Wounds which I must not show
Rending the soul?

These bitter thoughts of self,
Crying for love—for life,
Demanding their own:
See how they rise, and creep
Swelling, tumultuous, leap —Sure with tremendous sweep
Shaking foundations.

Let Thy protecting arm
Save me from hurt and harm,
Clear up my brain.
Show me the path so straight
Leading from wrong to right—
Clear up the fog, give sight—
Lessen the pain.

Lord, take my hand in Thine,
Wipe off the dust, the grime,
Wash out my soul:
Then, from myself set free
Turn me, that I may see
Faith, hope and love all three Surrounding, enfolding.

Others there are, like me,
Whoe hearts, torn in agony,
Break in their pain:
Lord, I would understand,
Love, help, and comfort them;
Hold out a friendly hand
Sharing their burdens.

God of the Spirit Brave—
Look down, preserve and save
Our souls from hatred:
Grant us the power to forgive
All injuries done us: so to live
That in the end right, honor, truth,
May rise triumphant.

Come Ye Yourselves Apart and Rest Awhile.

The president of the W. A. ran up the steps of St. Timothy's parish hall and paused with her hand upon the latch. She was quite out of breath. She knew that she ought not to have hurried up the hill. The doctor had talked to her very seriously about the importance of "going slowly."

"That heart of yours won't stand much strain, Mrs. Turnbull," he had warned her, "but if you are careful to avoid all excitement and do not walk fast or run, it may last some years yet."

Hannah Turnbull tried to remember but she had always been an active women and it was hard to break the habits of a life time. She had been very much afraid of being late for the meeting this afternoon. It would not do to be late just as she was retiring from the presidency of the W. A. She had walked up the hill very quickly, quite forgetting what the doctor had told her and now she would have to pay for her thoughtlessness. Her heart was pounding like a hammer and her head felt light and queer. There was a strange beating in her temples and at the back of her neck. She was dreadfully afraid that she was going to have one of her attacks. She opened the door and entered. No sounds came from the room where the womens organizations met. She crossed the hall and opened the inner door quietly. The room was empty and the hands of the big clock on the wall pointed to twenty minutes to three. Why, she was early! Her watch must have been fast! There would be twenty minutes to wait before the meeting began and she was the first to arrive! Perhaps it would be a good thing to go to the Girls' Club Room and lie down on the sofa for a little while. It would never do to have a heart attack here and today of all days!

On the way to the Girls' Club Room she passed the door that led from the parish hall into the church. Obeying a swift impulse Hannah Turnbull pushed open the green baize swinging doors and entered. How still and silent it was here! Somehow, in this holy place, where prayer was wont to be made, she felt that she would find rest and healing more surely than anywhere else. The church was dim, but, with a sort of homing instinct, the woman found her way at once to her accustomed seat and sank down upon it with a sigh of relief. Her heart was beating more normally now, but she felt a sensation of unutterable weariness stealing over her. It would be nice to sit for a little while in the family pew and rest.

St. Timothy's Church made the proud boast that all seats were free and unappropriated, but there were some families, like the Turnbulls who always occupied one pew. They looked upon it as theirs by right of their regular attendance and no other member of the congregation would have thought of sitting in it.

There had been a time when the Turnbull family had filled the whole pew. Hannah recalled that time now. There had been five children and old Aunt Tilly who had made her home with her nephews family the last few years before she died. Eight people had filled solemnly into that pew every Sunday morning and now there were only two, her husband and herself.

One by one Hannah recalled those of her loved ones who had worshipped here with her. Now they were scattered over the globe: Nellie and Arthur, comfortably settled in homes of their own in the Far West; Andrew and Ruth working for God in the foreign mission field, and there was Harry, who slept among the flowers in the well kept Canadian cemetery across the sea in Belgium. Hannah looked up at the stained glass window through which the afternoon sun was softly filtering. She read again the inscription beneath:

"To the glory of God and the memory of Corporal Harry Turnbull, of the Nineteenth Battalion C. E. F., killed in action on the Somme Front, September 11th, 1916. Aged 22 years.

"Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends."

And once again as so often before, Hannah Turnbull felt that her soldier son was nearer to her than any of her other children. How was it, she wondered, that so often as she sat here and the light came through Harry's memorial window and fell upon her, that she seemed to feel his presence? Could it be that God permitted him sometimes to visit the sacred place where, as a little boy, and as youth growing into manhood, he had worshipped with his parents?

Her thoughts went back to the old days when she had had all the children at home. She realized now that they had been very happy days though at the time she had often been harrassed and worried. How many times had she knelt right in this pew and tried hard to compose the tumult of materialistic thoughts that seethed in her brain. The hole that she had just noticed in Harry's stocking. Was Ruth going to be fidgety? Had she remembered to turn the Sunday roast over and lower the gas before she left the house? How busy she had always been in those days. How much there had been to think of and attend to. She had not been able to do very much church work, but she managed to do her bit, and then, as the girls grew older she had had more and more time to give. Twenty years ago she had been elected president of the W.A. She had watched St. Timothy's branch grow from a small organization with sixteen members to a strong, powerful body of women who numbered nearly two hundred and who supported a native worker in China beside many other activities. The W.A. had been her life work ever since the children had grown beyond the need of her care. There was no one who quite realized just what it meant to her to give the work up. To outsiders, she had smiled bravely and said:

"Don't you think that after twenty years of service as president, I ought to have a holiday? My doctor says that I must give it up, so I'm going to take a real rest." But in the depths of her own heart she knew the bitterness of disappointment and sorrow. To her it seemed that this was the beginning of the end. She had become useless. She was being cast aside like an old shoe. Oh, why did one's body not keep pace with the eager spirit within it? Her enthusiasm and interest in the work were as keen as ever. She was full of zeal and earnestness, but the poor old body was wearing out and because of it she must rest in idleness. A heart-broken sob broke from her lips. She drooped to her knees and buried her face in her hands.

"I did want to die in harness," she whispered brokenly, "O God, let the end come quickly."

Suddenly through the quiet of the empty church stole the sweet strains of a familiar hymn. Hannah Turnbull did not lift her head, but the music flowed over her, covered her and acted as balm to her troubled and broken spirit. Almost as if some one was speaking the words to her came the comforting message:

"Come ye yourselves apart and rest awhile,
Weary, I know it of the press and throng;
Wipe from your brow the sweat and dust of toil,
And in My quiet strength again be strong.

"Come ye aside from all the world holds dear,
For converse which the world has never known,
Alone with Me and with My Father here,
With Me and with My Father not alone."

A strange sweet peace seemed to envelope Hannah Turnbull. The bitterness within her gave place to joy and thanksgiving. After all, she thought contritely, her Heavenly Father knew exactly what was best for His child. She had received a call to a different sort of service, that was all. It was a service of quiet communion and blessed fellowship with the Unseen. It seemed to her that there, in the empty church, as the organ was softly playing, she had been given a glimpse of the new room that she was about to enter. She was not being laid aside as useless and worn out, she was being raised to higher and, perhaps, more important service. From now on, instead of the bustle and rush of active work it would be hers to bear up the busier ones on the wings of prayer. Henceforth she must rest quietly in the shadow and intercede for the others who were bearing the burden and the heat of the day.

Very softly she repeated the words of her favorite collect:

"Almighty God, unto whom all hearts be open, all desires known and from no secrets are hid, Cleanse the thoughts of our hearts by the inspiration of Thy Holy Spirit that we may perfectly love Thee, and worthily magnify Thy Holy Name through Christ our Lord. Amen."

She wiped the traces of tears from her face, straightened her hat and walked down the aisle of the church with a firm step. She smiled a cheery greeting to the organist who was practicing in the chancel and passed through the door into the parish hall a different women to the one who had entered the church less than an hour before.

In the women's room there was a pleasant hum of friendly voices. The sewing meeting was in full swing. There were, however, several members who were not too preoccupied to see the happy light in the eyes of the retiring president. Hannah Turnbull's sweet face wore a rapt exalted expression and those who knew her best could not help but notice it.

In the same way it was once said long ago of two other followers of the Master:

"They took knowledge of them that they had been with Jesus."—C. N. L., in Canadian Churchman.

Are These Good Reasons?

An African woman once asked a sad question of a missionary, and we should let its challenge ring in our ears as we think about this week's topic. She said, "Why do not more come to tell us? Is it because they do not love us, or because they do not love Christ very much?"

There are several good reasons under which missions may be abolished. We may set them by contrast by reading the verses in our Scripture lesson. The first one is unbelief that all power in heaven and in earth has been given unto the Lord Jesus Christ and resides in Him. If we do not believe that He is God's unique Son into whose hands has been committed all power, then we may well give up all that has been gained in foreign lands, for it has been won only on this basis and we shall not have courage or the strength to carry on without an all-powerful Saviour.

The second reason is an unwillingness to teach and preach to the lost "all things" whatsoever Christ has commanded us. He himself has said, "Ye must be born again" (John 3:7). He said, "I and the Father are one" (John 10:30). Again we find Him saying, "I came forth from the Father, and am come into the world: again, I leave the world, and go to the Father . . . . These things I have spoken unto you, that in me, ye might have peace. . . . I am the vine, ye are the branches; He that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit; for without me ye can do nothing" (John 16:28, 33 and John 15:5). If we are not willing to teach that the Lord Jesus is the Son of God, or that those who do not know Him are eternally lost, if we do not believe that only in living, vital touch with Him can we do anything to help the lost, then we may well abandon missions, for we have no message to carry and no incentive. In fact, we are wasting time in missions if those without Christ are not lost, for they do not need a Saviour, and may be left undisturbed with their idols of wood and stone.

A third reason, under which we may abolish missions is an unwillingness to heed the command of our Lord. His Word tells us to go and to teach and to baptize and to witness (Matt. 28:19 and Acts 1:8). If we do not recognize our Lord's command to us, then may we well abandon missions, for we have no authority for carrying the Good News to others.—Exchange.

WITHIN GOD'S HOLY TEMPLE.

Charles Nevers Holmes.

The cares of life, its sorrows cease,
Contentment cheers our heart once more,
Our soul is now again at pace
Inside this sanctuary's door.

Within this church dwell hope and health,
No pompous pride and sordid sin;
Outside its door is worthless wealth,
A city's crowd a city's din.

Its organ and our songs resound
Responses echo low and clear,
Love, grace and fellowship abound
Within God's sacred temple here.

Like sinners who for pardon sue
And through His Cross redemption find,
We humbly kneel within our pew,
Before Christ's presence, pure and kind.

The cares of life, its sorrows cease,
God's holy spirit on us falls,
Our soul is now once more at peace
Inside this sanctuary's walls.

Petko Gets His Trousers.

Allen McMahon.

"But I have no levas with which to pay," said little seven-year-old Petko Dimitr, big brown eyes in a thin little face turned up to the kindly gaze of the serious woman who bent over him. "Yet a pair of trousers I must have, as you can see for yourself."

Yes, it was quite evident that Petko was in need of a pair of diminutive trousers. It would have been difficult to describe the species of tattered garment that hung upon his small and slender frame.

"They are only twenty levas (about 12 cents)," said the woman.

"I have not even one leva," said Petko, "and yet I must have the trousers."

"Are you a refugee boy?" asked the woman.

"Yes," said Petko.

"Where is your registration paper," he was asked.

"My mother has it."

"Then why did she not come with you to get the trousers?"

"Because she has to work."

"Oh, she works then?"

Petko sighed.

"Yes," he replied, "she works."

"And you say you have no money?"

"Oh, lady, she earns only thirty levas a day."

Just another case!

The kind woman, a refugee herself, understood. The minimum living wage in Bulgaria is fifty levas a day (about 35 cents), living cost have increased thirty times and the leva decreased from 19.3 to .72 since 1914.

The condition is difficult of remedy, as the worker knew. How can there be employment for all, and at a decent wage, when a little country like Bulgaria has accepted 52,000 refugee families, totalling 220,000 persons, only 116,000 of whom are capable of working, even if work can be found?

Since last summer Near East Relief's warehouse has been emptied, for on June 30, appeals were discontinued. Yet Bulgaria's urgency should be met, for that little country is struggling under a burden too heavy to be carried alone.

Little Petko got his trousers, even though he lacked the twelve cents asked for them. So have thirty-three per cent of all who have come seeking clothes in the Near East Relief clothing shops in Sofia and other Bulgarian towns. Others pay up to a dollar for a nice warm overcoat from an American old clothes bag, fifty cents for a pair of shoes, a few cents for small garments for little children.

All who can afford to pay, do pay a pittance to save their self-respect. There is never enough to meet the demand. With this money they help their kind who are worse off than they are. The money pays the wages of refugee women who unpack and sort the huge bales of clothes from America, mend, make over and press the garments until they look like new, and hang them up in orderly and classified rows, so that even a poor, down-at-heel refugee can issue forth from a Near East Relief Shop, euipped to face a new day of hard work with the knowledge that he is respectably clothed. He knows that whatever is left over of the money he has paid is given to an orphanage and child clinic. His purchases are entered on a card. He may buy only the minimum of garments which he will need in a year. He knows that his purchase helps to pay the women fifty to sixty levas (35 to 42 cents) a day, a living wage in Bulgaria.

All who wish to aid in this work may do so by getting out from the trunk in the attic, from the back hooks of the bedroom closet, the warm coat and sweater, the nice woolen dress and sturdy shoes that have helped to weather a winter in comfort, packing them into a bundle, and sending them to the new warehouse of Near East Relief. 333 Thirty-eighth Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Who counts the cost of love may fail to love at greater cost.

For the Young People

LITTLE THINGS TO DO.

We all like friends, along the way,
And make their troubled paths seem gay;
We like to make grey skies seem blue
With little things that we can do.

We like to do our little part
To ease some broken, bleeding heart,
And friends will always be so true;
They love the little things we do.

We need a friend to help along,
To fill our souls with joyful song;
To have these friends along the way,
Let's do the little things today.

So let us vow, with sincere heart,
To do our little, humble part,
Let's to each friend be ever true,
With just the little things we do.

Jack's Trade.

Uncle Jack was on the front porch apparently absorbed in his newspaper. His nephew—a namesake—was nearby on the lawn trying to trade a knife to Bob Kenney. The knife looked all right, but Uncle Jack knew that it was not good for much. He also knew that Jack was perfectly aware of its worthlessness. And yet he heard him saying persuasively: "You won't very often run up against a better-looking knife. Better take it while you can get it. I've got two others, so you see I do not really need it."

After a little more urging Bob took it, and Jack came up the steps whistling, a half-dollar in his pocket in the place of the knife.

"Good trade, that!" he said complacently as he dropped into the hammock.

"Was it?" said Uncle Jack, soberly.

"Well, perhaps it was better for me than it was for Bob, but that was his lookout, not mine. I did not say a word that was not true. I said it was a mighty nice looking knife, and it is. It was up to him to find out whether it was good for anything or not. Guess there wouldn't be many trades made if folks ran their own goods down."

"I was rather interested in a little story I happened to run across the other day," said Uncle Jack presently. "A wealthy American living in Paris was suspicious that he was harboring a thief in his household. Various little articles mysteriously disappeared from time to time, and occasionally small sums of money were missing from his purse; but do his best, he could get no clue to the thief.

"Finally, he hit upon an experiment. He procured a small vial of a certain acid and put it in a little case on his dressing table with several coins. If any one attempted to remove one of the coins he would upset the vial, and the acid would stain the hands of the thief an indelible yellow.

"The very next day he found the case had been tampered with, two of the coins were missing and the vial had been upset. Shortly after he discovered the tell-tale stains on his valet's hands. Very likely the fellow, though he may not have suspected the tray, was dismayed when he saw the stain; but I sometimes wonder if we realize that every time we say or do or act falsely it leaves an ugly stain, not on our hands, but on our souls. No matter how small and insignificant the sin seems to us, it makes a wretched stain."

Jack made no comment, but his uncle saw him glance involuntarily at his hands as if half expecting to find yellow marks, and very soon he got up and strolled down into the orchard. Somehow he did not feel so proud over his trade as he had. Perhaps, after all, it wasn't smart to "do" a fellow like that. When you stopped really to think about it, it did seem very much like cheating.

"Uncle Jack never preaches at a fellow, but he always manages to have a story to tell that makes you feel mean when you've done anything out of the way," he thought. "I might as well hunt up Bob and buy the knife back. I won't have any peace of mind until I do, that's sure."—Zion's Herald.

Little Ralph Tag-a-long.

Myrtle was twelve years old. She had lots of fun always, playing run-sheep-run, catcher, I-spy, and other games. There seemed to be lots of children of Myrtle's age in the neighborhood. Now Myrtle had a very lovable little brother just four years old. It was really too bad that Ralph had to play so much alone. There were no other children around who didn't go to school, so all during school hours Ralph would play his make-believe games and watch for Myrtle and her friends to come home from school.

Almost every afternoon Myrtle would take Ralph to play with them and he would race along as fast as his little short legs would take him, for he tried hard never to be a bother to the others.

Myrtle's friends teased her a great deal because she always had a baby tagging along with her. So one afternoon, when Myrtle started out to play, she said to her little brother, "Run along back and play in the yard. You won't get hurt that way and you're so little you might get hurt in some of our rough games."

"Oh, Myrtle," begged Ralph, "let me go, I'll be careful, let me go, and I'll even just watch."

It was hard for Myrtle to leave him, but she remembered that she wasn't going to have a baby tagging along after her, so she answered quite kindly, "Not this time, Ralph, be a good little boy and I will bring you something."

So she ran on, leaving Ralph trying bravely to hold back the tears which would come to his eyes. The children played Myrtle's favorite game, but she didn't seem to enjoy it one bit. She kept wondering about Ralph, and thinking to herself, "He really isn't any trouble, I do hope he's having fun."

After the second game, Myrtle could stand it no longer, she chased back home as fast as she could. Ralph was on the back step, a very forlorn little boy. Myrtle ran up to him and took hold of his hand "Come on, Ralph, come on, I can't have any fun when you're not along."

"Oh," gasped Ralph, as he chased along with her, "I knew you would come and get me, for you're the only one who has a little brother to play with her."

And that's what made Myrtle understand why the others teased her about having a baby tagging along after her. She was very sure that every one of the older children secretly wished for a little brother. "Why," thought Myrtle, "I don't see how they have a bit of fun, for I didn't when Ralph wasn't with us."—The Christian-Evangelist.

Patsy Wins a Prize.

Patsy Allen was one of the happiest little girls in all America—she said so herself, because she believed it; and yet sometimes in spite of her happiness she was lonely—or she was until she became acquainted with the country.

Now it happened this way: Patsy, who had always lived in an orphanage, was adopted one lonely fall day by a farmer and his wife who lived some ten miles from the city. They took Patsy to live with them on the farm.

Oh, but Patsy did love the beautiful country. She had never seen a whole field of wheat growing before; nor had she ever seen such interesting things as cows and sheep and pigs. All of these were new to her when she went to the farm, but she loved them every one, and immediately began to make friends with them. Then winter came on, and the farmer turned his attention to indoor work, and Patsy worked with him.

Down in the cellar he grew mushrooms, and taught Patsy the art of rooting things in sand. Life suddenly became too wonderful for words—every day was far too short for Patsy to learn all she wanted to know about the things she discovered on the farm. And then there was her school and Sunday school—almost as much as the farm Patsy came to love the little country church where she went every Sunday with her foster parents—everybody was so friendly and kind; and then the little red schoolhouse where she went for daily instruction while farm work was slack—it was hard to say which of the two she loved best—the day or the Sunday school.

One afternoon on coming home from day school, she stopped to speak to her foster father.

"I'm clean up against it, father," she said softly, "the teacher has offered a prize to the one remembering Washington's birthday in the most unique way, and I can't think of a single idea."

Father Allen was preparing some hotbeds when Patsy mentioned the matter to him, and though he promised to help, it seemed as if he could think of nothing in the world but plants.

"Please, father," begged Patsy, "let me help smooth the dirt in the boxes for the seed you are going to plant."

"To be sure, I'll be glad to have you help me, my dear," the man answered. Presently the two became engrossed in their work, and no more was said about the prize.

When Father Allen brought the seed to plant in a small box that Patsy had smoothed to a powdery fineness, he smiled broadly; then with his big, clumsy fingers he began to trace little rows across the fresh dirt and carefully drop in the seed.

Patsy, watching, began clapping her hands in sheer joy—in a flash a great idea was born in her fertile brain; but all Father Allen's coaxing failed to extricate the secret.

"Father," said Patsy later on that same afternoon, "may I lay off one little box just as it pleases me to?"

"Sure you may," answered the father, "and far be it from me to criticize your rows."

"I believe," said Patsy, "I'll use the lettuce seed for my planting, since we don't transplant lettuce from the hotbeds before the last of February."

"First of March," corrected the man, as he handed her the package of lettuce seed and turned to investigate another box he wanted to convert into a hotbed for sweet peppers.

That night Patsy went to bed very happy, for her father had praised the smooth finish of her little hotbed enthusiastically, yet for the life of her she couldn't help but giggle as she crawled into bed that night.

The next morning Father Allen had a suggestion for the Washington prize contest, but seeing it didn't strike Patsy's fancy, he soon dropped the subject and never brought it up again, and neither did Patsy.

When he went out to inspect his hotbed one morning several days later, Father Allen found something that for a moment caused him considerable worry. Never in his life had he seen anything so crooked as the tiny green lettuce plants that were shooting upward through the rich, black dirt in one of his boxes. Then he remembered that this particular sowing had been done by Patsy, and gave it no further notice. But a few days later he saw Patsy eyeing the same box with rapt admiration.

"Can't say that I call that much for straight sowing, Patsy," said the man pleasantly, coming across the space that separated them.

"Look at it carefully, father," said the girl, "and see if you can't discover beauty in my curves."

For five minutes Father Allen bent above the box, tracing curves and crooks made by the little green spirals shooting through the earth, and then, all of a sudden, he began to laugh—laugh as Patsy had never heard him laugh before—and he motioned her to his side.

"Patsy, darling," he said in the most joyous tones, "I believe you will get the prize."

And sure enough, when the contest for the most unique way of remembering the Father of our Country came, Patsy Allen walked off with the prize, and incidentally she walked away with a box of tiny lettuce plants also, for in planting the lettuce seed she had outlined ten letters in the soft earth with her fingers, and had carefully laid the seed in the tracing, to bring forth at old Mother Nature's bidding. Consequently, Patsy was a very happy girl, when she marched into the school room on the morning of the twenty-second of February, and displayed a small box of earth. Across its top in soft, green lettuce letters was plainly visible the name WASHINGTON.

But happier even than Patsy were her foster parents, because they knew the idea of remembering Washington in this manner was her very own and truly original.—Letitia M. Barr, in Light and Life Evangel.

Everybody's Boat.

There was once a man down on Cape Cod who wished to build a boat for himself. So he got the timber together at the edge of the water and set to work to lay the keel of the boat. The keel of a boat is like the foundation of a house. You must build that first.

But the captain had no sooner begun work than one of his neighbors passed by and said, "Mornin', Cap'n. I see you're goin' to build a boat."

"Yes," said the captain, "I thought I'd build a boat for myself."

"Well, I wouldn't lay the keel that way." And then he showed the captain how he would lay the keel.

"I don't know but you're right," said the captain. And he set to work to build it that way.

Soon another neighbor drove by and said, "Mornin', Captain, buildin' a boat, eh?"

"Yes," said the captain. "Didn't know but I would."

"That ain't the right way to lay the keel," said the neighbor. "I'll show you the best way."

"I guess you're right," said the Captain. So he began to work on the keel that way.

Several neighbors passed in the course of the day, and no two agreed as to which was the right way to lay the keel of a boat. Each one thought his way was the best. And the Captain tried to make use of all their suggestions.

At last the boat was finished. But it was useless. It just went around in circles, and the Captain drew it upon the shore in disgust and left it there to rot. Then he set to work nearby to build another boat. But he no sooner began to work on the keel than his neighbors began to make more suggestions.

Finally the Captain said, "See here, that is everybody's boat on the beach there. I took everybody's advice bui'ding that, and it's no use at all. I'm going to build this boat my own way."

And he built the second boat his own way. When it was done it was a great success.

The person who tries to please everybody usually comes out about the way the captain did with his first boat. He usually ends by pleasing nobody, not even himself! St. Paul speaks about people who are "blown about by every wind of doctrine," and he says they don't make much headway. They listen to everybody, and so they are always changing their course.

Have you ever seen a chameleon? It is a little animal like a lizard, and it takes on whatever color it is near. It doesn't seem to have any color of its own.

Now, the world does not like colorless people. It likes those who have a mind of their own. It wants a man, if he is going to build a boat, to have an idea how he is going to build it, and then stick to that idea. It likes boys and girls when they know what they want to be like to stick to their course and go straight ahead.

When you are tempted to change your mind too often, remember the captain and everybody's boat.—Story Sermons for Children.

Nevers—For Boys.

Never make fun of old age, no matter how decrepit, or unfortunate, or evil it may be. God's hand rests lovingly on the aged head.

Never use intoxicating liquors. Beer, wine and whiskey will do you no good, and they will wreck your life. Better be on the safe side.

Never make sport of one of those miserable creatures—a drunken man or woman. They are wrecks; but God alone knows the stress of the storms which drove them upon the breakers. Weep, rather than laugh.

Never tell or listen to the telling of filthy stories. Cleanliness in word and act is the manual of a true gentleman. You cannot handle filth without becoming fouled.

Never cheat nor be unfair in your play. Cheating is contemptible any where at any age. Your play should strengthen, not weaken, your character.

Never call anybody bad names, no matter what anybody calls you. You cannot throw mud and keep your hands clean.

Never be cruel. Cruelty is the trait of a bully, kindliness the mark of a gentleman.

Never lie. So-called "white lies" leave black spots on the character. What is your opinion of a liar? Do you wish other people to have a like opinion of yourself?

Never hesitate to say "no" when asked to do a wrong thing. It will often require courage—the best kind of courage, moral courage—but say "no" so distinctly that no one can possibly understand you to mean "yes."

Never be unkind to your mother and father. When they are dead and you have children of your own, you will discover that even though you did your best, you were able to make only a part payment of the debt you owed them. The balance you must carry over to your own children.

Never fancy you know more when fifteen years old than your father and mother have learned in all the years of their lives. Wisdom is not given to babies.

Never forget that God made you to be a joyous, lovable, helpful being. Be one.—Selected.

BOOK THOUGHTS.

I sometimes stop to thing about
  My books upon the shelves.
I wonder if they whisper things
  And talk among themselves.

But I suppose they never talk;
  They'd rather be a part
Of things I think and dream about
  Deep in my mind and heart.

My books are just like friendly friends,
  No two are just the same.
I love them for their different ways,
  And know each one by name.

One friend takes me to foreign lands;
  Another shows me kings
While still another teaches me
  Of places, men, and things.

Some show me how to use my hands
  In many, many ways.
And others take me racing back
  To strange and ancient days.

Yes, all my books are friends indeed;
  With them I always find
A kindly welcome and the best
  Of food for heart and mind.

The Maple Tree's Visitor.

Whew-whew-whew," whistled the wind.

"Winter is coming," sighed the birch. "We will be so lonesome. The birds have all flown away."

The flowers have all gone, too," sighed the elm, "and now our leaves are going. Soon we shall be all alone."

"My acorns have all fallen," moaned the oak tree. "No birds, no flowers. How lonesome we shall be."

"Never mind," said the maple, cheerily, "I think we shall have some visitors. Even if the robins and the bluebirds have gone, we will have some one, I am sure. And if we have no leaves, we shall have icicles shining in the sun."

Just then a little squirrel ran up the trunk of the maple tree.

"Please, may I have my home in this nice, deep hole?" he asked.

"Certainly," answered the maple; "stay all winter if you wish."

So the squirrel ran up and down the trunk of the tree dropping in the nuts he found on the ground until at last he had his winter's supply. Then he curled himself up comfortably in the warmest corner.

"I told you we would have company," said the maple. "Now, I shall have some one to talk to all winter."

All through the winter the maple tree watched over the little squirrel and rattled her branches, which was her way of talking to him.

"You see," she said to the other trees,

"what one expects to have comes to pass. Next year if you expect company to spend the winter, I am sure some one will come."—Exchange.

Farmer Ladd's Cherry Tree.

Jack and Jean were very much afraid of Farmer Ladd. He was a big man with a great black beard and a deep, gruff voice; and he was known as the enemy of all children far and near, especially of naughty boys. He had a snappy black dog that barked at every one who put a foot inside the gate, and it was said he kept a big whip in his barn which he was sure to use if he found any one touching his apples. No wonder Jack and Jean were afraid of him! Whenever they had to go by his farm they took hands and ran as fast as they could until they were quite past and all out of breath.

One lovely day in early summer their mother sent them to another farm to buy some eggs. On their way there they ran as usual when they came to Farmer Ladd's, but coming home they had to walk for fear of break the eggs that Jack carried in his basket. They were going just as fast as they possible could when Jean cried, "Oh, look!"

Jack looked, and there in Farmer Ladd's field, only a few steps from the road, was a cherry tree just covered with ripe, luscious cherries.

"What lovely cherries!" said Jack, and they both stopped and stared.

"Oh, don't you suppose we could get some?" said Jean.

They looked all around them and then Jack said, "I don't see anybody, do you?"

"No," said Jean, "and I don't see the dog, either. Let's try, shall we?"

In a minute they were through the fence and walking toward the cherry tree. Their fear was forgotten in their desire for the cherries. Now, they were standing under the tree and Jack put down his basket of eggs and made ready to climb up. But just as he was about to start, Jean suddenly put her hand on his arm.

"Oh, Jack, we mustn't" she said.

Jack looked at her in surprise.

"Why not?" he asked.

"It would be stealing, and you know the Ten Commandments say, 'Thou shalt not steal.' Don't you remember?"

"So they do," said Jack, looking very disappointed. "I suppose we'll have to let them go."

For a moment they stood gazing at the beautiful cherries, then taking up their basket again, and with many a backward look, they climbed back through the fence and set once more on their home way.

It was not far from the cherry tree to Farmer Ladd's gate. They were just about to pass it when what was their dismay to see it open and Farmer Ladd himself step out on to the road and plant himself squarely in their path! Their hearts nearly stopped beating, for he was scowling at them in a most alarming manner.

"I saw you looking at my cherry tree," he said, and his voice sounded dreadful to the two children.

"Please, sir, we didn't hurt your tree," said Jack stoutly. "We never touched a thing."

"You don't need need to tell me what you did or didn't do," said the farmer. "I saw for myself."

"But it's true," said Jean, almost crying. "We didn't touch it, really!"

"I said," repeated the farmer, "that I saw everything." And he continued to scowl.

'Let's make a run for it," whispered

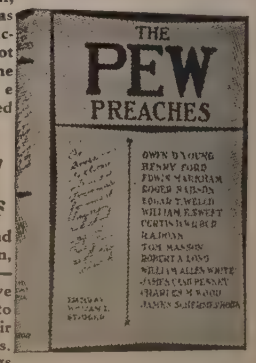
WHEN THE TIME COMES, REMEMBER WINNSBORO GRANITE.

Wouldn't it be a comforting thought to know that a century from now or two centuries from now the final resting places of those who are near and dear to you will be marked by memorials erected through your thoughtfulness and loving care?

When the time comes to purchase a monument to perpetuate precious memories, be sure to specify in your contract "Winnsboro Granite". The difference between genuine Winnsboro Granite and an inferior stone will be clearly apparent in a few years.

Winnsboro Granite stands out above all other monumental material as the leader in quality. It is remarkably beautiful, even and straight in grain and uniform in mix of crystals. It is more durable than other granites because it contains less deleterious ingredients, such as lime, iron and water. Mechanical tests prove its superior strength. Winnsboro Granite monuments erected over half a century ago are as good today as when first erected. The sharp contrast between polished and hammered surfaces insures clear legibility of all inscriptions cut thereon.

You may be sure of obtaining genuine Winnsboro Granite if you insist on receiving from your dealer a quarry certificate signed by the management of Winnsboro Granite Corporation, sole quarriers of Winnsboro Granite, and you may also test the monument by throwing water upon it. If there are then apparent any black or white streaks, black or white splotches of size, or if there is any wave in the grain (wide variation in the crystaline mixture) some mistake has been made and the monument is not genuine Winnsboro Granite. Only perfect stone, carefully inspected and triple tested, is shipped as Winnsboro Granite.



The water test made three times at the plant before shipment assures that only first grade stone is shipped on orders for Winnsboro Granite; and such stone is certified as Winnsboro Granite. Errors, however, might occur unintentionally, and all dealers should make the test above suggested before cutting a piece of stone. Buyers can be assured by the same test.

Winnsboro Granite is selected flawless, remarkably even and straight in grain.

Jack, and Jean nodded. But just as they made ready to duck past, two great hands shot out and grabbed them by the shoulders.

"Not so fast; not so fast," said the deep, gruff voice, and then Farmer Ladd burst into a loud, hearty laugh.

The two children did not know what to make of it. When people were cross they didn't usually laugh, but then there were all the dreadful stories they had heard.

"Come on over and let's have a look at the cherry tree," said the farmer, and taking both the children by the hand, he led them through the gate and across the field to the tree.

"Those are mighty fine cherries," he said. "How would you like fill up your basket with them?"

Jack and Jean could hardly believe their ears.

"Really and truly," asked Jean.

"Really and truly," laughed the farmer.

In a minute Jack was in the tree, picking cherries and then throwing them down, and Farmer Ladd was helping Jean to fill the basket.

After the basket was as full as it would hold, Mr. Ladd asked the children if they wouldn't like to see his new little calves and his baby chicks and ducklings. The first thing Jack and Jean knew they were chatting away with him as if they had known him all their lives. They had a wonderful half hour looking at the barnyard pets, and when they were ready to go, Jack said, "We always thought you were cross and didn't like children."

"But it wasn't true a bit, was it?" said Jean.

"No, it wasn't true a bit," said the farmer, "but I never had a chance to tell you so before. The next time you come by my place I hope you won't run like a streak of lightning."

"Indeed, we won't ever again," promised the two children as they said good-by. And they did never did. Instead, they went very often to see Farmer Ladd and he came in time to be their very best friend.—The Southern Christian Advocate.

The Broken Horn.

A goat once became bored with its flock and wandered off over the hills in search of nice green clover. The boy who kept the goats called and called to it to return, but in vain.

"Why should I go back," said the goat. "I am sure there is much better grass and clover on the other side of that hill. I shall just go over there and see if I am not right."

Now, the boy knew he would be scolded if he let one of the goats wander off, so he came running after the goat, ordering him back to his flock. The willful goat would not obey him, but trotted happily on over the hill.

Finally the boy became angry and grabbing up a stone he threw it at the goat. It hit the goat on the head, breaking one of his horn.

Then the boy was very frightened. "Oh, please do not tell the Master," he begged the goat.

"No," said the goat, "I shall not need to tell the master. The broken horn will speak for itself."

IN MEMORIAM.

Frank R. Edmondson.

The "One Clear Call" came in the early morning of Sunday, the 12th of January, 1930, and FRANK R. EDMONDSON entered suddenly into the Life Eternal.

As a Churchman and citizen he occupied a prominent place in this community, holding many positions of honor and trust; maintaining under all circumstances a character untarnished and a reputation above reproach. By his delightful personality he drew unto himself a host of devoted friends To many people throughout Virginia, both prominent and humble, the pasisng of Frank Edmondson brings deep sorrow.

Funeral services were conducted at the home, Monday afternoon, January 13th, by Rev. T. Carter Page, rector of Trinity Episcopal Church, and Rev. Myron Marshall, rector of St. John's Church, and burial was made in the Cemetery of St. John's, Halifax, Virginia.

Mr. Edmondson is survived by his wife, Mrs. Sallie Green Edmondson, and the following children, Henry Archer, Frank R., Jr., Robert Hurt, Elizabeth and Sarah Edmondson.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mrs. Thomas F. Rives.

Whereas it has pleased Almighty God in His infinite wisdom to cal lfrom our midst our beloved friend and co-worker, MRS. THOMAS F. RIVES, the first President of the Woman's Auxiliary of Good Shepherd Church, McKenney, Va., be it

Resolved by the members of this organization that we miss her wise counsel and earnest efforts in the work of the Woman's Auxiliary, the Church and Sunday School, that we have lost a sincere friend, one who was endeared to us by years of faithful service and esteemed for her loyalty to the cause of Christ and her Church.

Resolved second, we emulate her example in faithfulness and piety and humbly accept the chastening rod, knowing that all things work together for good to them who love the Lord.

Resolved third, we tender our love and sympathy to the bereaved family with assurance of comfort in our blessed Master, that a copy be sent to the family, published in the Southern Churchman and Diocesan Record.

RESOLUTIONS

on the death of Bishop Tucker, adopted by the Vestry of St. Paul's P. E. Church, Suffolk, Virginia, on February 19, 1930.

The Right Reverend Beverly Dandridge Tucker, late beloved Bishop of the Southern Diocese of Virginia of the Protestant Episcopal Church, has been called to his eternal home, there to receive his great reward, after a long life of most devoted, useful and helpful service, to and love for, his God, His Church, his family, his fellow man and his country.

He loved his people and taught them to 'love one another, for love is the fulfilling of the law".

He was endowed by God with the highest virtues possible to man, which in his thoroughly consecrated life he used in ministering to the souls of men, thu inspiring, encouraging and strengthening many in their faith in God and His Son esus Christ.

While he occupied a high place in the Church, yet his life and example of humility and his simple faith inspired and uplifted all with whom he came in contact, blessing them and comforting them in the faith. He will be greatly missed.

He was the father of thirteen children, who are using the powers and gifts inherited from their father in the highest service to mankind, and while our sincere sympathy goes out to them in their great personal loss of the human touch of their noble father, yet we rejoice with them in their blessed inheritance.

His great influence will live for generations to come in leading men to the higher life and to their eternal salvation.

Now, therefore, be it resolved, that a copy of these sincere expressions be sent to his family, a copy be entered upon the record of the Vesctry of this Church, a copy be published in the Southern Churchman, a copy in the Diocesan Record, a copy in the Suffolk News-Herald and a copy in the Norfolk Virginian-Pilot.

Faithfully and sincerely,

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

11 A. M., with penitential office and address at 5:15, and evening prayer and address at 8:15. The rector, the Rev. Henry Darlington, will officiate at all of these services, assisted by the Rev. Herbert J. Glover, Vicar. Beginning on Thursday of this week, there will be an afternoon service every day except Saturday, at 5:15.

Five guest clergy have been invited to give the addresses for these afternoon services for five respective weeks during Lent. Schedule for 5:15 services will be as follows:

March 6 and 7, the Rev. Dr. Henry Darlington, Rector.

March 10-14, the Rev. Wallace J. Gardiner, Saint Paul's Church, Flatbush, N. Y.

March 17-21, the Rev. Shirley Hughson, O. H. C., West Park, N. Y.

March 24-28, the Rev. Stanley S. Kilbourne, Saint Peter's Church, Port Chester, N. Y.

March 31-April 4, the Rev. James Moffat, D. D., Union Theological Seminary.

April 7-11, the Rev. Bernard Iddings Bell, D. D., St. Stephen's College, Annandale-on-Hudson, N. Y.

April 14-17, Holy Week, Rector.

An interesting feature of the Lenten services will be the children's service each Friday afternoon at 4:15 P. M., conducted by Dr. Darlington. Special cards have been issued to the children of the Church School for this service, bearing the dates for the seven Fridays of Lent. A cross will be punched in the child's card for every date of his attendance.

On Wednesday evening at 8:15 throughout Lent, there will be special addresses by the rector or the vicar, the Rev. Herbert J. Glover.

Captain Mountford to Conduct Lent Mission.

A Lent Mission will be conducted during the first full week in Lent, March 9 to 14, inclusive, at St. James' Church, New York City. The leader of the Mission will be Captain B. F. Mountford, head of the Church Army in the United States, which is a branch of the English Church Army, and consists of lay evangelists devoted to furthering the work of the Church.

Captain Mountford, who has been described by Bishop James deW. Perry of Rhode Island as "one of the great modern evangelists," will be the preacher at the morning and afternoon services on the opening Sunday of the Mission (March 9), and will hold daily morning and afternoon services during the week. "One great purpose of the Mission," said the Rev. Dr. Frank W. Crowder, rector of St. James, "is to kindle in the members of the Church a deeper loyalty to the living Christ, so that they may hold up before men His life and personality with fresh power and beauty."

Impressive Service at Church of the Advent, Spartanburg, S. C.

On Sunday evening, January 26, with a congregation that filled the church almost to capacity, the Feast of Lights or Epiphany Service was held in the Church of the Advent, Spartanburg, S. C.

The choir rendered a beautiful musical service, features of which were Gounod's "Send Out Thy Light," and Whitney Coombs' "Brightest and Best." The dramatic features followed.

The darkened church the rector, the Rev. W. H. K. Pendleton, spoke "The Voice of Prophecy." As the Prophets of old were quoted, each one in his turn, appropriate costumed, entered the front door and passed slowly down the aisle to stand before the chancel. Each figure was followed in his progress through the darkened church by a spot light, which emphasized the costume without dispelling the air of mystery. "The Voice of Prophecy," growing clearer as the centuries roll, suggests the conviction as voiced by the speaker that the time of fulfilment is at hand. In answer to the suggestion, "What the signs of promise are?" the hymn, "Watchman, Tell Us of the Night," is sung in the darkness. "The question," from the soprano in the choir, "the answer," from the bass in the gallery over the front door.

When the drama suggests that the promised time has arrived, the Three Wise Men enter the front door and pass down the long aisle to the altar, singing, "We Three Kings of Orient Are." Magnificently costumed, they, too, are followed by the circle of light.

As each of the Magi offers his gift, he kneels on the chancel before the altar, singing the appropriate verse. With prayer and an address to the Magi and the congregation, the rector gives them light from the tall tapers upon the altar, which alone relieve the darkness in the building. The wise men have come from far, to kneel before the King and offer their gifts. Through His minister, He who is the Light of the World, gives them light from the altar of God, and with it the commission to let it shine and to impart it to him that is without it anywhere.

The twinkling of hundreds of little tapers (previously distributed) in the darkened church as the light spreads from hand to hand is the symbolic answer which tells its own story in a silence that can be felt. Down the long aisle of the church, now ablaze with a multitude of little candles, choir and pastor, the Wise Men and their attendants, march out into the night, and are followed by the congregation, each one bearing still his little taper, into the darkness of the world without the church.

This service effectively tells the story of the Light of the World, and imparts sacred truth in dramatic setting.

CALIFORNIA.

Rt., Rev. E. L. Parsons, D. D., Bishop.

Resolution.

The following resolution was adopted by the Eightieth Convention of the Diocese of California, which met in San Francisco, February 5, 1930:

Resolved: That, the Eightieth Convention of the Diocese of California record its profound sorrow at the deaths of the Rt. Rev. John Gardner Murray, Doctor in Divinity, and the Rt. Rev. Charles Palmeston Anderson, Doctor in Divinity, Presiding Bishops of the Church.

The Convention hereby requests Secretary to send copies of this resolution to the members of the bereaved households, to the Presidents of the Standing Committees of the Dioceses of Maryland and Chicago, and to the Church press.

We are deeply grateful to Almighty God for the devoted and distinguished Witness borne by these Chief Pastors of the Church.

"Eternal rest grant them, O Lord, and let light perpetual shine upon them."

Attest:

Bratton D. Weigle,
Secretary of Convention.

WEST MISSOURI.

Rt. Rev. S C. Partridge, D. D., Bishop.

Visit of Bishop Rowe.

What are said to be the largest congregations that ever assembled in any of our churches in Kansas City, greeted Bishop Rowe, of Alaska, and his native deacon, the Rev. Paul Mather, on the Sunday included in a five day visit of the Bishop to the Diocese of West Missouri. The Bishop and Mr. Mather spoke in Christ Church, St. Joseph on Thursday evening, February 13, and were guests at a reception following the service. The Sunday morning service in Kansas City was held in St. George's Church, the Rev. Charles R. Tyner, rector. A great mass meeting, which overflowed the capacity of Grace and Holy Trinity Church, the largest in the city, was held on Sunday evening, with all local parishes participating. The service was in charge of the Rev. Robert Nelson Spencer, rector, who was assisted by the Rev. Oliver F. Crawford and the Rev. Edwin W. Merrill.

Bishop Rowe was guest of honor and speaker at a dinner of the Canadian Club in Kansas City on Friday evening, February 14.

The Rev. Mr. Mather visited also Springfield, Mo., and spoke in St. John's and Christ Churches. Both missionaries were guest speakers at a meeting of St. Philip's Men's Club in Joplin on Monday, February 17.

Unusual interest and attention were manifested on every occasion of the Bishop's and Mr. Mather's presentation of their message.

Personal Notes

The Rev. C. C. Silvester, rector of All Hallow's, Wyncote, Pennsylvania, since 1919, at the end of the present month resigns his rectorship to become rector of St. Michael's Church, Brattleboro, Vermont.

The Rev. G. Herbert Dennison, who has been serving as locum tenens at St. Timothy's, Foxborough, Pennsylvania, has accepted the unanimous call to the rectorship of that parish, succeeding to the vacancy caused by the resignation of the Rev. S. A. Caine, who accepted a call recently from the Diocese of Massachusetts.

The Rev. Gardiner M. Day, Williamstown, Massachusetts, has been invited to occupy the pulpit of St. Paul's, Overbrook, Pennsylvania, during the absence of the rector, the Rev. Joseph Fort Newton. Dr. Newton leaves about May 1 for England, where he is to preach the "Colonial Missionary Sermon" at the City Temple in London on May 14, and to fill a number of other speaking engagements. Dr. Day is an assistant at St. John's, Williamstown, and was formerly on the clergy staff of Trinity, Boston.

ORDINATIONS.

The Rev. Charles J. Alleyn, for many years lay-reader and treasurer of Grace Church, Sheffield, Alabama, was ordained deacon in that Church on Septuagesima Sunday by Bishop McDowell. The candidate was presented by Ven. V. G. Lowery; the Rev. Lucien Malone, of Florence, Alabama, read the Litany. The sermon was preached by the rector of the parish, the Rev. W. F. Moses. Mr. Alleyn expects for the present to continue his business relationships, while assisting in the missionary work of the parish.

DEATHS.

The Rev. Joseph Sherlock, rector of the Church of St. John Chrysostom, Philadelphia, died on Tuesday, February 25, 1930. The burial service was held in the Church of St. James the Less, on Friday, February 28, at 10 A. M.

Dr. Sherlock was born in Philadelphia sixty-nine years ago. He is survived by a brother, Frank Sherlock, and a sister, Mrs. Edward Wenerd.

EXTRACT FROM THE PICTORIAL FIELD BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION

By BENJAMIN J. LOSSING

Congress assembled at an early hour, and the grave orators of that august body could hardly repress huzzas while Secretary Thompson read the letter from Washington announcing the capitulation of Cornwallis. On motion of Edmund Randolph, Congress resolved to go in procession at two o'clock the same day to the Dutch Lutheran Church, "and return thanks to Almighty God for crowning the allied armies of the United States and France with success." A committee was appointed,[3] to whom were referred the letters of Washington, and who were instructed to report resolutions of thanks to the armies and their officers, and to recommend appropriate honors.[4] The Committee reported on the twenty-ninth, and Congress resolved that their thanks should be presented to Washington, Rochambeau, and DeGrasse, and the officers and soldiers under their respective commands; that a marble column should be erected at Yorktown in commemoration of the event;[5] that two stands of colors from Cornwallis should be presented to Washington in the name of the United States; that two pieces of the field ordnance captured at York should be presented to each of the French commanders, Rochambeau and DeGrasse; and that the Board of War should present to Lieutenant-Colonel Tilghman, in the name of the United States, a horse properly caparisoned, and an elegant sword. Congress also issued a proclaamtion appointing the thirteenth day of December for a general thanksgiving and prayer throughout the confederacy, on account of this signal mark of Divine favor. Legislative bodies, executive councils, city corporations, and many private societies presented congratulatory addresses to the commanding generals and their officers and from almost every pulpit in the land arose the voice of thanksgiving and praise, accompanied the alleluiahs of thousands of worshippers at the altar of the Lord of Hosts.

[1]Octo. 24.

[3]The Committee consisted of Edmund Randolph, Elias Boudinot, Joseph Varnum, and Charles Carroll.

[4]Journals of Congress, vii., 162.

[5]The marble for this column, like many other monuments ordered by the Continental Congress, is yet in the quarry. It was proposed to have it "ornamented with emblems of the alliance between the United States and his most Christian majesty, and inscribed with a succinct narrative of the surrender of Earl Cornwallis," to Washington, Rochambeau, and DeGrasse.—Journals, vii., 166.

THE FAST WHICH GOD ACCEPTETH

Cry aloud, spare not, lift up thy voice like a trumpet, and shew my people their transgression, and the house of Jacob their sins.

Yet they seek me daily, and delight to know my ways, as a nation that did righteousness, and forsook not the ordinance of their God: they ask of me the ordinances of justice; they take delight in approaching to God.

Wherefore have we fasted, say they, and thou seest not? Wherefore have we afflicted our soul, and thou takest no knowledge? Behold, in the day of your fast ye find pleasure, and exact all your labours.

Behold, ye fast for strife and debate, and to smite with the fist of wickedness: ye shall not fast as ye do this day, to make your voice to be heard on high.

Is it such a fast that I have chosen? a day for a man to afflict his soul? Is it to bow down his head as a bulrush, and to spread sackcloth and ashes under him? Wilt thou call this a fast, and an acceptable day to the Lord?

Is not this the fast that I have chosen? to loose the bands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens, and to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke?

Is it not to deal thy bread to the hungry, and that thou bring the poor that are cast out to thy house? when thou seest the naked, that thou cover him: and that thou hide not thyself from thine own flesh?

Then shall thy light break forth as the morning, and thine health shall spring forth speedily: and thy righteousness shall go before thee; the glory of the Lord shall be thy rearward.

Then shalt thou call, and the Lord shall answer; thou shalt cry, and he shall say, Here I am. If thou take away from the midst of thee the yoke, the putting forth of the finger, and speaking vanity;

And if thou draw out thy soul to the hungry, and satisfy the afflicted soul; then shall thy light rise in obscurity, and thy darkness be as the noonday.

And the Lord shall guide thee continually, and satisfy thy soul in drought, and make fat thy bones: and thou shalt be like a watered garden, and like a spring of water, whose waters fail not.

And they that shall be of thee shall build the old waste places: thou shalt raise up the foundations of many generations; and thou shalt be called, The repairer of the breach, The restorer of paths to dwell in.

If thou turn away thy foot from the sabbath, from doing thy pleasure on my holy day; and call the sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, honourable; and shalt honour him, not doing thine own ways, nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own words:

Then shalt thou delight thyself in the Lord; and I will cause thee to ride upon the high places of the earth, and feed thee with the heritage of Jacob thy father: for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it.

Blackboards, Pictures Maps and Charts.

The blackboard has long been recognized as one of the most important pieces of Sabbath school and church equipment. Thomas F. Delf, a British Sabbath school worker, says in his "Practical Blackboard Work" (The Sunday-School Union, 57 and 59 Ludgate Hill, London E. C., England): "There should be no need to emphasize the necessity of each school being provided with a good blackboard and easel.

The use of the blackboard is of course not limited to diagrams and sketches illustrating the lesson. It is frequently used for announcements, memory verses, acrostics that sum up the lesson teaching, and for designs symbolic of the seasons. Adult Bible class teachers employ the board constantly for Bible outlines.

Maps, pictures and charts also form an important part of modern church and Sabbath school equipment. Bible lessons can be made more realistic when photographs or drawings are used that show the dress, customs, street scenes, and houses of Palestine. Charts giving the names of the Bible books or the names of the kings and prophets of Israel are valuable aids to memory.

Superintendents and pastors who desire to increase the efficiency of their schools and churches may obtain valuable information by writing to Church Equipment Service, The Southern Churchman, Richmond, Va.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

"Make us independent of all praise but Thine."

Certainly, it is heaven upon earth, to have a man's mind move in charity, rest in providence, and turn upon the poles of truth.

Happiness is not the end of duty; it is a constituent of it.

Jesus is not visibly with us today. But every one to whom we can minister, every one who needs our help, stands before us as Christ's representative, and if we give that help from love to Christ, the Master accepts it as though it was done directly to Him. This is the very essence of religion, ministering to men with the love of God impelling us to it.

There is no reason to believe that God cannot grant favorable answers to the crudest petitionary prayers; our experience alone can determine whether He thus acts as we seek His aid.

On the whole, there is no possession as valuable as good habits, for this means not only is the mind pledged and consecrated to good, but the muscles are supple, and even the bones are bent to what is good.—James Stalker.

Science tells us of facts, but it cannot tell us the meaning of facts; it deals with processes only, while the significance of life comes not from modes of development, but from origins and destinies.—Rev. S. M. Shoemaker, Jr.

There cannot be a conflict between science and Christianity. There could be a conflict between the theology of Christianity and the philosophy of science, but the realities themselves could not be in conflict. When the full idea of Christianity is set forth we shall see that it embraces science.—Selected.

My praise can only breathe itself in prayer;
My prayer can only lose itself in Thee.
Dwell Thou forever in my heart and there,
Lord, let me sup with Thee, and Thou with me.

—Selected.

The reason why the army of the Lord has not more impressive victories over the world of destructive forces is because there are too many spiritual slackers in the camp.—Rev. William Porkess, D. D.

EDITORIALS

Vol. 95. RICHMOND, VA., MARCH 15, 1930. No. 11.

ALFRED BROCKENBROUGH WILLIAMS

As one editorial written and already in the hands of the printer, his weekly letter of kindly advice lying topmost of the papers on the desk, word comes that he, who has been the genius of this column for the last three years, Alfred Brockenbrough Williams, has passed on to his great reward.

Words cannot express the sense of our own loss, and our deepest sympathy goes out to his bereaved family.

"Verily a great man is fallen this day in Israel."

He died in harness from a sudden heart attack at his home in Washington, D. C., about eleven o'clock Tuesday morning, March 11, but the end was not unexpected by him. Even while he labored daily, standing stalwart for the right, vigorously opposing wrong, he was ever listening for his call to come up higher. And with each recurring anniversary he expressed surprise that he was yet spared. Alfred Williams was an optimist to the end.

Colonel Williams was twice married. His first wife was Miss Mamie Young Bryce, of Columbia, S. C., and of this marriage a son and a daughter survive. The daughter, who was Miss Margaret Dandridge Williams, is the wife of Colonel Percy G. Brown, a well-known physician of Toronto, Canada. The only son of Colonel Williams is Alfred B. Williams, Jr., of Washington. In 1925 Colonel Williams married, as his second wife, Mrs. Josephine G. Tighe, who survives him. A sister, Mrs. William C. Page, of Baltimore, also survives.

Alfred B. Williams had a vigorous life of varied experiences. The son of Major Robert Alfred Williams and Elizabeth Marshall (Colston) Williams, he was born in Hanover County, Virginia, on January 10, 1856. He attended private schools until the age of fourteen.

He has been a newspaper man since 1876, in which year he accompanied General Wade Hampton in his famous campaign through South Carolina. He went to Liberia with a sailing ship full of Negro emigrants in 1878, as correspondent for the Charleston, S. C., News and Courier, exposed the horrors of mismanagement and inefficiency, and broke up the Liberian enterprise of exporting Negroes for benefit of Northern exploiters. For the same paper, disguised as a tramp, he wrote up the convict camp iniquities in 1879, and did much to destroy the leasing system in South Carolina. Colonel Williams successively was editor of the Greenville (S. C.) News, worked for the New York Advertiser and New York Times, editor of the Richmond News, editor-in-chief of the News Leader, Richmond; editor-in-chief and part owner of the Morning Times and Evening World News, Roanoke, Virginia, president of the Times Publishing Company, owner and editor of the Richmond Evening Journal; chief editorial writer of the Roanoke World News. He has been associate editor of The Southern Churchman since 1927.

Colonel Williams was a member of the William and Mary College Chapter of Phi Beta Kappa, and was a former president of the Virginia Society, Sons of the American Revolution. He was also a Mason, and a member of the Knights of Pythias.

Such are the events of a full life, but in this life outstanding above all is a character and personality rarely met with, "broad and wide as the casing air," with high erected thought seated in a heart of courtesy.

With an unfailing sense of humor, a sense of honor impregnable, and the beautiful courtesy of the traditional Southern gentleman, he was beloved by a host of friends. And towering over every vicissitude Alfred B. Williams maintained a powerful and dauntless courage combined with a simple, childlike faith in a loving Father and redeeming Saviour.

MACHINERY

Devices and discoveries to multiply with machinery results of labor bring vast good. Organization of human beings into machinery in which each individual has definite work, in cooperation with others, is a necessary development of modern life and makes results which without it would be impossible. Attempts to regard and treat men and women as mere machines inevitably and invariably cause disaster and degradation. Some of our institutions of "higher learning"—especially those most bountifully endowed and widely advertised—systematically persist in such attempts. They should be called institutions of darkest ignorance. Their ideals are those of the lowest savages. They close purblind eyes to facts familiar to young children. They undertake to ignore and eliminate the spiritual life. Compelled by indisputable evidence to recognize the existence of appetites and passions, they laboriously teach that beyond these there can be nothing more of us except the physical machine and what they call the intellect. Their effort is to abolish the soul, like Frankenstein of Mrs. Shelley's weird story, to send forth dismal monsters incapable of comprehension of the immaterial, destitute of all that elevates, ennobles and beautifies humanity, proves its kinship to Divinity and establishes its superiority to animals. Their perfected products are cold, dry, cynical, considering morality as something to be respected only as prudence and convenience require, deriding virtue as born of fear or superstition or tradition, sneering at religious faith; lacking the instincts of loyalty and affection given some beasts, scorning such things as patriotism, courage, self-sacrifice, love of parents and children, husbands and wives, friends for friends.

We must concede that such institutions are somewhat in the fashion. We are in an age of machinery. More and more, contrivances of steel and iron, wood, wire, rubber, driven by steam, electricity, water power, do the tasks formerly done by human hands or strength, enable us to do what hands and strength could not do. Organizations become larger and more far reaching and the people composing them have less independence and individuality, each person doing one routine part, small or large, in conjunction with many others, toward general purpose of production. This is unavoidable and enlarges human capacity to meet the demands of increasing population and the needs of advancing civilization and prosperity. If we depended now on the spinning wheel, loom and shuttle and flails of a couple of centuries ago all but the richest would lack clothing and food. With the stoves and open fires of seventy-five years ago city life, as lived now, would be impossible. Our reliance on the machinery we make and the men and women organized into machinery is ever more constant and compelling. Therein are blessing and benefit and frightful danger and threat of tragedy.

Churches and religious and benevolent organizations follow the trend because to be efficient they must. Without the ordered machinery they would be ineffective and helpless, especially in the cities. Too often they drift into the machinery habit. To do their work smoothly, rapidly and cheaply they forget the souls, surrender spirituality to efficiency. In Y. M. C. A. and Salvation Army offices and in large and busy parishes people seeking consolation in bitterest sorrow, pitifully appealing for counsel and help, are regarded and treated by busy, crisp, businesslike persons at desks, as just so many units, or cases, to figure in the statistical records of the year and be disposed of quickly after filling in printed forms or answering regular sets of questions. No sign of personal interest or sympathy or human feeling responds to their pathetic, frequently unuttered, appeals for some comforting token that somebody is sorry for them. In several cities the decrease in contributions to the chest funds was attributed to the hard, callous methods of the dispensers of charities.

Bores and whining imposters, of course, are many and everywhere and tempt the kindliest to habitual suspicion; but the spirit of Christianity is that it is far better to submit to the boredom of fifty bores, nerve trying as it is, and to be patient with fifty imposters, than to offend one of these little ones, one really miserable and humiliated applicant for some scrap of tribute to fading self-respect, a few gentle, helpful words. Even clergymen, much vaunted for efficiency and ability, become victims of the machinery complex. Not long ago three of them, on a committee to investigate the plea of a man trying faithfully to do a good work, against many difficulties, submitted to a bishop a report brief, cold, terse, as the judgment of a military court martial.

A student of Chicago University, which specializes in the machinery and no soul idea, caused some stir the other day by publishing in his class paper some thoughts on the frequency of suicides of college and university graduates. His theory is that a young man or woman thoroughly taught that life is but a thing of meat and raiment, with nothing beyond or above and the human being just a machine without responsibility, hope or purpose except the few years of varying fortunes here, naturally decided that it was not worth the trouble. The conclusion seems true.

Correction of the tendency toward regarding human beings as machines and nothing more begins, not in Chicago University nor among the professors, but, as often happens with evils, exactly where it began and is strongest. Practical, keen business men in New York City have come to realize that the soul is part of the human equipment, that from it our sentiment and feeling come and that it must be realized and respected for practical business reasons. The leading retail merchants have installed forces of especially trained telephone operators, instructed to avoid set forms or words and the cold, mechanical answers to calls. They are to be cordial, kindly, so far as may be possible personal, with the most obscure customers, giving the smallest orders or making the most trivial complaints or

WHY LOOK FOR CHRIST'S RETURN

By William H. Richie

THERE is only one book in this world which is written in three tenses, the past, the present and the future—it is the Bible. This book, or rather a collection of books compiled through fifteen hundred years or more, is distinctly unique in the fact that it gives a record of past history, of present conditions and a revelation of things to come. No other book tells us of the past, the present and the future of man on this earth, or of the race of the Jews, or of the Gentile nations of the world. No other book contains original records of the past, the present or the future of Jesus Christ, or of man's adversary, Satan. The Bible is not only unique in its revelation of the mind of God and His great plan for accomplishing the redemption of the human race, but actually foretells how that redemption will ultimately be accomplished, so that the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea. No other writing, sacred or profane, undertakes to forecast the future with accuracy in detail as does the Hebrew Christian Bible.

It is interesting and important to notice that as recorded in the Bible at three different times God has given special revelations as to what should come to pass to three distinct groups of people: First, the children of Israel; second, the Gentile nations or world powers in their relation to the ultimate Kingdom of God; and third, the Church of Jesus Christ.

Before the Israelites became a nation with kings or princes of their own, God gave to His great lawgiver, Moses, a prophetic foreview of what would happen to them as a people. We read in Deuteronomy in those remarkable chapters, the twenty-eighth and thirtieth, that because of disobedience "a nation of fierce countenance", "from afar, from the end of the earth", shall come and destroy Israel and scatter its people "from one end of the earth to the other", where they shall be down-trodden and persecuted. Finally after many years they shall be gathered again "from all nations", unto the land of their fathers, and will again be blessed. History has been and is running in the groove of this prophecy. Rome, we know, scattered the Jews, and the Gentiles have persecuted them in all places; but now we see them returning from the four corners of the earth. Today there are 149,000 Jews in Palestine, a Jewish State is organized under British Mandate, and a new national consciousness has come into Israel. After centuries of desolation, the prophecy of Joel has been fulfilled, the rainfall has actually increased the past twenty years, and we see fertility taking the place of desolation. Swamps are eliminated, malaria has ceased, health has been restored, Hebrew colonies are cultivating the lands, and orchards and grain fields are productive. The recent discovery of unlimited wealth in the chemical resources of the Dead Sea and its actual development at this time assures the Jewish State of Palestine a commercial pre-eminence in the years to come. Indeed Jerusalem, at the cross roads of the continents, will make an appropriate capital for a world kingdom. This, God has said He intends to do; and we see His plans working out before our eyes.

Now may we recall that after the Jews had been brought to judgment and their land under the power of Babylon, the period in Bible history known as "the times of the Gentiles" had begun, and to Nebuchadnezzar and through the Prophet Daniel, God gave another revelation concerning the nations of the world. Through a literal interpretation of the king's dream it was revealed that the great image represented a succession of world empires—after Babylon, symbolized, we are told, by "the head of gold" in Nebuchadnezzar, another kingdom not so strong should rule the earth; this was the empire of Greece. Then should come Rome, symbolized by the iron legs, a divided kingdom; from which there should come ten kingdoms "of clay and iron" with a mixture of autocratic and democratic government. This has actually been the course of Gentile history. And now we have recently witnessed through the most remarkable leadership of Mussolini of Italy, peace made with the Vatican, treaties ratified with all the nations around the Mediterranean, and behold, the Holy Roman Empire is taking shape again. But ere long heaven's King, "the stone cut out of the mountain without hands" (Dan. 2:44) will break the Gentile image, and the Kingdom of heaven will be set up with the King of kings upon the throne, over a universal empire "wherein dwelleth righteousness and peace".

Again let us note that at the close of the first century A. D., when the Christian Church was a well-established organization, God gave to John, the last remaining of the twelve apostles, a special revelation "of things to come" as related to the Church of Jesus Christ. In the Book of Revelations, chapters 2 and 3, we find discerning and revealing messages to the seven churches, which are at the same time prophetic of seven stages of the Church's history; which we can now see have been literally fulfilled. First, the existing state of the Church at John's writing. Second, a period of persecution, then of contented settling down in the world, resulting from Constantine's pseudo-conversion. Third, comes worldliness and pagan ceremonies; then the Protestant Reformation followed by a Philadelphian period wherein the Word is kept in faithfulness. And now in recent years we have been witnessing the Laodicean period; the bulk of the professing Church is "rich, increased with goods", satisfied and lukewarm in its zeal, but now about to be chastened. Individuals, however, who "open the door" of the heart to the Lord Jesus are granted true fellowship and a testimony for Him.

The next great event in God's plan for the final redemption of the world and its blessing through Christ is the elimination of the Church from the earth or the Rapture, as it is called, of the Saints. In his Olivet discourse our Lord said that when He returned there would be a sifting, and elimination—"two men shall be working in the field" in the morning, somewhere, "one shall be taken and the other left"; "two women", at afternoon work, "grinding at the mill, one shall be taken and the other left"; or "two shall be in a bed", as elsewhere it'll be night, when the Lord shall come for His own, and those trusting in Him, the born-again ones, whose true "citizenship is in heaven", shall "be changed in a moment"—one shall be taken and the other unconverted one shall be left. The first phase of Christ's return in His coming for His saints "in the air." (See 1 Thess. 4:13-18.) Then when the Holy Spirit's testimony through His anointed believers is removed from the earth there shall follow a time of unprecedented trouble and distress and wickedness such as the world has never yet seen. Then shall come to Israel "the time of Jacob's trouble", and a series of Divine judgments as suggested by the imagery of John's revelation, shall purge the earth and prepare it for the second phase of Christ's return and His coming with His saints to judge the nations and deliver Israel. Seeing Him whom they "pierced", as His feet again rest upon Olivet, they shall come to sudden and nation-wide repentance, as He delivers Israel from their enemies.

After this brief review of three outstanding Bible prophecies which any fair historian will admit have had and are having remarkably accurate fulfillment, we are ready to ask the question of our theme—"Why look for Christ's return?" We answer, because it is absolutely necessary to complete the full redemption of this world and to bring righteousness, peace and order out of present evil and chaos. No man-made philosophy of hope has yet produced any evidence of real success. Recent writers on both sides of the Atlantic have pointed out the reality and increasing relentlessness of evil in the world; "like a hideous octopus fastening its tentacles upon every individual, every society, every relationship of life", says a bishop of England. What is our answer to the facts of sin, pain, disease and death? Why so little progress through the past nineteen hundred years by man's efforts, if we are working according to God's plans?

My eight-year-old, very recently pestered by the summer insects, asked, "Daddy, why did Jesus make mosquitoes"? Yes; why does God tolerate so many things, which He does not approve? As Christabel Pankhurst in her recent book, "Seeing the Future", wisely says, "For evil to go drifting and dragging on indefinitely would not and could not be consistent with God's goodness, and the very idea would of course be a denial that the Kingdom of God is ever coming upon the earth". "What puzzles folks is why, if Christ was, on the cross, victorious over evil, this conquered enemy still wanders to and fro in the earth. Yet the reason is simplicity itself, if the churches would only give it. The conquered foe is already judged, though still at large, sentence not being yet carried out; he is conquered and the Victor, when He returns, will fully make good His victory."

Many questions may be asked concerning what place can the volcano or hurricane, or floods, or famine, or typhus, or cancer or the blights of vegetation, or even such pests as mosquitoes, have in a benevolent world where God is good. The answer from the Bible is that since man's fall, the world has been under a curse, all vegetation with "thorns and thistles", while, in the moral realm, Satan, "the prince of this world", as Jesus called him, is in open rebellion against the will and authority of God. To thwart and hinder God's purposes, Satan bids for the cooperation of man's free will to thus oppose obedience to the holy will of God. We should distinguish between God's directive will and His permissive will. The heavenly Father is omnipotent, but the time for the manifestation of His power and His judgment of the nations and subduing the forces of nature has not yet come. As Paul says in Rom. 8:22-23, "the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now, waiting" for complete redemption as do our bodies.

Why look for Christ's return? Because He needs must finish His work, which was not fully accomplished at His first advent. He became Saviour of the world, but He has not yet been acknowledged as King.

The prophets of the Old Testament foretold that the Messiah would rule at Jerusalem and a glorious age of righteousness and peace would last for a thousand years. We all hope for this. I used to think that this kingdom expectation was now being fulfilled by the present activity of the Church, as it was promoting the spiritual Kingdom of heaven. I had supposed that, as Christ was ruling in men's hearts when they yielded to Him, the millennium would ultimately come after the peace of God had entered a sufficient number of the children of men. But then I saw that this was not logical in the light of the Kingdom parables of Christ. He said a conflict would rage between evil and good, till judgment should come upon an unconverted world. In this temporary spiritual Kingdom of heaven period, Jesus carefully explained (Matt. 13) that tares and wheat should grow together, "the children of the Kingdom and children of the wicked one", until the end of the age, then the harvest of separation and judgment would come. Again in the great Kingdom net there would be good fish and bad fish until the day of separation. The world would never be wholly converted, the seed of God's message was to be sown, but only a portion, perhaps a fourth, would find good soil and bear fruit. Even within the Church there would be a mixture of good and evil—that the leaven of subtle corruption which our Lord warned against, would be mixed within and would influence the whole until the end. Leaven throughout Scripture is always symbolic of malice and wickedness—only the unleavened bread was pure and fit for holy uses.

Most significant was our Lord's question after His parable of the unjust judge to encourage patient and persevering prayer: "Nevertheless, when the Son of man cometh will He find faith on the earth?" No, because real faith is decreasing in proportion to population.

THE SURRENDERED LIFE---IN CHRIST

Conducted by Rev. Frank Cox

249 West Forty-third Street, New York, N. Y.

THOMAS CARLYLE said "'To reform a world, to reform a nation, no wise man will undertake, and all but foolish men know, that the only solid, though a far slower reformation, is that which each begins and perfects on himself." The sentiment is incomplete from a Christian point of view, but it is a good John the Baptist call to some who have an inadquate idea of our needs today.

There is no criticism so badly needed today as self-criticism. Our churches are burdened down with people who can tell us all about the faults of the other people, but not enough have ever begun to comprehend their own vital needs. It is surprising how subtly this attitude of blaming it on others can interject itself into the best workers. It comes out in that unwillingness of people to accept things as they are and begin to change them. Most of the criticisms that you hear have implicit in them the thought that the wrong criticised cannot be changed. A man criticises the rector usually with the thought that he cannot be changed, or a parish with the same idea in view.

This is real atheism. If anything is true it is that no person is hopeless. God has power to change the most difficult cases. The trouble is that He waits for a man whom He can use. It is often the case that the man who makes the criticism is the one for whom God waits.

This attitude usually springs from a sense of rankling injustice, with some resentment thrown in for good measure. Sir William Ramsay says "In my own experience there is no calamity so great for a young man as to begin to feel himself unjustly treated, whether his feelings be right or wrong this feeling tends toward permanent deterioration of character and moral power." It is the attitude that insists upon rights rather than duties. It blinds one to his own real faults and to the excellencies of others. It is the negation of the love of Christ. It sometimes results in the persecution complex, and that poisonous injection of self-pity.

In the Cross God took the worst conceivable situation and made it the means of victory. In the shadow of it the disciples were still looking for the best places, but He promised them that they should be converted. The converted man is a center of spiritual power transforming the ones nearest him first. He is in touch with the power that overcomes the world.

The Pharisees of today have again blinded their eyes to the fact that people need to be converted from pride and criticism and resentment as much as from drunkenness and lust. Nor is it safe to call these things little sins and the sins of the flesh big ones. The Elder Brother did not make a more pleasant picture than the Prodigal.

One of the best ways for our unconverted folk to become conscious of the real sinfulness of resentment and pride is to have them begin adjusting some of the strained relationships that have resulted from these sins. As we said in the beginning, real reformation begins with the individual, and a church where the auxiliary is at daggers points or the vestry on the outs cannot have spiritual power.

Some one in the situation has to come to the place where he realizes his need of cleansing, and is willing to humble himself to the place where he will adjust his own relationships with others and then begin in God's strength to make peace by bringing to conviction and repentance others who are putting self where God belongs. We need the faith that knows that love never fails.

BIBLE QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

(Our readers are invited to send in their questions from time to time concerning Scriptural subjects in which they are perplexed or desire light. Our limited space necessitates brevity in questions, as well as in the answers which we will endeavor to maintain in strict accord with the Word of the Lord, which, after all, settles all argument. This column is therefore not for controversy, but for a testimony.)

Question No. 10.—Should a Christian marry an unbeliever?—L. A. B.

Answer.—The Word of God plainly says "No." In 2 Cor. 6:14 we read, "Be not unequally yoked together with unbelievers." It is said that more lives are made unhappy by marriage made contrary to this Scripture admonition than from any other cause.

Question No. 31.—How may I cultivate a love for soul-winning?—An Indifferent Believer.

Answer.—First, by reflecting frequently upon the solemnly serious state of the unsaved and their ultimate destiny as revealed by the Word of God (Rev. 20:15).

Second, acquaint yourself with the attitude of our Saviour toward "the lost" and what He did to save a lost world (John 3:16).

Third, remember that every believer is an Ambassador for Christ (2 Cor. 5:20), and begin by asking those around you if they have ever received so glorious a salvation as referred to in this same chapter.

"They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever" (Daniel 12:3).

FAVORITE SCRIPTURE VERSE.

(In this space each week will appear a favorite passage of Scripture as sent in by a different reader. Every one is, therefore, invited to send us their favorite verse. It is suggested all who can, join with the rest of us in committing to memory the verse which appears here each week, including its location in the Holy Book; and in due time your memory chest will be laden with choice, eternal treasures," indeed. "Thy word have I hid in my heart, that I might not sin against thee." Ps. 119:11.)

This week the following verse was submitted by

Mrs. S. A. Kirchmeyer, of Buffalo, New York:

"All things, whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive" (Matt. 21:22).

"If thou canst believe, all things are possible to him that believeth" (Mark 9:23).

"But when Jesus heard it, he answered him, saying, Fear not: believe only, and she shall be made whole" (Luke 8:50).

Who will send one from the far-away places as well as very near us?

CONFIRMATION PAPERS

Canon F. E. Howitt

No. 1.

Confirmation and Baptism.

1—What is the meaning of the word "Confirmation"?
It has two meanings:
(1) Strengthening or establishing, and
(2) Ratifying.

2—Why is the Rite of Confirmation so called?
Because (1) it is a means by which those who have been baptized are strengthened or established by the grace of the Holy Ghost (Rom. 1:11), and (2) it is the occasion when such persons publicly confirm or ratify the promises made for them at their baptism.

3—Is this ordinance known by any other name?
Yes. "The laying on of hands upon those that are baptized, and come to years of discretion." (See Office for Confirmation.)

4—What is the Scriptural significance of the act of laying hands upon a person's head?
It is a sign or token of blessing.

5—Give examples.
Gen. 48:14-16; St. Mark 10:16.

6—What does the Confirmation Service say is the object of "the laying on of hands"?
It is "to certify the candidates (by this sign) of God's favor and gracious goodness towards them". See Collect after Lord's Prayer.

7—Had the Jews any ceremony similar to Confirmation?
Yes; they brought their children at the age of thirteen to the Temple, or Synagogue, to be examined in their knowledge of the law, and to dedicate them to the service of God.

8—Have we reason to suppose that our Blessed Lord observed this custom?
Yes. See Luke 2:41-46.

9—Have we any sanction for Confirmation in the New Testament?
Yes. (1) St. Peter and St. John laid their hands on the Samaritan converts, who had been baptized by Philip the deacon. Acts 8:14-17.
(2) St. Paul confirmed the Ephesian disciples of John the Baptist, as soon as they were baptized into the Christian Church. Acts 19:1-6.

10—What was the result in both these cases?
Miraculous gifts accompanied the celebration of the rite.

11—Are such gifts now conveyed by the laying on of hands?
No; they were then bestowed for a special purpose, and as soon as that purpose had been served, they appear to have been withdrawn from the Church, but the ordinary gifts of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22-23) are still bestowed in the ordinance of Confirmation when rightly received, and are as much needed now as ever.

12—Show that the cessation of miraculous gifts does not alter the value of Confirmation.
The fact that miraculous gifts are not now conveyed by the laying on of hands no more interferes with the value of the rite than the cessation of miraculous gifts in answer to prayer interferes with the duty of prayer.

13—How does St. Paul speak of "the laying on of hands"?
As one of the first principles or rudiments of the Christian Life. Heb. 6:1-2; Gal. 1:11-12.

14—What other evidence from Scripture may be adduced in support of the rite of Confirmation?
Acts 14:22; 15:41; 18:23; Rom. 1:11; Eph. 1:13, and Titus 3:4-6.

15—Was the rite observed in the Primitive Church?
Yes. "It has been a solemn, ancient and laudable custom in the Church of God, continued from the Apostles' times, that the Bishops should lay their hands upon persons baptized, and instructed in the Catechism of the Christian religion, praying over them, and blessing them, which is called Confirmation." See sixtieth Canon.

16—From the Scripture testimony already adduced, especially Acts 8:14-17; 19:1-6, and Heb. 6:1-2, what may we learn as to the position and practice of Confirmation in the early Church?
(a) That there was an ordinance called Confirmation or "the laying on of hands", following after Holy Baptism, in which some gift of the Holy Ghost was bestowed.
(b) That it was administered to such as had repented and believed. Acts 8:4-6.
(c) That it was intended to confirm, strengthen or establish those who received it in the faith. Acts 14:22; 18:23; Rom. 1:11.
(d) That it was administered by the Apostles and their successors only and not by the lower orders of clergy. Acts 8, compare verses 5, 12 and 14.
(e) That it was administered after prayer by the laying on of hands. Acts 8:15 and 17.

17—Mention some practical uses of Confirmation.
(1) It gives a most valuable opportunity for religious instruction and has often been blessed by God to the conversion of souls. Matt. 18:3.
(2) It is an occasion for setting out afresh in the Christian life, with special prayer, and self-dedication to God.
(3) It affords an opportunity of publicly confessing Christ. It is not enough to believe in Christ. He must also be confessed before men. Rom. 10:10; Matt. 10:32-33; Luke 12:8-9. See also first two addresses in Confirmation Office.
(4) It is an ordinance eminently blessed of God for the communication of His Holy Spirit. Luke 11:9-13.
(5) It is a preparatory step to the Holy Communion. 1 Cor. 11:28, with 2 Cor. 13:5.

Testimonies to the Place and Value of Confirmation.

"It was an ancient custom in the Church for the children of Christians, after they had come to years of discretion, to be presented to the Bishop in order to fulfil that duty which was required of adults who offered themselves for baptism, and to make confession of their faith before the Bishops and all the people. Such laying on of hands, therefore, as it is simply connected with benediction, I highly approve, and wish it were now restored to its primitive use. I sincerely wish we had retained the custom."—John Calvin, Presbyterian.

"The confession of the Name of Christ is, after all, very lame, and will be so, till the discipline which Christ ordained be restored, and the Rite of Confirmation be recovered to its full use and solemnity."—Rev. Dr. Coleman, Congregationalist.

"Not having the opportunity of being confirmed when I had arrived at that age in which I had an ecclesiastical right to receive it, I was determined not to be without it, and therefore went and received Confirmation ever since I became a Methodist preacher."—Rev. Dr. Adam Clarke, Methodist.

"We believe that the laying on of hands with prayer upon baptized believers is an ordinance of Christ, and ought to be submitted unto by all such persons as are admitted to partake of the Lord's Supper, and that the end of this ordinance is not for the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit, but for the further reception of the Holy Spirit of Promise, or for the addition of the graces of the Spirit, and the influences thereof; to confirm, strengthen and comfort them in Christ Jesus."—Confession of Faith, Adopted by the Baptist Church, at Philadelphia, in 1742.

"In the Apostolic Church the laying on of hands was the means of communicating the gift of the Holy Ghost. Baptism was not complete without the laying on of hands."—Professor J. J. Herzog, Lutheran.

THE HAPPY CHRIST.

Evelina K. Strong.

Oh, do not tell me Christ was always sad,
Always, "a Man of sorrows and acquaint'd with grief",
Would He have welcomed been at Cana's feast,
Had He walked gloomily among the glad?

Or with the children flocking to His side?
Do you not think He laughed with them and told Them many stories of His Childhood's home?
How as a little Boy He learned to make Those easy yokes to carry burdens by?
And pointed out the lambs and birds and flowers,
All lowly living things of Galilee,
Told how His Father made and loved them, too?
Would they have loved Him were He always grave,
Those little children leaning on His knee?
How could He not be happy, who had power
To touch the blind, and see wonder and joy
Dawn in those eyes. To make a cripple straight
And strong again. To bring back from the dead
A widow's son? Exhilarating thought
To have will and power for so much good!

No, do not tell me Christ was always sad,
"The Man," some say, "who went, but never smiled",
To me such thoughts are groundless, I believe
That very often He was very glad.

POPE SCORES IRREVERENCE IN YOUTH AND PRESS; SUGGESTS LENTEN SERMONS TO COMBAT TREND.

By Arnaldo Cortesi.

(Wireless to The New York Times.)

Vatican City, March 4.—The relaxation of family discipline and the complete and often irreverent lack of restraint on the part of the press were declared by the Pope today to be the chief plagues afflicting modern society. He made his charges in his customary yearly speech to preachers who will deliver sermons in Rome during Lent. The preachers, said the Pontiff, can do much to combat these evils by denouncing them from the pulpit.

Some present-day parents, continued the Pope, have practically abdicated their duty to watch over their children. The children, he said, often go where they please, with whom they please, when they please, without supervision of their parents, who are, indeed, sometimes referred to as "cumbersome luggage" in invitations issued to young people.

"It is the duty of Christian Catholic parents carefully to watch their children because nobody is perfect, nobody is exempt from original sin, which always is ready to produce its disastrous effects," he asserted.

The pontiff said the second plague was evil reading matter, especially the irreverent lack of restraint in the press, "irreverent not only in the eyes of God but also toward nature and human dignity."

"It is true," he continued, "that this cruel irreverence is chiefly toward that age which is particularly recommended to the reverence of adults, so much so that it formed one of the chief postulates of education even of the ancient pagans."

In this connection the Pontiff mentioned the literary catalogues purporting to help youthful people choose their reading matter, recently published by Fascist editors.

"It contains," he said, "many books that are not only unsuited for youths, but much that is positively dangerous or evil, many books that either are expressly forbidden or forbidden owing to their very nature."

Pope Pius made it clear that he criticized this Fascist literary catalogue not with any preconceived hostility to the Fascist regime but in a spirit of friendly helpfulness, wishing to see the suppression of the errors it contains.

BISHOP KINSOLVING'S FAREWELL TO THE BRAZILIAN CHURCH.

To the Rt. Rev. Dr. W. M. M. Thomas, Bishop Suffragan of the Brazilian Episcopal Church and Canonically in charge:

I beg through your intermediary to transmit to the honorable Annual Council of the Episcopal Church of Brazil the notification that my request for relief from the duties and activities belonging to the position of Bishop in Brazil was placed in the hands of the Rt. Rev. Dr. John G. Murray, the Presiding Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States of America, on the sixth day of January, the Feast of the Epiphany, 1928, the twenty-eighth year of my consecration to the episcopate.

This step was taken on the dictum of some five physicians and specialists. They, after a year of observation and repeatedly examination, positively forbid me either to return to my dear Brazil or to assume any official duties in this country. According to the Canons of the Church, my resignation can become effective only by the action of the House of Bishops at its next Assembly, which will take place in October of this year.

It is with inexpressible emotion, dear brethren, I announce to you this decision, so much opposed to my own wish and earnest hope. After hearing the opinion of the doctors, the Presiding Bishop declared that it would be useless for me in my impaired state of health to return to the sphere of my former activities. It becomes me, therefore, to obey the orders of my superior, which I take to be the will of God.

In handing over my charge to the experienced hands of Bishop Thomas, I am sure that I may confidently expect of you loyal adhesion to your new spiritual leader, especially in any new methods and plans that he may think well to adopt. "New occasions teach us new responsibilities." Your new head will naturally have a new outlook. Workers die; but God's work goes on. "The old order changeth, yielding place to new, and God fulfils Himself in many ways lest one good custom should corrupt the world."

The irreproachable loyalty with which you ever honored me during almost three decades, continued toward our beloved Church and her new chief pastor, will indicate your Christion devotion and glorify your Christian efforts. And now, brethren, beloved of the clergy and laity, no words of human speech are adequate to express to you my undying appreciation of your splendid loyalty. I formed among you all, fellowships and friendships the most intimate that can exist between human souls; and they are to last, I doubt not, even within the portals of eternity. Such friendships are to be interpreted by heart throbs alone. "Suum cuiquie." I have sought to give to each one his due. I have dedicated all the active years of my life to you and to our beloved Brazil. In the words of King Arthur I say—"I have lived my life, that which I have done, may God within Himself make pure." "Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, quit ye like men. Be strong." "Finally, brethren, farewell. Be perfected, be comforted; be of the same mind; live in peace. And the God of love and peace shall be with you." "Now to Him who is able to do abundantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power which worketh in us, unto Him be the glory in the Church and in Jesus Christ unto all generations for ever and ever, Amen."

Your fellow servant in the bonds of the everlasting Gospel,

Lucien Lee Kinsolving,
Retired Bishop of Southern Brazil.

MRS. EDDY: The Biography of a Virginal Mind. By Edwin Franden Dakin. Cloth. Pp. 563. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York City. Reduced from $5 to $2. With new appendices.

The Scribners have done wisely in reducing this popular book to the purchasing level of the common people. The hour has arrived for a just appraisal of the life and character of this most conspicuous woman of American history. Mr. Dakin is fair in his presentation of the authenticated facts herein recorded. If there is an occasional caustic tone or the keen edge of sarcasm, we may forgive him. One can hardly touch such a phenomenal record and not be affected by some measure of feeling.

That both publishers and book-sellers have been threatened by individual Christian Scientists and organizations offers proof that this publication, like that of Georgine Milmine in 1909, was to be suppressed by boycott, intrigue and intimidation. The Scribners are facing the issue with confidence that the reading public will uphold them in their contention for "free speech, free thought and free press".

In this review, I am possessed of a kindly and considerate attitude of mind; since it has been my privilege for many years to study and write upon this woman and her religion. And I am sure I touch a tender chord in many hearts when I estimate that almost every family within reach of our discussion has been affected by this movement. We must love and tenderly cherish the dear ones who have been drawn into the vortex, the salt of the earth in numberless instances.

We may accord to Mrs. Eddy a perfect right to preach a system of healing by metaphysical means and get good pay for it. But we lift the hand of protest when as she mounts her chariot she drags our Lord Jesus to her side, as she lashes her steeds for a triumphal flight into the alluring skies of grandizement and financial achievement.

The vital issue is with the woman herself. Temperamental, neurotic and erotic, herself essentially the center of the stage in every incident from early childhood until the veil was finally drawn upon her meteoric career, she presents a fascinating study.

And with such a nature, we may not be surprised if loyalty to truth is negligible. She claims to be the great-grandchild of Sir John Macneill, prominent in British politics and ambassador to Persia; adopting the seal of the family of her own. When Mrs. Florence Macalister of Aberdeen, Scotland, protests that she is the only married grandchild of Sir John and that Mrs. Eddy certainly is not her daughter, our Yankee seeker for distinction extricates herself by asking the public not to take her claim literally. Yet, she employed that seal on her letter-heads for the most of the rest of her life. In order to bring the Lord Jesus into parallel with her assumption of an early call to prophetship, she avers that when she was admitted into the fellowship of the Congregational Church of Tilton, N. H., the elders of the parish were so impressed with the wisdom of her answers that they went over her and kissed her. This event is calculatingly set for the age of twelve. But the records of the church declare that she was seventeen. She announces that she graduated from Professor Dyer H. Sanborn's Academy. Mr. Sanborn did not have any academy; and she never graduated from anything. Her father took her from school as she was entering fractions, because, he said, "Mary's head was too big for her body." She reveals that she learned Latin, Greek and Hebrew from her brother, Albert; while the truth is that he went to college when she was nine and left home when she was thirteen. Doubtless, with her absorbing mind she did imbibe some degree of knowledge which was not dispensed in the district school. After her wretched life with Dr. Patterson and when in her retrospect, the first huband, George Washington Glover, rose in lustrous memory, she conferred upon that humble man the rank of Colonel in the U. S. Army. Being challenged to prove that, she reduced him to the rank of major; and an indulgent public let him rest there. She insistently claimed that the divinely imparted revelation of her healing message to mankind was given to her in the interval between February 1 and 3, 1866, when having fallen on the ice upon the former date, taken into the house for dead, she was supernaturally raised on the third day. But the Georgine Milmine investigation authenticated by affidavits of those who survived, and well recalled her life, avouch with positive certainty that she declared her teaching to be that of Dr. Quimby of Portland and that she had promised him she would tell it to at least two persons before she should die. This was her message until after she had established herself in Boston some years later. When she married Asa G. Eddy she was fifty-seven; but on the public record of the event she is written down forty.

Born to rule, her father was her first formidable conquest. His rugged nature could brook no impediment to the regal authority which as the head of a sturdy New England family he claimed the right to exercise. But she subdued him by as effectual means as the skilled trainer of the lumbering brute which licks the hand which had scouraged it into submission. When she could accomplish it in no other way, she would go into a faint or a fit that would scare her sire into yieldedness. For with natural feeling for his own child, his baby and his most beautiful offspring, he feared that if she should go off in one of her tantrums, he would be her murderer. This love of power over others she skillfully developed when the mastering of her devoteers grew to be a desideratum.

But the core of Mr. Dakin's contention lies in what must now be the direct objective in all discussion of this striking and inexplicable character. Was Mrs. Eddy herself really the exemplar of the healing system she presented to a world which had waited nineteen centuries to receive? Her inveterate malady was hystera, accentuated by an over-normal precocity. Dr. Ladd, the family physician, could have dealt with her in her childhood, had he known our modern psychiatry. But he did understand her according to his life. There is little room to doubt that she was relieved temporarily when she made her first visit to Dr. Qimby and sang his praises in her memorable poem and the contribution to the Portland Courier. She really felt the sensations of a new life. But with his death in January, 1866, she lost what she had linked with his personality. And it would seem that she never regained her ground. In the last analysis, we are compelled to conclude that while she had given her message of emancipation to the whole wide world, she herself, as she drew behind the curtain of her solitude, was sadly convinced that this healing was not for her.

Charitably we may assume that she never lost hope of winning it; and the quest was the spur that drove her with relentless zeal. The secret of her failure only God can know. But herein, we must again insist lies the important issue. It cannot be ignored; it will not be downed, much as her faithful clientile hate to have it suggested.

And the fundamental truth which Mr. Dakin presents, and which was confirmed in the recent issues of the Outlook, written by Mrs. Fleta Campbell Springer, is that as a child, Mrs. Eddy had been unwisely treated to opiates. We may see that as she grew older, her paroxysms were the reaction of these unfortunate administerings; that in her touch with Quimby, as we have noted, she obtained relief and truthfully ascribed to him the virtues she believed his teachings contained. But losing him and having no one to whom she could look, upon whom she could lean as she did upon him, her invention of that horrible nightmare, Malicious Animal Magnetism, became the only excuse she could devise for her stubborn incarceration in an unhealed body and a maddening mind. That she was constantly suffering for the drug is betrayed by Calvin A. Frye, her closest associate in the last years of her life. Mr. Dakin offers Frye's diary in evidence. And as we have mentioned Mrs. Eddy's detached regard for truth, we may here discern why she was the victim of unstable mental balance.

This is all too wretched for contemplation. It makes one's heart bleed for the poor soul, the prisoner of the error of the medical science of her childhood. And we may well solicitously cover her memory with the mantle of charity and trust that in spite of all, she may have met a compensating gleam of hope as she passed out into that other world which in her final hours she so desperately dreaded to enter.

Christian Science leaders are contending that this story of her enslavement is a newspaper yarn. She herself contradicted it; and before the World reporters answered Sybil Wilbur O'Brien's question, in the interview but a few years before her end, "Is God alone your physician?" by the word, "God alone." But I have a letter from a personal friend, who as a physician knew and talked with Dr. Alvin M. Cushing of Springfield, Mass., after Mrs. Eddy's death. Dr. Cushing will be remembered as the one called in to care for Mrs. Eddy when she fell on the ice, February 1, 1866. The words of Dr. Cushing to my friend were that he had professionally treated Mrs. Eddy (then Mrs. Patterson) all the time she was writing Science and Health and at various periods up to her death. But (if Mr. Dakin will permit an exception to his reference on page 389) Mrs. Eddy stipulated that in no circumstance was he to carry a medicine case into her house.

Certainly, there is no reason why one should be condemned for using necessary remedies in emergency, though he may hold to a metaphysical system of healing. There is no virtue in refusing doctors or medicines. That is foolishly negative. But unfortunately, Mrs. Eddy had so completely eliminated physiology, hygiene and sanitation, doctors and remedies, that she compelled her associates to regard them all as antagonistic to vital experience of healing.

How, then, are we to regard this deluded woman, who in her delusion has misled others? Baffled in early life; defeated and driven to the wall after the death of her first husband; meeting and bitterly enduring poverty under Dr. Patterson's hopeless endeavor to support her; when she beheld the first ray of light upon her darkened pathway, she felt it was from a heavenly source (for she was essentially religious); thus on she eventually became intoxicated with the lust for power and prestige. But she erred in assuming that to her was entrusted the sacred mission of offering a Christianity superior to even that which our Lord provided. Her autocracy, inherent in her nature, was however vitalized by the conviction of her divine commission. Her sufferings were the product of the potent waves of malice sent forth into the ether from her supposed enemies. Her love of wealth was but the human in her as it is perilously so in us all. But her crime lay in degrading the Lord Jesus into the gutter of a rotten Hindoo philosophy which denies the existence of matter, sin, sickness and death; and makes this sordid world the sole aim of achievement and satisfaction. Pity for her becomes us all; and for one I proffer it with a full heart.

Certainly, Mr. Dakin has stirred the waters. We can hardly hope that Christian Scientists will be moved to revise their concepts. But it must be that thinking men and women will give heed to the warning and find in the Word of God, simply and sincerely, our Lord's promised way of meeting the needs of His own.

enquiries. The merchants have learned that the system of realizing humanity and human beings with souls and feelings pays.

This may be the start of reaction against the machinery system and doctrine. Americans generally are kindly people, but prone to follow fashions. We have learned the practical value of courtesy, but the courtesy has become of the mechanical kind. We may be near a time when real warmth, recognition of souls and feelings in others and demonstration of our own, will be universal among us. Each of us can do something toward this great silent revolution. We have rid ourselves generally of surliness and brutality of small officials of corporations and governments which used to be so prevalent. Now we may soon reach the point where employers and employees, fellow-workers of all grades, neighbors, in our contacts with each other, above all in contact with the poor and weak and stricken, shall systematically contradict the learned professors and put them to reversal of teachings, by proving that we have souls and realize souls in others, that no man or woman or child is a machine. So we can cultivate souls and consciousness of them, keep them alive and demonstrate the eternal truth that all of us have something more than the physical machinery, something with aspiration, hope, destiny, beyond the changes and chances of this mortal life.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND NOTES

(S. C. London Correspondent.)

Committee on Appointment of Bishops: —At the recent meeting of the Church Assembly, the Bishop of Manchester presented an interim report of the Committee appointed to consider the system of appointing Bishops. The Committee was appointed in 1923 and have not shown any undue haste in reporting. Probably like most people they consider the present system quite indefensible in theory and not so bad in practice. On the assumption that the Prime Minister is a man who regards the responsibility seriously and does not attempt by means of it to grind any axe or seek mere political advantage, there is much to comemnd it in an Established Church. So far no one can challenge the honor of any Prime Minister in the matter. It may be that people (like the writer) regret the color of the majority of appointments, but it is doubtful whether under any other system the position would be more satisfactory. Once one school of thought becomes predominant in the Church it must be of necessity that the higher appointments will be of that type and those who hold kindred views will naturally be put to the fore. However that may be, the fact remains that no one has come forward with any idea of a change in the matter of appointments which attracts much commendation.

In the interim report just presented the committee have sought to justify their existence by making certain recommendations, but they amount to very little. They recommend that the electing body should have the right to refuse to elect a person named in the King's Letter Missive, without incurring penalty; that the Archbishop of Canterbury and York should not be liable to penalty for refusing to confirm or consecrate a person elected as bishop; and that the Prime Minister, before submitting any recommendation to the King in respect of the appointment of a bishop, should consult an advisory committee of not less than seven persons, including the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, to be chosen by the Prime Minister himself from the members of the Church Assembly) without in any way derogating from his own ultimate responsibility. The Committee stated that before reaching this conclusion they had had interviews with and communications from a number of people qualified to speak on the subject, including six Prime Ministers (past and present) and from Archbishops of overseas provinces. It seems more easy to say no harm has been done by this Committee that to say it has done any good.

Men Needed—Though the number of men ordained last year exceeded by 54 that of the previous year, the ranks of the Clergy are still being reduced. By death and retirement some 500 are lost each year from the active list. Last year only 439 were ordained. There has been much done since the War to foster the sense of vocation and to enable men to provide for their own training to go to College, and it seems now that the number is more likely to rise than to fall in coming years. Nevertheless the position is still one of considerable difficulty, and there is no doubt that at present the Anglo Catholic section are doing more than the Evangelicals. The policy of the latter is quality rather than quantity and the opinion of the principals of their colleges is that the quality is improving steadily.

Bishop-Elect of Marquette To Be Consecrated.

The Senior Bishop has taken order for the Ordination and Consecration of the Reverend Hayward Seller Ablewhite, Bishop-Elect of the Diocese of Marquette, on the Feast of the Annunciation, Tuesday, March 25, 1930, in St. Paul's Cathedral, Marquette, Michigan.

The Rt. Rev. Hugh Latimer Burleson, D. D., Bishop of South Dakota, will be the consecrator, assisted by the Rt. Rev. Boyd Vincent, D. D., and the Rt. Rev. John Newton McCormick, D. D., Bishop of Western Michigan.

Presenting Bishops will be the Rt. Rev. Granville Gaylord Bennett, D. D., Bishop of Duluth, and the Rt. Rev. Harwood Sturtevant, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of Fond du Lac.

The Rt. Rev. Warren Lincoln Rogers, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of Ohio, will preach the sermon.

Attending Presbyters will be the Rev. Walter Tunks, rector St. Paul's Church, Muskegon, Michigan, and the Rev. Edward Schofield Travers, D. D., rector of St. Peter's Church, St. Louis, Missouri.

The Rev. George Walton, General Missioner of the Diocese of Marquette, will serve as Master of Ceremonies.

Deputy Registrar will be the Rev. Carl G. Ziegler, rector of Grace Church, Ishpeming, Michigan.

Pray for Russia March 19.

Speaking before members of his diocese at Ash Wednesday services in Trinity Church, New York City, the New York Times quotes Bishop William T. Manning as declaring that the warfare of the Soviet regime against God and religion was being prosecuted on a worldwide scale and accusing the American "intelligentsia" of complicity in this war by seeking to undermine religion and accepted standards of morality and conduct.

The Bishop called upon all those present to join in the protests against the policy of the Soviet Government and to participate together with Catholics on March 19 in prayers for Christians suffering for their faith in Russia. The date was set recently in a pronouncement by Pope Pius XI in Rome, in which he assailed the conduct of the Soviety Government.

"We see in one of the greatest countries of the world a government pledged to the open propagation of godlessness and to an attempt to stamp out religion from the lives of a whole people and create a godless nation, the denials of which, recently made, are in fact not denials but only mere juggling with words," Bishop Manning said.

"We see here in our own land an 'intelligentsia' which affects a contemptuous disregard for all religious belief: which by its belittling of the truths of revealed religion seeks to turn the mind of our youth against God; which is undertaking to break down the institution of marriage and the family, and the standards of morality and purity upon which Christian civilization depends.

"I believe that we are facing today one of the great crises in Christian history. The Russian warfare against God is not confined to that land; its influence is being felt throughout the world. It will not do to say that we are rich and comfortable, that the religious persecution in Russia is no concern of ours.

"But while we protest we must remember that we ourselves are not without guilt in this matter. This situation in Russia would not exist if we, and all who believe in Christ, had been truer to our faith in Him and had brought the world more fully under His power. In a world filled with the love of Christ the teachings of Lenin could find no place, but if the world is not to go the way of Lenin it must far more truly go the way of Christ."

In urging all to participate in the day of prayer on March 19, the Bishop said:

"We must thank God that this crisis is drawing Christians all over the world nearer to each other."

He also referred to the service which he has arranged at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine for Sunday, March 16, at which all Christian sects have been invited to take part and pray together "for all those in Russia, Jews, Moslems and Christians, who are suffering for their faith in the one God."

Give to the Good Friday Offering.

Dr. W. C. Emhardt, Director of the Committee on Educational Chaplaincies of the National Council, has issued a letter to clergymen asking that the Good Friday Offering be given for our brethren in lands where Our Lord was crucified on the first Good Friday, the apostles labored, the Church was centered and flourishing a thousand years, the persecuted Apostolic Church still stands faithful.

Our Church maintains educational chaplains in Jerusalem and Mosul, in response to the call of the Apostolic Churches, to help in training spiritual leaders for their reawakening peoples. We united with the whole Anglican Communion in support of the Jerusalem and the East Mission for Jews, Moslems and Christians. The House of Bishops commends these ventures for God to our prayers and offerings.

The Good Friday Offering was authorized at the New Orleans General Convention and commended to all parishes and missions. Its object is the training of the future spiritual leaders of the Levant. Part of the work is that of our Educational Chaplains and part that of the Pan-Anglican Jerusalem and the East Mission.

An authority on the Levant who has visited our work, the Rev. John R. Voris, a Presbyterian, says: "I doubt if anywhere in the world the Episcopal Church has made a greater contribution through two personalities than it has made through these rather unknown 'educational chaplains' or missionaries or prophets in the Near East."

To those who have not in the past made this offering this letter is an urgent appeal. Those accustomed to give on Good Friday for other objects, are urged, because of the great need, to divide the offering.

Those not in sympathy with the object of the offering, are asked to reach the article on the subject in the March Spirit of Missions.

It is not large offerings that are asked, but that every Churchman be given an opportunity to know and give. If every parish would participate the needed and urgently called for extension of this great work of our Church would be made possible.

This annual offering is an authorized special and does not apply on the quota

Chinese Congregation Makes Contribution to Virginia Parish.

The congregation of the Church of Our Saviour, Hongkow, Shanghai, the Rev. P. N. Tsu, D. D., rector, has sent a gift of $200 American money, toward the rebuilding of the Church of Our Saviour, Montpelier, St. Martin's Parish, in the Diocese of Virginia.

The special bond of sympathy between the congregation in China and that in Hanover County, Virginia, arises from the fact that the Rev. Robert Nelson of Hanover County ordained in 1845 and one of the earliest missionaries of the American Church to China, was for many years the rector of the Church of Our Saviour in Shanghai and his ministry of loving devotion is still held in memory of that congregation.

Being compelled to return to America for a few years he lived at his home, "Oakland", in Hanover County. During this period he labored in a neglected section of St. Martin's Parish, organizing a mission congregation, which he named the Church of Our Saviour after his church in Shanghai. When the members of his congregation in China heard of his missionary endeavor in Virginia, they sent a generous gift toward the erection of the church. This congregation is now one of the most important points in the entirely rural parish of St. Martin's. Its church building was destroyed by fire early in 1929. The erection of a new church building was undertaken at once, and the new church has been opened for services though a debt incurred in the re-building still rests upon it.

When the news of the burning of the Virginia church became known to the congregation of the Church of Our Saviour in Shanghai, they at once proceeded to show their veneration of Dr. Nelson and their sympathy for their namesake church in America by undertaking to secure subscriptions toward its rebuilding. In spite of the fact that the congregation had just been through a campaign that fairly exhausted their resources a sum amounting to considerably over $500 in Chinese money was contributed for this object. Owing to the high rate of exchange this sum amounts to $200 in American money, and a check for that amount has been received.

When the disturbed situation of China at present is taken into consideration, the gift of loving sympathy from Chinese Christians to a congregation in America is a noteworthy and heartening event.

Dr. Littell Consecrated Bishop of Hawaii.

Thursday, February 27, proved an ideal day for the consecration of the Rev. Samuel Harrington Littell, in the Cathedral in Honolulu. This being the first consecration ever held here, was of great interest, not only to the people of Honolulu, but to those living on the other Islands, many of whom came to witness the consecration.

The Cathedral was crowded, and in the congregation were to be seen members of every race living in these islands The people making up the congregation proved the truth of the saying, often used in connection with these islands "The melting pot."

The Rt. Rev. Hugh Latimer Burleson was the Consecrator, and the Co-Consecrators were the Rt. Rev. John McKim and the Rt. Rev. Henry Bond Restarick.

The Rt. Rev. Edward L. Parsons preached an impressive sermon, taking for his text, "Feed My Lambs." He pointed out that whilst many looked for an organizer, financier, and a man who could fill all the missions and parishes in his district with clergy, yet that was not the main thing for which a Bishop was consecrated. He was, first and last, A Father in God."

As the Father of God embraced the whole of mankind, so the Bishop must be a Father to each and every one in his diocese. The service, together with the order of the procession, which follows, was most impressive:

Crucifer.
Flag Bearer.
Assistant Master of Ceremonies, the Rev. Noah K. Cho.
The Choir.
Diocesan Treasurer.
Lay Members of the Standing Committee.
Lay Members of the Cathedral Chapter.
Lay Members of the Board of Directors.
Chancellor.
Registrar.
Crucifer.
Assistant Master of Ceremonies, the Rev. H. A. Wiley.
Visiting Clergy.
Clergy of the Diocese of Honolulu.
Crucifer.
Reader of the Certificate of Ordinations, the Rev. Thurston R. Hinckley.
Reader of Certificate of Confirmation, the Rev. Canon Kieb.
Reader of Canonical Testimonial, the Rev. Canon Ottamann.
Reader of the Litany, the Rev. James Walker.
Deputy Registrar, the Very Rev. A. Ault.
Reader of Certificate of Election and Peacher, the Rt. Rev. Edward L. Parsons, D. D., Bishop of California.
Attending Presbyters: the Rev. Y. Sang Mark and the Rev. P. T. Fukao.
The Bishop-Elect of Honolulu, the Rev. S. Harrington Littell, S. T. D.
Crucifer.
Co-Consecrators: the Rt. Rev. Henry B. Restarick, D.D., Retired Bishop, and the Rt. Rev. John McKim, D. D., Bishop of North Tokyo.
Chaplain to the Presiding Bishop.
Presiding Bishop, the Rt. Rev. Hugh Latimer Burleson, D. D., Bishop of South Dakota.

Preaching Mission at Emmanuel Church, Richmond.

A preaching mission on the general subject, "Christian Character", will be conducted at Emmanuel Church, Brook Hill, five days, from March 17 to 21, by the Very Rev. D. Wilmot Gateson, Dean of the Pro-Cathedral Church of the Nativity and Chaplain of Lehigh University, Bethlehem, Pennsylvania.

Dean Gateson will preach at eight o'clock every evening of the mission, on the following topics: "The Epitome of the Virtues";; "The Most Vital Minor Virtue"; "The Curse that Proved a Blessing"; "The Bond of Peace and All Virtues," and "Unfathomable Wealth."

A service of Holy Communion and Meditation will be held every morning at eleven o'clock, and on Friday afternoon a Children's Mission and Talk at four o'clock.

The mission is being looked forward to with great enthusiasm by Emmanuel Parish. It is designed for the benefit of the whole community.

Notable Missionary Addresses.

The Laymen's Missionary Movement holding sessions in Richmond for the first time March 3 and 4, met with splendid support and enthusiasm.

Earnestness, sincerity and devotion to the cause of Christ characterized the speakers and the audiences alike throughout all of the meetings, morning and afternoon in St. Paul's Episcopal Church, and evening in the First Baptist Church.

The daily papers were generous in the space allotted.

Mohammedanism, with its 234,000,000 adherants, its political religious and economic significance, and the opportunity it offers the Christian Church today as a mission field, furnished the theme of two addresses by Dr. Samuel M. Zwemer, of Princeton Theological Seminary, at the opening sessions.

Dr. Zwemer was introduced by Oliver J. Sands, general chairman of the convention, and addressed the morning session on the subject, "Among Mohammedans Throughout the World." His topic in the afternoon was "The Present Outlook on the Mission Field."

One of the outstanding missionaries of the world today, Dr. Zwemer, who is a world traveler, a fellow of the Royal Geographic Society and the author of a number of books, is an acknowledged authority on Mohammedanism. He is the author of the recently published "Across the World of Islam."

Christianity has been defeated in the East for centuries by Mohammedanism, which has been the lifelong enemy of the Church of Christ, Dr. Zwemer declared. With more than 500,000 Mohammedans under the American flag in the Philippines, with the whole world of Islam brought to our very doors through trade and other means, the problem is one that cannot be ignored, he pointed out.

The hope that the Church in the South would open a mission in the Mohammedan field was expressed by the speaker, who said that the laymen's movement would have to be strengthened 100 per cent if it is to meet the opportunities in the Mohammedan field alone, not to mention China, Japan and other couneries, where there are comparatively few Mohammedans.

He recommended a little Magazine, "The Mohammedan World", to those who would keep in touch with this subject.

An address on "The Challenge of the Church in China," by Dr. Donald Richardson of the Union Theological Seminary, who served eighteen years in the Chinese mission field, until forced to leave China in 1927, closed the session Monday afternoon.

Growth of the Church in China has been a slow and painful process, Dr. Richardson said, and though it now numbers but 600.000 among its members, it is a challenging Church in its loyalty and devotion that should give the Church in America something to live up to.

Work in the mission fields of Japan was discussed in an address by Dr. T. H. Haden at the morning session. Monday. Dr. Haden is a missionary to Japan and dean of the Kwansei Gakuin at Kobe. He was introduced by Oliver J. Sands, following a brief address of welcome by the Rev. Beverley D. Tucker, D. D., rector of St. Paul's.

"There was never a time when missionaries were more needed in Japan than now," the Rt. Rev. H. St. George Tucker, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese of Virginia, declared in a brief address following Dr. Haden's speech, in which he urged the continued support of the Christian Churches in Japan.

A resolutions committee was appointed by Oliver J. Sands as follows: Jesse F. Wood, chairman; J. T. Kernodle, Perry Seay, G. Braxton Valentine, J. H. Meek, L. W. Hoffman and D. K. Kellog.

Dinner was served to the committeemen, ministers, church officers and other delegates to the convention Monday night in St. Mark's Church and the evening session opened in the First Baptist Church at 7:45 o'clock. The Rev. Sparks W. Melton, D. D., pastor of the Free Mason Street Baptist Church, Norfolk, and Dr. Zwemer spoke on the theme, "Laymen Wanted." "Modern Missions and the World Brotherhood" was Dr. Melton's topic and Dr. Zwemer spoke on "The World Mission of Christ."

The five principles on which the program of Christ depends, Dr. Zwemer said, are world vision, a fierce loyalty to Christ; a love that will not let go; a dauntless faith, and a sacrificial life. He gave instances from the mission field to illustrate these principles.

Addressing the second-day session at St. Paul's Church, William Knowles Cooper, prominent Washington banker, told of the origin of the movement which was started a few years ago, when a few of the men of his city, who were deeply interested in the problems of missions, determined to go to several foreign countries in order to make observations of conditions then prevailing.

These earnest men, Mr. Cooper said, on their return, felt convinced that money for the missionary cause would be freely given if the leading laymen in America could be fully acquainted with the changes that had taken place in many foreign countries, and with the opportunity that was awaiting. From this nucleus was developed the idea of the "laymen's missionary movement."

The speaker went on to explain that the interest in the missionary movement was to be made effective by "education, organization and stimulation."

Following the address of Mr. Cooper, the convention was addressed by Frederick J. Michel, national secretary of the laymen's missionary movement, who spoke in the place of Dr. Carver, who had been detained in Louisville.

The extensive church building going on in the country was one of the reasons assigned by Mr. Michel for the lack of support given missionary work by the Church and a lack of adequate education as another.

Educational work in Japan was the subject of an address by the Rev. T. H. Haden, D. D., at the close of the morning session. The great improvement in the condition of Japanese women since the beginning of the Christian missionary and educational program was pointed out by Dr. Haden, who said, "We have taken the inferiority complex out of the Japanese women." High school education for girls in Japan is the direct result of the educational work of the church, he declared.

The example set by the Christians in this country will be responsible for the success or failure of the work in the mission field, the Rt. Rev. H. St. George Tucker declared in an address on "Prayer and Missions" before the afternoon session of the convention. Mission work needs prayer behind it and can never succeed in a religious way without it, he said, and urged the support of the Church with regular and concentrated prayer for the missionary efforts.

The Rev. Charles F. McAllister, D. D., rector of St. Michael's and All Angels' Church, Baltimore, delivered the closing address before the afternoon meeting. He was introduced to the convention by Mr. Mickel, who presided at Monday's sessions, as the pastor of the largest church of the Episcopal Communion South of New York, and spoke on "The Price of the Kingdom."

Stanley High, world traveler, journalist and editor of the Christian Herald, and Habib Yusufgi, a native of India, now a student at Princeton University, addressed the closing session of the convention, at which Perry Seay of Richmond presided.

Speaking on the subject, "An Adequate Christ," Mr. High declared that the Church will never rediscover its early missionary dynamics until it gets back on its old ground of prayer and consecration. He called himself "a converted modernist."

Mr. Yusufgi spoke on the subject, "From Mohammed to Christ," telling of his experiences as a converted Mohammedan, and Oliver J. Sands, general chairman of the convention committee, spoke briefly on the purpose of the convention and called for a meeting of the convention committee to be held at the close of the session.

The auditorium of the church was crowded the last night and the galleries well filled. The sessions at St. Paul's Church, morning and afternoon, were also well attended.

A permanent committee from the various churches of the city to arrange for meetings of the laymen in the interest of the missionary work, was provided for in a resolution, which was adopted unanimously by the convention. A vote of thanks to the speakers, officers, committees and others who have worked for the success of the convention was incorporated in the paper as were other recommendations in regard to the missionary movement.

Service to Promote Fellowship Between Races.

A unique service to create fellowship between races was the joint musical vesper held at the Protestant Episcopal Church of the Heavenly Rest, New York City, at 4:30 o'clock, the afternoon of Sunday, March 9, when, at the invitation of the rector, the Rev. Dr. Henry Darlington, the colored congregation of the Church of the Crucifixion with their rector, the Rev. Jedediah Edmead, joined with the Heavenly Rest membership in worship. At this time, the Schubert Glee Club of Colored Singers gave a program of spirituals, and Hugh Porter, organist at the Church of the Heavenly Rest, was at the organ. Only the processional and recessional were sung by the Heavenly Rest choir under the direction of J. Morris Helfenstein, Choirmaster. Among the numbers sung by the colored glee club were Manr Fisher's tune, "Chorale, Lead Us, O Father"; "Go Down Moses," arranged by Burleigh Brewer; "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot," arranged by Fischer, and "Listen to the Lambs," by Dett.

The Rt. Rev. Herbert Shipman, D. D., Suffragan Bishop of New York and former rector of this church, delivered the address in the absence of the rector himself, who was scheduled to preach at St. Paul's Chapel, Columbia University.

The offering received at this time will be devoted to the philanthropic activities of the visiting colored church.

My Eleven Years.

March 1, 1919—March 1, 1930
The Rev. William Porkess, D. D.
Rector of St. Stephen's Episcopal Church
Wilkinsburg, Pennsylvania

The "sufficiency" of God has been the steady impetus of the parish's leadership.

"Efficiency" has been valued, abundantly used, but never given the place of mastery.

Parishioners—men and women—who have always kept the "horse before the cart"—worship prefacing work—spirituality being the source of all activity.

The services of the church maintained at all times of the year alike, and with continued emphasis on the significance of the Holy Communion.

The Church School placed upon a firm educational basis, graded throughout, and much care and effort in selecting and sustaining teachers for every class. A weekly single envelope used by all pupils, with a fifty-fifty distribution for current expenses and missions.

A clear and frank continued teaching on the Christian use of money, advocating the Scriptural standard of "'tithing" as a minimum, and meeting with growing and most encouraging response.

An absolute transformation in the parish's attitude to missions, resulting in the adoption and continued use of a plan that has received special recognition by the National Church; this plan consisting of the use of a weekly single envelope, 75 per cent of the contents designated to current expenses and 25 per cent to missions. Also the same proportion of the ordinary loose offering at the Sunday services. So marked has the success been that the parish's missionary quota for 1929 was exceeded by several hundred dollars in response.

All Saints' Days and Holy Days marked by celebrations of the Holy Communion.

A fine and most useful choir room erected and paid for, adjoining the Church proper.

A large debt on the Church property, that had long been a heavy burden, wiped out, and the church consecrated at a glorious service when the mortgage papers were burned.

The installing of an exquisite memorial lighted Cross and a new lighting system.

Five more artistic memorial stained glass windows now gracing the sanctuary.

A four-page Sunday parish bulletin, that seeks to be informational, inspirational and educational, presenting Christian teaching and church interests in their fullness.

A recognition and encouragement of social contacts among parishioners, as a natural part of the Church's life, but never knowingly as a "bait" to "catch".

The gift of a new stone rectory, by a few generous souls of the parish, and also the pledging, by the many, for the erection of a new stone parish house, both buildings now in the hands of the architect.

Four men ordained to the ministry of the Episcopal Church, and a fifth now in the seminary preparing for ordination.

One of our young men, admitted to the lay order of Saint Barnabas, who has dedicated his whole life to service among sick men, and also to lay missionary work as God shall direct.

Lenten Services.

Owing to alterations in progress within the Brown Theatre, for several years generously housing the noon-day services in Louisville, Christ Church Cathedral has been found the most available place for that purpose during the present season, and thus far with reasonable maintenance of attendance. The opening services, with Bishop Woodcock as preacher, filled the building to its capacity. The respective speakers of the succeeding weeks are also heard on Wednesday evening at the Cathedral; and Thursday at St. Andrew's, the Rev. J. S. Douglas, rector, preceded by the weekly dinner served, on that evening, by the women of the parish.

The Woman's Auxiliary is holding its weekly united meeting for women throughout the diocese each Friday afternoon, preceding the united service held in the various parishes, successively, when the noon-day speaker is again the preacher.

"Christian Crusade."

During the last week of February, St. Peter's Church, Louisville, conducted a successful and interesting "Christian Crusade", under the leadership of the Rev. H. Campbell Dixon, Diocesan Executive Secretary. The interest and enthusiasm of the children was especially enlisted, while the men and women have organized a "Sunshine" Club, shedding its rays of hope and energy on plans for the days to come. Despite the absence of a regular rector, the Sunday services are unfailingly maintained under the faithful leadership of devoted lay-readers.

Following the Crusade, Mr. Dixon carried his labors to several important points in the diocese at present unshepherded, arousing new interest in each parish and mission, and affording comfort and help to many through the Church's ministry.

St. Stephen's Parish, Louisville, is losing its rector, the Rev. Richard I. Brown, who, after three years of service in this finely organized parish, has accepted a call to Fairhope, Alabama.

Grace Church, Louisville, the Rev. A. H. Austin, rector, mourns the loss of its faithful Junior Warden, and the diocese a loyal layman, in the sudden death of Mr. E. J. Heimerdinger; in apparent health and vigor at the eucharist on Sunday, he entered Paradise before the following morning.

Emmanuel Mission of St. Andrew's Church, is rejoicing over the promise of a new minister-in-charge, after long and patient waiting, following the illness of its beloved pastor, the Rev. Howard Gibbon. During the present month, the Rev. G. Levin Ferguson, late of Waupaca, Wisconsin, will arrive and begin his combined duties in the care of the Mission and Assistant of St. Andrew's.

Miss Lambright Visits Diocese.

Miss Clarice Lambright, Associate Secretary of the National Commission on Young People's Work, and Field Worker of the Diocese of Western New York, visited the Diocese of Florida during the month of February in the interest of the Young People's Service League and the Student Work at the Florida State College for Women.

During the first week of her visit, Miss Lambright made Jacksonville her headquarters. She held separate meetings with each one of the seven Leagues of the city and vicinity; she spoke to the Jacksonville Clericus, and also to a joint meeting of the Counsellors of the city Leagues and she was the chief speaker at a Young People's Service and a Young People's banquet, both of which were held in the Church of the Good Shepherd.

During the second week of her visit, Miss Lambright held a College Mission in Tallahassee. This Mission was planned by Miss Hope Baskette, the Student Worker of the two Florida Dioceses. In St. John's Church on the closing Sunday of the Mission, Bishop Juhan preached and confirmed a class.

Seldom has a Church worker brought such real and lasting help as has Miss Lambright and Bishop Juhan and the Diocese of Florida will long feel gratitude to her and to the Bishop of Western New York for this visit.

The Bishop of Florida will be the special speaker among the students of the University of the South, March 9-11.

The Rev. Herbert A. Donavan Gives Ringing Challenge.

On Sunday, February 23, St. John's Parish, Jacksonville, was fortunate in having as its preacher at the eleven o'clock service, the Rev. Herbert A. Donovan, of the Liberian Mission field. The Rev. Mr. Donovan is in this country on furlough, after seven years' service in Africa; he was passing through Jacksonville after a visit to South Florida, and consented to tell of the Church's work in this, her oldest mission field, at the request of the rector of St. John's, the Rev. Newton Middleton.

Seldom has such a ringing challenge been heard from St. John's pulpit. Would that all of the Church's missionaries had the power of allowing the Church at home to so enter into their experiences and to share with them the vision of opportunity and the consecration of service as was presented by this young man. If this were the case, our people would awake to the world call for Christ more fully, the call would be met with men and money and the missionary enterprise of the Chudch would be a truly vital and compelling force throughout the world.

May God give this power and this spirit to many more of His workers.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robert C. Jett, D. D., Bishop

A Fine Diocesan Young People's Conference.

On the evening of Friday, February 28, and the morning of Saturday, March 1, a conference of the young people of the diocese was held in St. John's Church and Parish House, Roanoke. In addition to Christ Church, St. John's and St. Peter's in Roanoke, and St. Paul's Church in Salem, all of which were largely represented, seventy-nine persons were present, coming from seventeen other churches in various parts of the diocese. The conference, though brief was a most interesting and successful one and will probably result in the founding of a diocesan organization of young people in the near future. While there are young people's societies in many of the parishes in Southwestern Virginia, they are functioning simply as independent units rather than as branches of a central body, representing the diocese as a whole.

The conference opened Friday evening with supper in the parish house of St. John's, at which more than two hundred were present. This was followed by a brief introductory address by the Bishop Jett, who expressed deep interest in the work of the younger members of the Church and his joy at their assembling in so large a gathering as this.

The "key speaker" of the evening was the Rev. Philip Jensen of St. Thomas' Parish Owings Mills, in Green Spring Valley, near Baltimore, Maryland. Mr. Jensen took as his subject, "The Quest of the Best", and made a most inspiring address. Then, after a "fellowship hour" of games and recreation in the gymnasium, the Young People's Service League of Christ Church, Roanoke, gave a beautiful presentation of the pageant, "Our Risen Lord."

On Saturday morning at eight o'clock, Bishop Jett celebrated the Holy Communion, being assisted by the Rev. Messrs. Alfred R. Berkeley of St. John's Church and Taylor Willis of Christ Church.

Breakfast was then served in the parish house.

At the opening of the morning conference, Bishop Jett, in compliance with a special request, spoke briefly on the school, which the diocese is about to establish in Wise County.

COLLECT FOR THE SECOND SUNDAY IN LENT.

Almighty God, Who seest that we have no power of ourselves to help ourselves: keep us both outwardly in our bodies and inwardly in our souls that we may be defended from all adversities which may happen to the body, and from all evil thoughts which may assault and hurt the soul; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE GATE OF PRAYER.

My troubles are but pebbles on the road,
My joys are like the everlasting hills.

So it is when I step through the gate of prayer
From time into eternity.
When I am in the consciousness of God,
My fellow men are not far off and forgotten,
But close the strangely dear.
Those whom I love
Have a mystic value.
They shine as if a light were glowing within them.

So it is when my soul steps through the postern gate
Into the presence of God.
Big things become small, and small things become great.
The near becomes far, and the future is near.
The lowly and despised is shot through with glory.

—Walter Rauschenbusch.

The New Testament.

Here we find three very interesting Greek words bearing the idea of atonement.

One of these is lutrott, translated redeem or given as a ransom, the idea being the regaining of something that has been forbidden by one's offense by the paying of a required ransom price We find the Hebrew kaphar, make atonement, thus translated Ex. 21:30. If a man's vicious ox killed a person, we read. "If there be laid on him a ransome, then he shall give for the redemption of his life whatsoever is laid upon him." In the case of the sinner, it is eternal life that he has forfeited by sin. ("The soul that sinneth, it shall die.") But he regains it by the death of Christ, which is the ransom price in lieu of the sinner's eternal death. Paul speaks of Jesus Christ, "in whom we have our redemption, through His blood". "Knowing that we were redeemed," says Peter, "not with corruptible things . . . but with precious blood, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot, even the blood of Christ." And we need ask no other but the Saviour Himself why He died. He says it was "to give His life a ransom for many."

Another of these words is katallasso. The A. V. translates it, Romans 5:11, atonement; but the R. V., reconciliation, which is the usual translation of the A. V. also. It does not matter, for the two words bear the same idea. The point we wish to note is that this reconciliation or atonement is accomplished by the death of Christ. "For if, while we were enemies, we were reconciled to God through the death of His Son, much more, being reconciled, shall we be saved by His life; and not only so, but we also rejoice in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom we have now received the reconciliation."

Our third word is hilaskomai. And this is the word generally used by the Septuagint in translating the Hebrew kaphar, or make atonement, into the Greek. The Septuagint version is the translation of the Old Testament from the Hebrew into the Greek some two centuries B. C. and getting its title from the fact that some seventy translators were engaged in the work. The Greek had become more and more the language in common use, which fact was part of God's wonderful preparation for the rapid propagation of the Gospel. We say hilaskomai is the Greek word used generally by the Septuagint to translate the Hebrew word kaphar or make atonement. How is hilaskomai rendered in our English version? It is rendered propitiation, or make propiation, which means to appease, pacify, gain the favor of one, who has been offended, and so to become reconciled to or at one with him. Who is the sinner's propitiation or who has made propitiation for him? Jesus Christ, "Wherefore it behooved Him in all things to be made like unto His brethren, that He might become a merciful and faithful high priest in things pertaining to God, to make propitiation for the sins of the people." Paul speaks of Christ Jesus, "whom God set forth to be a propitiation, through faith, in His blood." And, says John, "He is the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for the whole world."

It is at least beautifully suggestive that in Hebrews 9:5 a derivative of the Greek word for propitiation is translated mercy seat. Christ is our propitiation; Christ is our mercy seat. He is the covering of our sins, removing them from between us and God and thus reconciling us to Him or making us at-one with Him. Christ is the place of meeting between God and the sinner, where God will receive and forgive and be at-one with him. "I am the way," said the Saviour Himself; "no one cometh unto the Father, but by Me."

"Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holy place by the blood of Jesus, . . . let us draw near with a true heart in fulness of faith."
—Presbyterian of the South.

"The Mouth of the Lions."

Beatrice Curl.

The teacher was trying to impress on the minds of her scholars, the wonderful way in which God protected Daniel. Each of the scholars were asked what they would have done if they had been in Daniel's place. There was no answer for a long time. "I'd have been afraid that they wouldn't have stayed shut," a little girlie confessed.

The answer had showed plainly what the trouble is, when we have not sufficient faith in God. The little girl had spoken a great truth. We are afraid to stand fast to our ideals, not because we think that they are wrong and that we are foolish to stand by them, but simply because we are afraid that the lion's mouths will not stay shut.

There are many kinds of lions stalking around, and the hardest of them all is the taunt and sneer of others. They will taunt you because you wish to stand by your ideals of what is right, and they will sneer a great deal more if you throw those ideals away. They will not only taunt you, but the other members of the class as well.

The entire Sunday School will suffer because one was afraid the lion's mouths would not stay shut. Never fear, stick to your ideals of honor, and the lion's mouths will remain closed, even if they do a pile of growling beforehand.

PRAYER.

An Indian Legend.

David W. Cade.

At a great forge in the fire fields toiled Manitou,
Moulded a round earth joining purpose and might.
Closed it within a shell of shining sky-blue,
Then spun it far down the hollows of night.

Lighted the sun, a fierce flaming war-fire,
Hammered the moon: a pale light for the dead.
Sprinkled like lanterns the train of the polestar
Rightward of sunsets blazing furnace-red.

Men came through the forest crying sorely for sleep,
Forgetting; never knowing their starting or whence
Came rain and great thunder shaking the near deep
Arose Terrors black face with terrible menace.

Swept the legioned wind with thundering hoofbeats,
Wild horses bearing riders shadowy in dun,
Swirling clouds that were as smothering death sheets
That wrapped fathoms deep the bright sun.

In the throne room of the white halls of heaven,
Manitou heard a cry from the people in fright.
And straightway the dark clouds were riven
And a rainbow flashed through the night.

What If He Had Not Come?

There are "ifs" that startle us. Think of what would have happened if, in any of the great crises of the world, "things had gone the other way." Inneed an American editor wrote a fascinating book on "The Ifs of History", in which he dealt with some tremendous moments when the fate of nations and sometimes of civilization itself hung upon a certain decision or action, and projected his fancy into the realm of the Might-Have Been with the question, "What would have happened if the scales had turned the other way?" What if Aristides had won the Ethenian election over Themistocles? What if the Moors had won the battle of Tours? What if Columbus had kept a straight course westward? What if Elizabeth had left an heir to the British throne? What if the Spanish Armada had sailed at the date first appointed? What if Washington had become a midshipman in the British navy, as in his boyhood he passionately desired to be? What if Abraham Lincoln's father had migrated southward, as he come near to doing, instead of northward? What if the Confederate army had marched upon Washington immediately after the first battle of Bull Run? What if the Southern States had bought the East India Company's fleet as they originally intended to do? What do you suppose would have happened if in any of these cases there had occurred the alternative event? Imagine how any one of these alternatives would have affected every one of us today.

But here is the most startling "if" of all—what if He had not come? It is not a wild hypotheses. It is presented to us by Jesus Himself when speaking of the sin of the Pharisees and Sadducees who rejected Him and persecuted Him—"If I had not come."

No Christ? Then no angels' song of peace. Jesus was born into a world of strife. And there has been much of strife since. And yet "the only thing that holds humanity together, the only dream of a united world, a brotherhood of man—the only dream of such a possibility all turns upon Christ, and without Him the dream would be gone."

No Christ? Then no star in the east, no holy Babe in Bethlehem, no beautiful story of Galilee. No Christ? Then no New Testament. No words of life like John 3:16. No messages of love like "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden." No syllables of comfort like "Let not your heart be troubled. In my Father's house are many mansions. Where I am there ye may be also." No Paul to say, "For I am persuaded that neither life, nor death, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any created thing, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." No apostle to cry, "Unto Him that loved us and loosed us from our sins by His own blood, and has made us kings and priests unto God and His Father."

No Christ? Then no Christmas in the calendar of the world, no Christmas bells awakening echoes of pity and tenderness and unselfishness in the hearts of men. No Christ? Then no Christian churches calling men from the depths to the higher things of life. No Christ? Then no Christian homes radiating kindliness and love. Jean Paul Richter pictures the meaning of all that in his dream of the children coming into the church and sobbing out their sorrow because there is no Christ and no Christmas and all alike are orphans.

If He had not come what kind of a world would this be? It would be the kind of world to which Christ came—a world without heart. It is difficult to set oneself back into the years before He came and picture the darkness and the gloom that had settled down upon the world.

On that hard pagan world disgust
  And secret loathing fell;
Deep weariness and sated lust
  Made human life a hell.
In his cool hall, with haggard eyes,
  The Roman noble lay;
He drove abroad in furious guise
  Along the Appian Way;
He made a feast, drunk fierce and fast,
  And crowned his hair with flowers—
No easier nor quicker passed
  The impracticable hours.

In Christ's day children in the Roman world were a Father's chattles and often less esteemed than his cattle. It was within the right of a father to decide whether a new-born infant should live or die. The child was laid at his feet. If he "took it up"—that was the legal phrase—the child lived. If he let it lie, the child might be thrown out to die of exposure or to be devoured by dogs or wild beasts.

When Christ came woman was little more than a toy. When the civilizations of Greece and Rome were at their most dazzling periods women were little esteemed. They were considered to be inferior beings. Husbands could dismiss and divorce their wives at will. If Christ had not come there would have been no rights of the woman or the child.

In Christ's day few cared for the poor or lifted hands of help for the orphaned or the sick. No Christ? Then no hospitals for the sick, no orphanages for the children, no asylums for the insane, no homes for the aged. It would still be a heartless world.

If he had not come it would be a world without hope. No Christ? Then no heavenly hope. And "if in this life only we have hope, we are of all men most miserable." Christmas day has been well called "the birthday of hope." "Man is born to trouble as the sparks fly upward." No man can escape. "Genius has sought out many inventions, discovered many secrets, but genius has never built a roof nor a door that can shut out trouble."

Soon or late death robs us of our loved ones. Old Mortality in Sir Walter Scott's story went through the graveyards chiselling out into clearer letters the inscriptions on the tomb-stones which were being dimmed by time and weather. But if there were no Christ we should have to chisel out the words of hope and comfort that are written there, which tell of little children being gathered into the arms of the Saviour, and the prospect of meeting again those loved long since and lost awhile, and the lines which speak of the resurrection of Jesus. No Christ? Then no hope in looking out into the beyond—nothing but black, starless night.

The pagan idea of death is a hooded figure, black, forbidding, who sits yonder at the turn of the way, waiting for each one of us we know not when nor where. Christ altered the aspect of death. He changed the hooded horror into an angel of deliverance. He changed the graveway into a gateway. He put a door in the wall of silence. He changed the departure into an arrival. He changed the "good-bye" into a "good-morning."

Think of sorrow without Christ. An artist once drew a picture of a wintry twilight—the trees heavily laden with snow, and a dreary, dark house, desolate in the midst of the storm. It was a sad picture. Then with a quick stroke of yellow crayon he put a light in one window. The effect was magical. The entire scene was transformed into a vision of comfort and cheer. The coming of Christ was just such a light in a dark world.

And then if he had not come it would be a world without help. No Christ? Then no redeemer. The inner history of the Church of Christ is just the story of the redemption of men from the bondage of sin. Do you want to see a miracle? Let me light a match. Is not that a miracle? I take a dead stick and by a touch transform it into a living, flaming, illuminating candle of the Lord. That sort of things has happened every day during these nineteen centuries. Christ quickens the dead. He sets them free from the law of sin and death, and sends them out to be living lamps, that help to brighten the world.

No Christ and no cross of redeeming love? Then no songs like "Rock of Ages cleft for me." "There is a fountain filled with blood," "My faith looks up to thee, thou Lamb of Calvary." No Christ? Then no other refuge to cling to, no other hope for a world gone astray. It would mean a lost world, without heart, without hope, without help.

There is a strange old legend of a world that grew colorless in a single night. The clouds became lifeless vapors. The waves turned pale and motionless. Light fled from the diamond and beauty from every gem. Those who dwell in the world were saddened and bewildered by the change, and never ceased to mourn for the beautiful tints of flowers and grasses and vanished hues of sunrise and sunset. All nature was in mourning and wore a leaden-colored robe. Nevermore should jewels sparkle nor dewdrops glisten like silver in the morning light. Nevermore should there be a rainbow on the cloud. The expanse of lake or ocean should nevermore reflect a heaven of blue. The world had passed into the darkness of night. The old legend is a parable. It is a picture of the world without Christ.

"If I had not come." Incredible and terrible thought! Then I open the gospels and turn to such words as these: "The Son of man is come to seek and to save that which is lost," "I am come that they might have life and have it abundantly," "This is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptation that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners."

He did come. I hear the chiming of Christmas bells. He has come and, thanks be unto God, He is still here. "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end."

Joy to the world, the Lord has come,
  Let earth receive her King.
Let every heart prepare Him room
  And heaven and nature sing.

It is well that we date our calendar from the coming of Jesus to this world. God grant that many may date their spiritual calendar from this Christmas season, this so great and meaningful season, this season in which looking into the abyss of a world without Christ, we cry:

I could not do without Thee,
  O Saviour of the lost,
Whose precious blood redeemed me
  At such tremendous cost;
Thy righteousness, Thy pardon,
  Thy precious blood must be
My only hope and comfort,
  My glory and my plea.

Out of the tumult;
  Out of the strife;
Out of the glare
  And glamor of life.
Out of the sorrow,

THE FAITH OF CHRIST'S FREEMEN.

Our faith is not in dead saints' bones,
In altars of vain sacrifice;
Nor is it in the stately stones
That rise in beauty toward the skies.

Our faith is in the Christ who walks
With men today, in street and mart;
The constant Friend who thinks and talks
With those who seek him with the heart.

We would not spurn the ancient lore,
The prophet's word or psalmist's prayer;
But lo! our Leader goes before,
Tomorrow's battles to prepare.

His Gospel calls for living men,
With singing blood and minds alert;
Strong men, who fall to rise again,
Who strive and bleed, with courage girt.

We serve no God whose work is done,
Who rests within His firmament:
Our God, His labors but begun,
Toils evermore, with power unspent.

God was and is and e'er shall be:
Christ lived and loved—and loves us still;
And man goes forward, proud and free,
God's present purpose to fulfill.

How the Mexicans Catch Wild Ducks.

George Morgan Knight, Jr.

(A True Story.)

"Please, Grandpa," begged Milly Allen, his little granddaughter, "tell me just a short story tonight before Mama puts me to bed. Just a wee tiny one."

Old Captain Winters, smoking his pipe before the smoulding logs, that heated the old colonial home, puffed in silence a few moments while the child sat in his lap.

It was the time of evening that a story was generally told and he had most exhausted his supply, for Captain Winters had told a new one each night for ever so long. But the little grandchild must not be disappointed, yet he could not for the moment thing of a story.

Suddenly off in the distance was a sound. A call of the wild, he thought, but what could it be? And then as the sound grew nearer he recognized it. Now, it could be heard more distinctly and the hunk! hunk! hunk! he realized was the call of a flock of wild geese flying northward again for spring.

And then a story came to his mind.

"Here is a short one, Milly," he smiled at the little blue wistful eyed child anxiously looking up into his old face, "and it is about ducks."

"Oh, those darling fluffy ones that soon mama will have hatching?"

"Yes."

Taking several puffs on his pipe and listening once again for the echo of the passing geese, he began: "'Way down in Mexico on the Gulf, there live great quantities of wild fowl and the natives catch them to eat in a most peculiar way.

"Scouping out the inside of a pumpkin, like you do at Thanksgiving time to make a "jack o' lantern, they make two holes for eyes and in the bottom one for their head. Putting this over their head, the natives swim out among the wild ducks feeding on the water along the marshy coast land until the ducks get use to this thing and do not bother to look up or notice this yellow fruit.

"Then it is that the native hunter swimming amidst a flock of fat, feeding ducks quickly reaches up and pulls a duck by its feet under the water very silently. In this way they are able to get a great many without frightening the ducks.

"And that idea started the American hunters to thinking, and they now build duck blinds with decoy ducks floating outside the blinds that attract the wild ducks overhead and entice them into the gun range," he concluded, and began to draw on his pipe.

"Thank you lots, grandpa," Milly said, kissing him good-night as she saw her mother standing in the door with the lamp. "I'm 'ready for bed, mama."

Getting off her grandpa's lap, she went off to bed and planned the next morning to see if she could not make a head dress so she might help her father catch wild ducks like the Mexican natives did and he might be persuaded to take her along to try it out.

Three Little Mite Boxes.

I could begin in the old way which can never be improved: "Once upon a time," but if I do, I must add that it really happened a very short time ago. And the three children who are the real heroes and heroine of the story are going to Mission Band regularly—perhaps to the very Mission Band you attend. So I would advise you to look well around you and say to yourself, "If they are not in my Mission Band somebody like them ought to be and that somebody might be myself."

The three little mite boxes went to live in the home of three children. When the leader gave them and others out in the meeting, she said to all the children, "Bring back the boxes in the fall, and each of you try to have a dollar in it." But if she had said, "Fill it with gold", it would have seemed just as likely to these three children. They took them home with gladness, nevertheless, and placed them on a shelf in the kitchen, where they spent a great part of their time.

Now the father and mother were very poor. You know how many fairy stories begin this way. Really they did not have enough to give the children all the food they needed, and as tor their stockings and shoes, the toes would peep out of the holes in them long before it was time to have a new pair. The house was a pretty poor house, too, with the wind whistling through the cracks of it in the winter weather. But they were far from unhappy, remember. They were very jolly little souls, and although they never, never expected to have a cent to put in the three little mite boxes, they always woke up in the morning believing that something might happen.

Now, the first thing that did happen was quite magical, as you will hear. Somebody—and you knew it is much better not to know a fairy too well!—sent each of the children a small parcel of clothes, not new clothes, but good and warm, and most welcome. And when they opened them up, right in the middle was a five-cent piece and a bar of chocolate! Of course, if you have five cents every day and a bar of chocolate whenever you want—but I hope you don't!—then you can never know how wonderful this bundle was to these three. The smallest boy got his first, because, as he did not go to school, he was at home when it came. He bit a corner of the chocolate bar and danced around crying, "My mite box! My mite box!". His mother handed it to him and in went the five-cent-piece!

Presently Jessie came home. She is twelve, so she did not make quite so much noise when she found her five cents, but you would have been glad if you had seen the happy way she caught up the little mite box—and in went the five-cent-piece!

And then Bernard ran in from school, and it did not take him long, I can tell you, to tear open his bundle of clothes. He gave a shout of delight, and with a bound he was at the shelf, and the next moment—in went the five-cent-piece!

But really the best of the story is to come. You remember the teacher said a dollar. And although it was delightful to take up the little mite boxes and shake them to hear the rattle inside, that did not make the money grow.

Something would have to be done. The summer was already here and berry-picking time. Jessie had always worked hard at that season to help to support the family, but when she thought of the mite box she worked harder than ever and handed her mother twelve dollars.

"I will give you the tenth, Jessie," said her mother, and you can imagine what a happy girl she was when she shook the dollar in the little mite box that night!

Bernard thought over some plan for a time. His father, who was a farmer, took milk to a number of families in the neighborhood, and Bernard begged him to be allowed to help.

"You will have to get up at daylight," said his father, "but if you want to you can have a dollar." I need not tell you that Bernard's dollar, too, found its way into the little mite box.

As for dear little Tom, I am sure that you will be glad to hear that a friend heard how much he wanted to fill his mite box, and so she sent him a dollar! And in it went, too.

I wonder if you think that is the end of the story? Not a bit of it! It is really only the beginning. But I cannot tell you the rest. Wouldn't you love to know where these dollars went, by train or steamboat, far away to our own north country or far across the seas? Ask your mothers to tell you.—The Missionary Monthly.

Why Mr. Horse and Mrs. Giraffe Are Enemies.

Long, long ago Mrs. Giraffe and Mr. Horse were fast friends. But Mr. Horse became so boastful about his fast running that Mrs. Giraffe grew weary of hearing his boast.

"I can run faster than any other animal," Mr. Horse told Mrs. Giraffe.

"You cannot run faster than I," challenged Mrs. Giraffe.

"Ho, ho, haw, haw," laughed Mr. Horse. "I can run much, much faster!"

At this Mrs. Giraffe became very, very angry and pulled out a long hair from Mr. Horse's mane and two from his tail and swallowed them, no easy feat, as they were several feet long.

"Well, friends," Mr. Camel spoke up, "suppose tomorrow at nine o'clock you run a race, and that will settle this argument."

"Very well," Mrs. Giraffe agreed, "we shall run a race, and we shall see what we shall see."

"I will win this race by several miles," Mr. Horse boasted.

At this remark Mrs. Giraffe sat back on a big rock and laughed till the tears ran down her long neck.

"Look here, old 'Spotted Face'," Mr. Horse scolded, "you laugh too soon."

The next morning at exactly nine o'clock Mr. Camel, Mrs. Giraffe, Mr. Horse and many of their friends met for the race.

When Mr. Camel said "Go!" Mr. Horse and Mrs. Giraffe started. They were both very swift. Mrs. Giraffe always gained, however, when they came to broken ground and rocks, as she could hop over these like a huge frog. When she was ahead she would turn her long neck and laugh and laugh and laugh at Mr. Horse.

This made Mr. Horse angry and he would run afster than ever.

Toward the end of the race there was much yelling and cheering for the two runners.

Faster, faster, faster they came! All the animals were wondering who would win.

They had almost reached their goal! The animals were pushing to get a good view of the best part of the race. Mr. Horse was running as fast as a horse ever ran since the world began, and Mrs. Giraffe was leaping as she had never leaped before.

They came faster, faster, faster! But my, my, my, neither one was ahead! They were side by side. The animals were very much worried.

"It will be a great disappointment to all of us," Mr. Camel said, "we want a winner."

Faster, faster, faster came Mr. Horse and Mrs. Giraffe! At last they reached the goal, but they were still side by side. Neither had won.

Mr. Camel was ready to call the race a tie when Mrs. Giraffe craned her long neck as far as she could and stuck out her long tongue.

Mrs. Giraffe's friends yelled and shouted with glee. Mrs. Giraffe had won.

But ever since then Mrs. Giraffe and Mr. Horse have been bitter enemies.—Pittsburgh Christian Advocate.

Be Yourself.

Vera Mason was a dear little girl with sweet, dainty ways. All the children were glad when she came to live with her grandmother in the big white house. Madge Brown thought that Vera was a beautiful child, and she wanted to be exactly like Vera. Some people thought that Madge was as sweet in her way as Vera was in hers, but Madge didn't think so.

One day the children recited poems that they had learned. Madge tried to say hers just like Vera, and it sounded so funny that the boys and girls laughed aloud.

Madge cried when she went home.

Mother stroked the smooth brown head while she told Madge an old, old story of a bird that despised his own gift of song and tried to sing the way another bird did. He only spoiled his voice and forgot his own song.

"God does not give all the birds and flowers the same colors. He makes the maple tree different from the elm and the pine, and each tree has its own place to fill. God knows that this world would be far less pleasant if all the trees and flowers and birds and girls looked exactly alike. Isn't it better to have Vera and Lois and Ruth and Madge, instead of just one kind of girl, like paper dolls that you cut a half dozen at a time?"—Mary S. Stover, in The Sunbeam.

THE PACKAGE OF SEEDS.

I paid a dime for a package of seeds
And the clerk tossed them out with a flip,
"We've got 'em assorted for every man's needs,"
He said with a smile on his lip,
"Pansies and popies and asters and peas!
Ten cents a package! and pick as you please!"

Now seeds are just dimes to the man in the store,
And the dimes are the things that he needs;
And I've been to buy them in seasons before,
But have thought of them merely as seeds;
But it flashed through my mind as I took them this time,
"You have purchased a miracle here for a dime!"

"You've a dime's worth of power which no man can create,
You've a dime's worth of life in your hand!
You've a dime's worth of mystery, destiny, fate,
Which the wisest cannot understand.
In this bright little package, now isn't it odd?
You've a dime's worth of something known only to God!"

These are seeds, but the plants and the blossoms are here
With their petals of various hues:
In these little pellets, so dry and so queer,
There is power which no chemist can fuse.
Here is one of God's miracles soon to unfold,
Thus for ten cents an ounce is Divinity sold!

Dicky Gets Lost.

Dicky is a handsome yellow canary who lives in a cage at Aunt Annie's house, where Allison visits every summer. Being a clever bird and very much petted he often gets into mischief and has learned a number of amusing tricks. One day he got lost. Yes, really lost. It was in the morning while he was out flying around the room when Aunt Annie was cleaning his cage. Twice they had not been able to find him. Once when he hid in Aunt Annie's work basket on a high shelf and discovered himself to them later by singing to greet a friend of Aunt Annie's whom he loved when she came in. The other time he had got out an open gap in the window screen and perched on a big King-of-the-Yellow dahlia where canary and flower were so like in color that it was only after he "tweed-ed" at them several times that they found him.

Now, both those times Aunt Annie and Allison had thought him lost and had done all the looking, but this time it was different. Dicky was somewhere he didn't like and looking for a way out. He couldn't find it, oh, dear!

Guess where it was? In the big Chinese vase on the bookcase. Wasn't that a funny place? Let me tell you how he happened to go there. In the first place the big Chinese vase was new and anything new interested Dicky. And, for another thing, it had a lump of sugar in the bottom. Yes, a lump of white sugar. He was perching on the rim and looking down when he saw it quite plainly. Aunt Annie had had some ladies in to tea the afternoon before. They had been walking around carrying their cups of tea and looking at some new water colors on the walls and some lady with sugar in her saucer must have dropped it when she was looking at the one over the bookcase.

"Sugar," thought Dicky. "Isn't that nice?" So he flew down into the big jar. How good it was! Usually he had sugar only on Sundays and he was fond of it. One day when Aunt Annie had laid his cube down while she got his cage ready he had flown over and eaten a good bit of it before she turned and found him. He pecked at this piece with his sharp little bill. But one can eat only so much of sweet things after all. Soon he had enough and wanted to fly out.

There he was though! He could not fly round and round. The neck of the jar was too narrow for outspread wings. Getting in was easy but getting out—he began to think he never would. He fluttered and beat his wings. He hopped up and down.

Aunt Annie came into the room with his eage and could not see him anywhere. "Dicky is gone again," said she. "Allison, come and help me find him."

"He's only playing hide-and-seek like he often does!" laughed Allison, looking around the room at the canary's perching places and then beginning to search among the books and behind the ornaments on the mantel where the little bird liked to go when he wished to keep out of sight.

But he wasn't playing after all. Where could he be? There simply wasn't a single other place to look, yet he had vanished. Then Allison stepped near and caught the beat of the tiny wings in the big jar and the muffled "cheep, cheep!" that told of a Dicky in trouble. He ran over and peeped in.

"I've found him!"

"He won't go there again," said Aunt Annie, smiling at the crest-fallen bird, "because this time the joke's on him."

Now, nearly all birds do not like being caught or held in the hand and Dicky didn't either, but this time he was very glad to see Allison's chubby fingers coming down inside the jar and he let himself be captured easily. A moment later he was out and had flown back to his cake, a sober and thankful bird.—Presbyterian.

Not Bothered by Heat.

"Whew!" puffed the fire, blazing and roaring up the chimney. "Again and again I have tried to burn this queer looking piece of cloth that Betty tossed in here over an hour ago."

"Why waste all that heat," said the queer looking cloth. "Heat does not bother me in the least. The hotter you get the more I enjoy it."

"Who are you and where did you come from?" cackled the fire, sinking to a soft glow. "I thought you were a piece of cloth."

"My name is asbestos, I really am a mineral, for I was found in the earth and must be mined or dug out much as stone is quarried."

"You certainly do not look like you had been dug out of earth," snapped the fire, "and you are the first thing I have ever seen that would not burn when my hot blaze was upon them."

"No, I will not burn," said the asbestos, "neither will I rust, nor decay, as so many minerals do, as you can readily see that I am very valuable. Especially against heat of all kinds.

"Were you always like you are now?" queried the fire.

"No, when I was first found I was quite heavy; but I contained a fibre as soft and delicate as thistledown."

"Well," blazed the fire. "How did you get this way?"

"I was first placed in what is known as a 'chaser.' This crushed me, separating the rocky, crystalline part, leaving a mass of snowy-white stuff that is sometimes called 'mineral wool'."

"Then what?" snapped the fire when the asbestos paused.

"Then I was put through a process known as winnowing. A strong blast of air separated and blew away the bits of rock which were still clinging to the soft wool. Another current of air gently raised the fibres which settled according to texture and weight, so that the finer ones were left on top. Next a machine straightens the fibres and lays them parallel. These fibres are next spun into a sort of yarn providing they are to be used for asbestos cloth."

"Ho! are you good for more than one particular thing!" roared the fire.

"Oh, yes," answered the asbestos. "There are many uses for my cloth. People use me for protecting their fine tables from hot dishes. In large theatres the heavy curtains are made of asbestos to protect the people from your hot flames. For as you have found out by now, heat does not bother me in the least."

The fire blazed and crackled loudly.

"Some of my cheaper grades of cloth are made up into fibre-board," continued the cloth. "This is used for roofs, for inner floors, and for walls. Another protection against your flames. Then I am used for wrapping furnace pipes to preserve your heat. When I am wrapped around these pipes your warm breath cannot escape so easily.

5218 Happy People Give up Their Secret

JUST suppose you could get 5000 joyously happy people together in one big hall and could ask them what made them all so full of pep. Suppose, strangely enough, that all of them had discovered the same way to be happy. You would feel that here, if anywhere in the world, was the secret of how to get joy out of life.

This is just what has happened during the last few weeks. We knew there were millions of people who had found the secret of happiness in the same way, and we asked them in one or two small announcements in the magazines and newspapers to tell us their story. Letters came to us from practically all over the globe.

All of them said "The secret of happiness is health."

How to get this health? The way that all of these people had discovered was not some magic medicine, not some powerful drug, not some difficult course of training—but only a simple, harmless, natural method. It was to keep the body internally clean, sweeping its natural poisons away each day, regularly as clock work—by the use of Nujol.

These people had made a great discovery. They had found out that Nujol contains no drugs; that it is as tasteless and colorless as pure water; pleasant to take and forms no habit; that it cannot hurt you, no matter how much you take; that it is non-fattening; not absorbed by the body; that it is only the internal lubrication your body needs, just like any other machine.

They have found the way to Buoyant, Zestful Health, and the Joy that goes with it

It sounds like a fairy tale, doesn't it, to be well and happy so easily? Well, all you need to do to find out if these people have made a real discovery is to get a bottle of Nujol today at any drug store and take it for two weeks. It costs but a few cents and it makes you feel like a million dollars. The sure way to happiness is through health.

Firemen have suits made of my cloth—even aprons are made of me—for people that handle explosive chemicals."

"Say, you are wonderful!" crackled the fire. "What else are you good for?"

"I am used in making shoe soles," answered the asbestos proudly. "And also for an automobile break. I am also mixed with cement for use in safes, filing-cabinets, and booths for moving-picture machines."

"Funny I have never seen any of your remarkable cloth before," blazed the fire.

"Man has known me for a long time," answered the asbestos. "The Greeks probably knew about me long ago, as my name comes from one of their words meaning unburnable."

"Well, you may be a good thing for human beings," snapped the fire, "but it makes me hot when I cannot burn things that are thrown into my blaze," and it roared up the chimney, but the asbestos lay just as it had been thrown there, cool and unscorched.—The Presbyterian.

Disciples in Truth.

A great artist was once wandering in the mountains of Switzerland when some officials met him and demanded a passport. "I do not have it with me," he replied, "but my name is Dore." "Prove it, if you are," replied the officers, knowing who Dore was, but not believing that this was he. Taking a piece of paper, the artist hastily sketched a group of peasants who were standing near and did it with such grace and skill that the officials exclaimed, "Enough, you are Dore!"

TO BREAK A HABIT.

"How shall I a habit break?
As you did that habit make.
As you gathered you must lose;
As you yielded, now refuse.
Thread by thread the strands we twist,
Till they bind us, neck and wrist;
Thread by thread the patient hand
Must untwine, ere free we stand;
As we builded, stone by stone,
We must toil unhelped, alone,
Till the wall is overthrown.

—Selected.

"They on the heights are not the souls
Who never erred nor went astray;
Who trod unswerving toward their goals
Along a smooth, rose-bordered way.
Nay—those who stand, where first comes dawn,
Are those who stumbled but went on."

Not for the eyes of men
May this day's work be done,
But unto Thee, O God,
That, with the setting sun,
My heart may know the matchless prize
Of sure approval in Thine eyes.

MRS. ANNA MACON CLARKE.

MRS. ANNA MACON CLARKE departed this life January 31, in her ninety-first year. Mrs. Clark was born at "Tufton," the ancestral home of her parents, Col. Thomas Macon and Mrs. Virgilia Savage Macon. Col. Macon held the first Sunday school ever held in Charlottesville, Va. He himself was an Episcopalian, but this joint service was for all denominations and was held in the courthouse. None of the present church edifices were then in existence. Mrs. Clark is survived by two daughters, Mrs. J. Anderson Chisholm and Mrs. Thomas Fawcus, both of the University of Virginia. Three grandchildren and two great-grandchildren also survive, as well as one sister, Miss Julia Macon, the last surviving member of this old and distinguished family. Mrs. Clark was for many years a faithful communicant of the church, and a devoted worker at St. Luke's Chapel, Simeon, Va.

"I have fought the good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness." L.

COLONEL JOHN HETH FINNEY.

Lay Evangelist.

The Diocese of Washington as well as St. Paul's Parish and Washington Cathedral, lost a valued friend and lay worker in the sudden passing of COLONEL JOHN HETH FINNEY on January 29.

Colonel Finney had a unique record of lay service in the Church. He was regarded as one of the most consecrated laymen of the Diocese of Washington and gave himself unstintingly to its service. He literally wore himself out in the service of the Master, finding no task too difficulty when it meant the Church would be benefited thereby in some way.

Not content with the opportunity to serve afforded him at St. Paul's Church, where he was vestryman for more than twenty years, Colonel Finney became active in the Laymen's Service Association of the Diocese of Washington and in the Brotherhood of St. Andrew. Possessed of a beautiful singing and speaking voice, Colonel Finney was an active lay reader and devoted many Sundays when he should have been at rest to conducting services and making addresses in rural parishes in the Diocese where Divine services could not otherwise have been held. He loved the Church with a burning zeal and was well versed in its history and traditions.

Of fervent missionary spirit devoted to the ideal of personal evangelism, Colonel Finney was deeply interested in the Bishops' Crusade in February, 1927, and was associated with the late Right Reverend Charles Palmerston Anderson, Bishop of Chicago, and Dr. Whitaker, of Memphis, in this work. His efforts in the Crusade in the vicinity of Omaha, Nebraska, received commendation on all sides.

For many years Colonel Finney had been interested in the development of Washington Cathedral and this interest crystallized finally in an active association with the Cathedral staff in the capacity of Curator. He was first attached to the Cathedral in assisting in the plans for the General Convention in the summer of 1928, then became Curator and assistant to the Business Manager of The Cathedral Age.

His Cathedral service was a great joy to him. He loved people and had a genial manner which won many friends for the Cathedral during his regime as Curator. It was a real joy for him to stand in front of the Cathedral model and tell pilgrims how the Cathedral will witness to the Kingdom of Christ.

During the last weeks of his life, although he insisted on putting in his full meed of time, he sometimes spoke of being greatly "tired." His pluck and determination kept him from checking his endeavors, and he died, in harness, as his friends believe he would have wished to go.

On January 28, he put in a full day's work at the Cathedral, was cheerful and happy; bade his associates farewell, and went home. That night he was seized with a heart attack and died shortly before dawn the next morning. When the news flashed through the diocese of his passing, there was general grief. Touching tributes were paid to his memory by persons whose lives he had influenced for good and from all quarters came condolences to his sorrowing family.

On January 31, the office for the Burial of the Dead was read for him in St. Paul's Church, where he had long been one of the pillars of that venerable shrine. The Right Reverend James E. Freeman, contrary to usual practice, gave an eloquent and appealing eulogy to his departed friend and co-worker. Colonel Finney was buried with full military honors in Arlington Cemetery.

His personal life was as full of interest as his churchly career. He was born in Amelia County, Virginia, October 10, 1865, son of Lewis Harvie and Minna Booker Finney, of Powhatan and Amelia Counties. His boyhood was spent in Powhatan and he was educated by private tutors.

Colonel Finney began his business career in Richmond, Virginia, and was connected with Crocker-Wheeler Company, the Westinghouse and General Electric Companies as an electrical engineer. Colonel Finney was with the Aluminum Company of America for twenty-five years, and was its manager of southern territory with offices in Washington.

For more than twenty years he was a member of the American Institute of Electrical Engineers, serving a term as vice-president and as a member of the Board of Directors. He was also a member of the Society of American Military Engineers and on the Executive Board of the American Engineering Council.

Colonel Finney had an enviable World War record. He served as Major with the One Hundred and Fifth Regiment of Engineers, Thirtieth Division, and was sent overseas on a special mission by the Joint Army-Navy Airship Board. On his return home he was stationed at Fort Humphries with the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel. At the time of the signing of the Armistice, Colonel Finney was a student at the Army War College. Greatly interested in the welfare of the veterans, Colonel Finney was a member and past commander of the A. P. Gardner Post of the American Legion.

At the recent fourth annual fellowship dinner in honor of the Bishop of Washington, five hundred laymen stood in silent prayer in tribute to Colonel Finney and Commander C. T. Jewell who had entered Life Eternal since the previous dinner.

WATKINS: In loving memory of my mother, MRS. GEORGE F. WATKINS, who died March 12, 1922:

You have gone to a land where the hawthorne blooms,
In white ecstacy the whole year through.
The blossoms are whiter than ever before,
They reflect the soul of you.
Take your rest beneath the hawthorne tree;
Wait, oh! beloved, wait for me.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

Director of Religious Education, taking a text from St. Luke 2:52, made an address on "The Christian Quest. Youth and Jesus. The Way of Life." He was followed by four young members of Christ Church, Roanoke, who made remarkably effective addresses on the proper attitude of Christian young people fro four points of view: the divisions being taken as follows: Physical, Mr. Pete Cohen; Mental, Miss Juliet Arnold; Social, Miss Dorothy Smythe, and Religious, Mr. Charles H. Gibboney.

The conference then separated into four groups in which discussions on the same subjects were led, respectively, by Mr. Glenn Jackson, assistant to the rector of St. John's Church, Lynchburg;

Mrs. R. H. Reeves, one of the Councillors of the Young People's Service League of St. John's Church, Roanoke; Miss Janet Botts, a teacher in the Roanoke Schools, and the Rev. Richard S. Martin, rector of Christ Church at Blacksburg.

The remainder of the conference was devoted to addresses to two distinct groups. Mr. Garrison spoke to councillors, officers, Church school teachers and rectors, on "Organization—Planning Programs. Where to Get Material and How to Use It." The Rev. Devall L. Gwathmey of St. John's at Wytheville spoke to the young people who are not officers, on "Material and Methods for Worship."

A service for the entire membership was then held in the church and the Rev. Carleton Barnwell of St. Paul's Church, Lynchburg, preached a most fitting sermon from the text, "I am the Way, the Truth and the Life." This was followed by luncheon in the parish house and adjournment and the making of a group picture in front of the parish house.

The success of the conference was largely due to the planning of the Rev. Richard H. Baker of Waynesboro, and Mr. Garrison. Mr. Baker, who is chairman of a committee of the Diocesan Department of Religious Education, had given a great deal of thought to the arrangement of the conference and, after all, on account of being taken sick at this particular time, was unable to be present. As a token of its gratitude and affection the conference voted to send him a box of flowers.

During the conference Mr. Garrison called special attention to the Virginia Summer Conference of Religious Education, to be held at Sweet Briar College from June 16-27, next, described the plans that are being made and urged a large attendance from as many parishes in the diocese as can find it possible to send representatives.

LOUISIANA.

Student Pastor.

The Rev. Joseph S. Ditchburn, rector of St. James' Church, Brightmoor, Mich., has accepted the position of Student Pastor of the Episcopal Student Center, Louisiana State University, Baton Rouge, and enters upon his duties April 1. The Student Center has only recently been established, a new building having just been completed and which will be dedicated March 11. Mr. Ditchburn will thus be the first Student Pastor at the University, and will have complete charge of the work among the students. He was for several years assistant rector of St. Paul's Church, New Orleans, and was President of the Diocesan Board of the Young People's Service League. The Student Center is particularly fortunate in securing one so ably fitted to become its pastor.

Annual Council, March 11-13.

The ninety-second annual session, Council of the Diocese of Louisiana, will be held in St. James' Church, Baton Rouge, March 11-13, 1930. Service of Dedication of the Episcopal Student Center, Louisiana State University, will be held at 8 P. M., March 11, the Rt. Rev. Theodore DuB. Bratton, D. D., Bishop of Mississippi, presiding. The Council will open with a celebration of the Holy Communion at 10 A. M., March 12, the Rt. Rev. Lewis W. Burton, D. D., being the celebrant, and the sermon will be preached by the Rt. Rev. Theodore DuB. Bratton, D. D. The most important business of the council will be the election of a Bishop to succeed the late Rt. Rev. Davis Sessums, D. D.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., Bishop

For Russian Sufferers.

Constitution Hall, Washington, was the scene, Sunday afternoon of a most unusual and significant meeting. The purpose was to show sympathy for all subjected to religious persecution in Russia.

The presence of clergymen from the several different religious affiliations and the appearance of the names of a Jewish Rabbi, a Roman Catholic priest, an Episcopal Bishop, a Presbyterian minister and a Methodist minister on the program, witnessed to a remarkable state of Christian brotherhood, if not unity. The program sheet contained the following statement by way of explanation:

"This meeting is held in Constitution Hall, Washington, D. C., through the courtesy of the Daughters of the American Revolution. Its purpose is entirely non-political, being to give expression to the deep sympathy of men and women of all creeds in the United States for those of their brethren in Russia who are suffering persecution for their religious convictions, and are being deprived of the right to worship God and according to the dictates of conscience."

Bishop Freeman, as presiding officer, held together the great audience for the great cause which had brought them there. Rabbi Simon, in his reading of the Sixty-second Chapter of Isaiah, brought his listeners to almost perfect attention. The invocation by the Rev. Joseph R. Sizoo, D. D., and the concluding prayer by the Rev. Frederick C. Reynolds, D. D., seemed to crystallize the feelings and thoughts of all, for those suffering in Russia with a definite act of prayer by each individual. Hymns were sung by the entire number assembled.

The truly great address, delivered by the Rev. Edmund A. Walsh, Ph. D., Vice-President of Georgetown University and Director General of the Papal Relief Mission to Russia (1922), brought new knowledge of the unspeakable sufferings of all those who are trying to hold on to any kind of religion in Russia.

Speaking as a scholar and with authority, Dr. Walsh drove home to his hearers a picture of conditions there, hardly imagined by the majority of people in this country. In closing he announced that the Church of his calling would send up a great "Misere" all over this country on March 19 for all sufferers from religious persecution of any kind and asked that in some way all Christian people remember the stricken religionists in Russia.

MASSACHUSETTS.

Rt. Rev. C. L. Slattery, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. S. G. Babcock, D. D., Suffragan Bishop.

The Massachusetts City Mission is a hundred years old. Its history, told concisely by the superintendent, the Rev. E. J. Dennen, in The (Mass.) Church Militant for December, makes an entertaining story. The Rev. Asa Eaton, rector of, Old North Church in 1829 brought together the group who began the society, which now has a wide and increasing work.

The Parish Records for 1929 of Grace Church, Everett, Massachusetts, show that there were forty-eight baptisms, seventy confirmations, fourteen marriages, and thirty-four funerals, at which the rector, the Rev. William Henry Pettus, officiated.

Personal Notes

The Rev. F. Poole Johnson of New York City, arrived at St. Mary's, Ga., Quinquagesima Sunday to take charge of the Camden County Missions for the Rev. Charles H. Lee, D. D., Vicar, until after Easter. This allows Dr. Lee, rector of Christ Church, St. Simons Island, Georgia, to give full time to his congregation and gives the congregations of his Missions the benefit of Lenten services.

The Rt. Rev. Walter H. Overs, D. D., has accepted the rectorship of Grace Church, Hastings-on-the-Hudson, Diocese of New York, formally taking charge of the parish on Septuagesima Sunday.

The Rev. S. Whitney Hale, recently the head of our Allegany County Associate Missions with headquarters at Belmont, is now in residence at Wilson, North Carolina, having become the rector of St. Timothy's Church in that city. Address accordingly.

The Rev. John G. Scott, D. D., minister-in-charge of Varina Parish, Richmond, Virginia, is in the hospital as a result of severe injuries received when he was knocked down by an automobile Sunday morning, March 9. It is reported that he is suffering greatly with a fractured skull, broken ribs and broken shoulder, but that he will recover.

ORDINATIONS.

The Rev. Charles J. Alleyn, for many years lay-reader and treasurer of Grace Church, Sheffield, Ala., was ordained deacon in that Church on Septuagesima Sunday by Bishop McDowell. The candidate was presented by the Ven. V. G. Lowery; the Rev. Lucien Malone, of Florence, Ala., read the Litany. The sermon was preached by the rector of the parish, the Rev. W. F. Moses. Mr. Alleyn expects for the present to continue his business relationships, while assisting in the missionary work of the parish.

Alvin Lamar Wills was ordained deacon at Christ Church Cathedral, Lexington, Kentucky, on Sunday, March 2, 1930, by the Bishop of Lexington, the Rt. Rev. H. P. Almon Abbott, D. D. The Ven. James D. Gibson presented the candidate and preached the sermon. The Litany was said by the Acting Dean of the Cathedral, the Rev. Charles E. Craik, Jr. The Rev. Alvin Lamar Wills has come into our ministry from the active ministry of the Christian Church, having been until recently pastor of the Christian Church in Covington, Kentucky. March 3, the Rev. Mr. Wills left for Washington, D. C., where he is to serve as assistant at the Church of the Epiphany, under the Rev. Z. B. T. Phillips, D. D.

THE CHURCH AND POLITICS

Address of RT. REV. JAMES E. FREEMAN, D. D., Bishop of Washington,
At the Tri-ennial Convention

It will certainly not be deemed untimely for me to speak specifically and definitely concerning another matter that is not wholly unrelated to that which unity suggests. Within the past year our nation has passed through a recurring presidential campaign and election. In some respects it was marked by certain new and unappealing aspects that deserve our serious attention. For the first time in our history there was injected into the discussions of the campaign a religious issue. That men have the right to hold independent views as to the relative merits and value of certain outstanding Christian communions is widely and generally accepted. That they should, in this enlightened age, bring them to bear upon questions that concern the State and Nation is certainly a matter about which right-minded men can have but one opinion. The founders of the Republic made clear the distinction between Church and State. They wisely recognized the proper functions of these respective institutions. The State should not trench upon the prerogatives of the church, nor should the church seek to intrude upon the political concerns of the State. They readily foresaw that the two were separate and distinct entities, and as such were entitled to independence of action and freedom from interference. The long story of bitter conflict which history records led these early builders of the Republic to recognize the unwisdom and danger of any confusion of issues between the two bodies. This principle has been carefully preserved and maintained throughout our history. Only within the past year has its consistency been questioned or its validity challenged. A subtle effort was put forth in certain places to revive old animosities and to renew old suspicions. The right of each man to his preferences as well as to his political ideals and principles, is unquestioned. That right must always be maintained in a democracy such as ours. This does not imply the right to foster and promote an organized movement, based upon prejudice or denominational conceits. That we have the supreme right to judge men and parties by moral and ethical standards is generally conceded, but this does not mean the measuring of men and parties by their respective religious shibboleths or affiliations. Nothing could be more subversive of the principles laid down by the fathers of the Republic than such a course. It would mean ultimately to divide our people into rival groups and camps and to make of the Church a political machine. Such a tendency would inevitably lead to a situation fraught with grave perils to both Church and State. Whenever the Church, through organized effort, has attempted to direct and control political action, and thus departed from its specific spiritual functions, it has lost prestige and signally weakened its influence. Its place as the conserver of things ethical and spiritual is undisputed. It has to do with principles rather than policies. If it lowers its standards to become an autocratic dictator in the concerns of legislative action or the choice of political candidates, it loses the respect and confidence of right-thinking men. Not infrequently in recent years it has indulged in the discussion of matters economic and political and set forth conclusions that were unsound, uneconomic and unwarranted by the evidence submitted. The dictum of Washington, "no entangling alliances," may well serve the Church in this present critical hour. The page of history discloses the sad and tragic story of confusion and discord where Church and State have been in conflict. We are not unduly apprehensive that the stability or calm judgment of our people will be seriously disturbed by these sporadic demonstrations of misdirected zeal, our deepest concern is that, with vast bodies of our people, especially our youth, they may produce impressions that will affect reverence and respect for the Church as an institution. Our age is unwilling to see the Church involved in political debates and discussions, and those who indulge in such practices disqualify themselves as religious leaders. Unfortunately the chief sufferer in these matters is the Church itself.

That a political campaign should again revive the bitterness and contentions of party strife, and that, in certain quarters it should be made the occasion for harsh and ungenerous judgments, has shocked the sensibilities of the vast majority of our people. We cannot believe that this spirit is to prevail, nor can we believe that it represents the opinion of more than a bare minority of our people. Nevertheless it constitutes a solemn warning that must be heeded, else it may constitute a menace to those high ideals and purposes for which this great Republic stands. To higher ends must the Church address itself, if it is to hold its place of power and influence as the conserver of the noblest and best interests of the State and Nation. We are living in a new age of better understanding and kindlier judgments. The ties of fellowship are more closely knit and a better spirit is abroad. To halt the progress of this spirit or to seek to impair in any wise its growth is to do violence to the highest and best interests of life.

The maintenance of any organized system designed to coerce legislators or to dictate legislation, State or National, is utterly foreign to a right conception of the Church's function. We have condemned, and rightly so, the influence brought by organized lobbies to affect legislation in the interests of certain corporate bodies that are seeking a selfish advantage. It is equally reprehensible for the Church or any of its chosen agencies to use like methods.

Let us conspire to set forward the day of universal brotherhood through the practice of a charity that "doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, and thinketh no evil." This old Church of ours can have no finer distinction than that of the peacemaker, for "blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God."

Christian! dost thou see them
On the holy ground,
How the powers of darkness
Rage thy steps around?
Christian! up and smite them,
Counting gain but loss;
In the strength that cometh
By the holy cross.

Christian! dost thou feel them,
How they work within,
Striving, tempting, luring,
Goading into sin?
Christian! never tremble;
Never be downcast;
Gird thee for the battle,
Watch and pray and fast.

Christian! dost thou hear them,
How they speak thee fair?
"Always fast and vigil?
Always watch and prayer?"
Christian! answer boldly:
"While I breathe I pray!"
Peace shall follow battle,
Night shall end in day.

"Well I know thy trouble,
O My servant true;
Thou art very weary,
I was weary, too;
But that toil shall make thee
Some day all Mine own,
And the end of sorrow
Shall be near My throne."

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

"Folly is soon learned."

Perverted truth is the devil's mightiest weapon.

Incomparably more failures in life are due to a breakdown in character than to any other cause.

"We shall never acquire any great capacity for joy as long as we shrink from self-denial."

Safe to the hidden house of Thine abiding,
Carry the weak knees and the heart that faints,
Shield from the scorn and cover from the chiding,
Give the world joy, but patience to the saints.

O oft forsaken, oft denied,
Forgive our shame, wash out our sin;
Look on us from Thy Father's side,
And let that sweet Look win.

Hear when we call Thee from the deep,
Still walk beside us on the shore,
Give hands to work, and eyes to weep,
And hearts to love Thee more.
—Mrs. Alexander.

O perfect Love, outpassing sight,
O Light beyond our ken,
Come down through all the world tonight
And heal the hearts of men.

He said not
Thou shalt not be tempested:
Thou shalt not be travailed:
Thou shalt not be afflicted:
But He said
Thou shalt not be overcome.

Gently loosens He thy hold
Of the treasured former things—
Loves and joys that were of old
Shapes to which the spirit clings,
And alone, alone He stands,
Stretching forth beseeching Hands.

I believe that the little parable, peculiar to St. Mark about the seed growing secretly, is the truest picture of the growth of the healthy soul. It springs and grows, we know not how, first the blade then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear. It is no flash of feeling that is to create a soul anew; no agony of desire, no paroxysm of remorse, that is to transform a character.

A SURVEY FROM SEVENTY-ONE

(Reprinted from Roanoke Times, November 30, 1926.)

"While the evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh when thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them." So wrote, more than two thousand years ago, the dismal preacher whose text was "All is vanity" and who may be the model for the Gloomy Dean Inge, with his messages of despair, whom England recently has lent us. The description is of a foolish old man. Shakespeare gives us a glimpse of a sensible old man, enjoying "honor, love, obedience, troops of friends," and incidentally suggests a thought by comparison of an ageing man with the sere, the yellow leaf. Surely for the old there is a lesson in the Autumn leaves when their time to fall is near. The roses blooming in the balmy warmth and the caressing breath of June sunshine and zephyr do no more to glorify the landscape and make the world beautiful than do the leaves that take gorgeous hues from the chilling frost and gather splendor from the biting night winds of November. The leaves may not choose how they shall be at the last of their lingering lives. They must show as nature orders, brown, sombre and unlovely, or in brilliant and varied color, signalling from the darkest forest the triumph of departure. We humans may choose. The weakest, poorest, most sorely stricken, of us may determine what of good or ill we shall do and say, what cheer and comfort or discomfort and unhappiness we shall give to all within sight or hearing or reach of us, what memories we shall bequeath to live after us.

The special devils that come to us with the increasing years are the blue devils, grouped by the dictionary name of pessimism. Sir Walter Scott tells of the old men of the Highlands moralizing mournfully, more than two hundred years ago, of the decay of Scottish strength in modern day. In such lamentation there is neither sense nor truth. The Roanoke Times has honored me, as a former editor, with an invitation to use some of its space and once more say what I like in its editorial columns and I have chosen to preach a little from the standpoint of the seventy-one years Kindly Providence has allowed me. Individually, I might like to live another seventy-one because I do enjoy seeing the world and humanity become better, gradually, but surely, and great problems that long have troubled us worked out. As a general proposition, however, life would be badly cluttered up and hindered with a lot of hundred and forty years' old men and women, strangers to the new times, conditions and people and unable to do anything to further progress, just doddering and mumbling around. Too many of us, as it is, begin to obstruct and discourage from the time we reach fifty.

Men and women as they feel the first touches of age cease—if ever they have begun—to be honest and frank with themselves and to consider facts as they have been and are. They moan over the departed joys of youth, contrasting them with troubles present, forgetting that from first conscious childhood to maturity they really had as many griefs, anxieties and disappointments as they know now. The boy expecting a doubtful fight or whipping, the girl feeling a slight or deprived of something much craved, suffer as much as the grown man or woman fearing loss of job or investment, enduring a social eclipse or pinched by poverty. That is true for the great majority of us as individuals. As for the world generally, it surely is infinitely better and an infinitely better, safer and more pleasant place in which to live than it was when I was born, in 1856. Those of us who think otherwise either fail to read history or forget what we read. Humanity has advanced more in power, wisdom, in the general comfort and welfare, in the movement toward universal brotherhood, in the last seventy years than in the previous ten centuries.

Newspapers and preachers shout to us of the decay and decline of religion. Actual and recorded facts tell me religion is broader, sweeter, stronger, than it ever has been. Churches and denominations do not fight each other vindictively as they did sixty years ago. There is abundant room for improvement in that respect, for more attention to the commandments of God and the teachings of Christ and less to trivial points of doctrine or ritual; but the progress made is very swift compared with the centuries before when Protestants and Catholics, Presbyterians and Episcopalians were burning and hanging each other and Baptists and Quakers were whipped and sent to jail. The so-called free thinkers and atheists are blatant and noisy, as ever; but they are pitiful and harmless pygmies compared with Tom Paine and Strauss and the others who, more than a hundred years ago, wrote ponderous books against Christianity, made infidelity quite the fashion for the time and accomplished nothing but to deprive a few people of standards by which to live and hopes with which to die happily. We have at breakfast and supper our daily chronicles of immoralities, frivolities, follies, crimes, and shudder over them as evidence that the race is hastening to destruction. Read the Spectator, Pepys' Diary, intimate stories of the early life of this country, and learn that these things and the fears arising from them are old. The difference is that there are more of us now and the newspaper reporters, with wires reaching everywhere, thrust into the glare things that used to be hidden in neighborhoods. The fashions in dress over which some of us are so horrified are no whit worse than the "pull backs" and ball dresses of forty years ago. The lad with hair slicked back and Oxford trousers, or knickers, does not look half as silly as the fine courtiers and bucks of 1630 —"the good old times"—with love locks and the ruffles at their wrists, which we admire so much in pictures, or the same types of males in the vast periwigs of 1770. Kings now do not dare flaunt their mistresses in the face of society and make them duchesses. Favorite statesmen cannot get drunk and gamble in public, kill one another in duels and parade their vices, as they did almost within the memory of people yet living. The Bible continues the best seller. Millions of quiet, well behaved, well bred and God fearing people who never get themselves into print remain in the homes of the land, making a foundation for the churches, morality, religion and free and orderly government against which the gates of hell cannot prevail.

Seven great wars have been fought in my time, beginning with that in the Crimea, ending with the World War. Each has brought horror beyond imagination, death, agony and misery. Each has resulted in good, in new progress toward the banishment of old abuses, wrongs, burdens. Each has left the human race with more hope and new opportunity. In 1856 the telegraph and land and water travel by steam were almost in their infancy. Kentucky was the West and Chicago was the outpost of civilization, and unknown territory between it and the Pacific. I have seen the electricity as a driving and lighting power, the bicycle, typewriter, automobile, linotype, improved printing press, airship, moving picture, radio, wireless telegraphy —a thousand conveniences, discoveries, facilities for making life easier and more pleasant, for giving comfort and greater productive capacity and lightening the toil of the masses of the people—begin as experiments, go into general use and become the commonplaces of daily life. In my time disease and plagues which had been accepted since the beginning of history as incurable and unavoidable scourges, taking periodical toll of life and causing more destruction than war, have been conquered by science. Young people of now cannot understand life as it was even fifty years ago or imagine how people existed without what now have become necessities. My belief is that the people of, say, 1976, will wonder how we endured life with what we have, so little and crude compared with what they will have, how we lived through the troubles, afflictions, defects and vices from which they will be exempt.

In the last seventy years problems which had baffled thought through ages have been solved. In this country the slavery and sectional questions which had threatened the life of the nation since its creation have been put behind us. The regularly recurrent financial panics which were continuing nightmares through more than a hundred years have been abolished. The long dreamed of short and safe passage from the Atlantic to the Pacific is a fact. The relations of capital and labor, another age old trouble, seems near solution. The next big problem, and the most pressing, is relief of the farmer from obstacles to his prosperity arising from causes much like those which used to perplex and dismay the business and laboring classes. It looks now as if the one hope is in farmer organization. Difficult as that looks, it is no more difficult than labor organization was. It is helped vastly by the telephone and automobile. It can, and should, be helped further and powerfully by the cordial, patient, tireless cooperation of those in the towns and cities who have sense and vision to realize that the basis and vitaiizing impulse of the country's growth and development in wealth and strength are the well being and contentment of the great original producing class. In my time this country has grown from a raw and dubious experiment, poised at the edge of dissolution, to be the acknowledged mightiest and most stable power on the earth. Study of the past teaches me to believe that it will go right on, adjusting its own affairs by common sense and justice, leading the Nations to peace and righteousness.

Roanoke has come into existence and grown from nothing to lusty power and importance within my time. When The Roanoke Times was born I was managing a newspaper of my own, hundreds of miles away. I am indebted to the city and its people and The Times for five pleasant years here. My very hearty congratulations go to The Times on its fortieth birthday, reached in sound health and with honorable place in the country's journalism. My very earnest hope is that long after the hand that writes these lines—that has written so many, many lines, varying from fairly good to intensely bad—has ceased from writing anything both city and newspaper will be flourishing and growing and enjoying the prosperity I know they will deserve.

And so ends the sermon, for opportunity to preach which I tender more thanks.

RADICAL SELF-ADVERTISERS ADOPT NEW STUNT.

"87 Ministers Decry Protest to Soviet."

"Group Including Fosdick, Coffin, Holmes and Schulman Urges Creating Research Board."

Shakespeare says opportunely: "In religion, what damned error, but some sober brow will bless it and approve it with a text."

"While denouncing 'the intolerance which induces the Soviet Government to prohibit the free exercise of religion,' eighty-seven ministers, including several prominent representatives of the Church, in a signed statement yesterday dissociated themselves from the recent Church protests against the religious persecutions in Russia. They urged the creation of a commission of research to formulate a program for discussion and action.

"Those who signed the statement, which was prepared by the executive committee of the Conference of Younger Churchmen, declared that they refused to associate themselves with the general protests because the protests have failed to strike a proper 'note of humility' and take cognizance of the historical and social background behind the anti-religious policy of the Soviet Government.

"Among the signers are the Rev. Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick, the Rev. Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin, the Rev. Dr. Reinhold Niebuhr, the Rev. Dr. Edmund B. Chaffee, John Haynes Holmes, Rabbi Samuel Schulman and Rabbi Jonah B. Wise.

"The committee, which prepared the statement, is headed by the Rev. Russell J. Clinchy, associate minister of the Broadway Tabernacle and secretary of the Conference of Younger Churchmen.

"Officials of the American Jewish Congress, with offices at 33 West Forty-second Street, announced yesterday that preparations were going forward in virtually every Jewish community in the country for mass demonstrations on March 16, proclaimed as a national Jewish day of protest" against the present barbarism of the Russian Soviet and communist officials and tyrants, constituting themselves officials of Russia through a policy of murder, burglary and pillage of the most ruthless kind ever known to mankind.

"New York, it was announced, will lead the country with a mass demonstration at Town Hall. Speakers of all denominations will address the meeting.

"The announcement declared that 'responses received daily at the offices of the American Jewish Congress indicate that March 16 will see one of the most formidable outpourings in the history of the Jewish community'."

In the opinion of the Southern Churchman, the world would be better off if the New York clique of Messrs. Karl Reiland, Fosdick, Coffin, Holmes, Russell Bowie, Norwood, and other such would lead a back-to-the-farm-movement, and earn their living by the sweat of their brows, instead of spending part of their time in formulating sonorous phrases that are elaborately useless and ingeniously unprofitable, and at times misleading. They remind us of that reference to the centipede:

"Who was happy quite
Until the toad for fun.
Said: Pray, which foot goes after which?
This raised his mind to such a pitch
That he lay distracted in a ditch,
Forgetting how to run."

THE ADVANCE WORK PROGRAM---1929-1931

Authorized by General Convention

"The way is clear—go forward."—Charles Palmerston Anderson.

"Shall your brethren go to war, and shall ye sit here?"—Numbers 32:6.

WITH the announcement of its Advance Work Program; a Program that is possible, practicable, reasonable—the Church prepares to "Go Forward."

Advance Work is new work, not maintenance. In the Advance Work Program, there is provision for new church buildings, parish houses, hospitals, student centers, rectories, mission buildings, land, equipment, dormitories and schools, as well as such miscellaneous necessities as a water system, a heating plant and a motor launch for the use of a missionary Bishop and his helpers.

This very considerable amount of new equipment in all mission fields, domestic and foreign, will provide adequate tools by which our workers may produce maximum results. Such provision will, in addition, bring to the missionaries new spirit, improved morale and freshened enthusiasm. For long their efforts have been handicapped by lack of such material aid; now they will realize that the Church at home is really with them and that there is a real acceptance of the commission to Go Forward.

The present Advance Work Program is the result of very deliberate and careful planning and of an experience of many years. Prior to 1920, when the National Council was organized and a unified budget adopted, the new buildings needed for mission fields, were obtained through personal appeals by the interested Bishops or other missionaries. Consequently several fields were developed, not in proportion to their respective needs, but in proportion to the ability of their representatives in raising money and to the number of their friends. The whole Church has now taken over the task of providing such equipment, and by action of its General Convention and its National Council has adopted a Program covering every field.

In the period from 1920 to 1928 the Church had before it a statement of the needs for new equipment, but the gifts of the Church were far below the amount needed. The total amount received during these nine years was only $1,536,677.66, as against approved needs of $12,900,000. This inadequate response was due chiefly to a lack of organized effort throughout the whole Church at a specific time and also to the fact that the dioceses did not seem to feel a deep sense of responsibility for their share in the undertaking. Now every diocese, every parish and every individual has the opportunity to make an adequate response as an expression of their desire to Go Forward in the Lord's business.

The present Program is the direct outcome of action taken by General Convention of 1928, in adopting a specific plan for providing these new buildings and equipment. The first step in this plan was the appointment of a committee to select from the needs presented by the Bishops of the Church and others, the projects most deserving and most needed at this time. The committee was as follows:

The Rt. Rev. Philip Cook, D. D.
The Rt. Rev. W. L. Rogers, D. D.
The Rev. Frank H. Nelson, D. D.
The Rev. Oliver J. Hart, D. D.
Mr. E. Edwin Michael.
Mr. Charles B. Warren.
Mr. Whiteford R. Cole.
Mr. J. Nicholas Brown.

To cooperate with this committee the President of our National Council appointed the following committee:

The Rt. Rev. H. St. George Tucker, D. D.
The Rev. George Craig Stewart, D. D.
Mr. William G. Peterkin.

These committees then secured from the Bishops of dioceses and missionary districts throughout the Church, information as to their most urgent needs for new buildings and equipment. The mass of information thus received was studied with most painstaking thoroughness. The askings submitted to the committees amounted to $3,848,000. From this a total of $1,530,000 was selected as being the most vital and immediate needs.

While reluctant to omit such a large amount of new work from the Program, the committees and the Council felt that the total should be one well within the ability of the Church to meet during this triennium.

The list of projects includes askings from fourteen dioceses, fifteen continental missionary districts, and all the extra-continental, Latin-American and Foreign districts. It is important to note that the Program as presented conforms with the original resolution of General Convention, to the effect that stress be placed on strategic points in the domestic field. Of the entire program $399,100 is for work in domestic dioceses and missionary districts, and $548,900 for the American Church Institute for Negroes and extra-continental districts, a total of $948,000 to be expended in work under the American flag, against $582,000 to be expended in foreign fields.

The advance Work Program as finally revised and approved includes approximately 170 separate and definite projects of much-needed work, ranging from an item of $70,000 for new buildings and equipment for St. Luke's Hospital, Shanghai, China, down to $200 for land and outstations among the Tirurai, at Upi in the Philipipine Islands.

The decision was then reached that this Program should be presented to the Church early in 1930 with an effort to conclude the endeavor during the Epiphany season of 1931.

There is to be no assignment of quotas to dioceses, but each diocese is to be requested to undertake certain definite projects of the Program, and to hold itself responsible for their completion by the end of the Epiphany season, 1931. Doubtless dioceses, after accepting their groups of projects, will ask parishes, missions and individuals to undertake, in like manner, the completion of definite pieces of work within the time designated. Many opportunities are offered for memorial gifts by parishes or individuals.

Our National Council, through its Field Department, will be prepared to submit suggestions for promoting the Advance Work Program, as well as detailed information concerning each project, in order that the people of the Church may be thoroughly informed. Thus the people will be able to visualize their accepted projects in terms of bricks, mortar, tile, plumbing and the other physical constituents making up each complete structure.

The Church has responded, always, to appeals for definite things in its missionary enterprise. The Advance Work Program affords the opportunity of supplying actual, tangible equipment—tools—for the promotion of the Church's mission in all the fields in which she is at work.

The needs are real needs, vitally affecting the work. They have the authority of General Convention behind them. Any of them may be investigated by interested persons. They are offered to the Church as opportunities to Go Forward; opportunities, not onerous tasks. It is believed that as dioceses accept their projects, this unified effort to advance the world work of Christ's Church will result not only in new life in the mission field, but in a revival of interest and consecration in every parish and mission at home. This is Evangelism—the will to work for the extension of Christ's Kingdom throughout the whole world.

BIBLE QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

(Our readers are invited to send in their questions from time to time concerning Scriptural subjects in which they are perplexed or desire light. Our limited space necessitates brevity in questions, as well as in the answers which we will endeavor to maintain in strict accord with the Word of the Lord, which, after all, settles all argument. This column is therefore not for controversy, but for a testimony.)

Question No. 32.—Our Saviour said, "Love your enemies," and His last command was, "Do this in remembrance of me"; Suppose one cannot obey the first, must both be disregarded?—L. H., Texas.

Answer.—Your first quotation having apparently been taken from the Sermon on the Mount, it is well to remember that our Lord having announced the Kingdom of Heaven as "at hand", He as King, proceeded to announce (in Matt. 5 to 7) the principles of that Kingdom, but as we now know His Kingship was rejected and His reign upon Earth delayed until His return in great power at the end of this present "Church Age."

There is a beautiful moral application, however, to the present-day Christian and these same principles appear in a fundamental way in the teaching of the epistles. Try out the practice taught in Rom. 12:20, and Eph. 4:32 for example and note the result.

If all remained away from the Lord's remembrance table through failure to observe one or more of His commands, in full or in part, we fear there would be no one left to maintain this loving and important testimony; for how many today, for instance, "love their neighbor as themself?"

We will love our enemies, however, in proportion to the manner in which we live the surrendered life, as, after all, it is "Christ in us" that does the loving, and not the old nature, which will remain with us until we surrender these houses of our earthly pilgrimage. See Gal. 2:20 and Gal. 5:19 to 24.

In other words, our testimony at the Lord's table is "What He did for us"—not what we have done.

WE BELIEVE THAT THOU SHALT COME

By Kenneth Mackenzie

XXII.

THE restoration of the land to the covenant people is ever embellished with the promises of joyous fulfilment of every cherished hope. The wailing wall in Jerusalem, now denied the Jews by the vindictive Arabs, is at present the only spot they can call their own. Here they would pour out their agonizing souls in penitence and woe. In the glorious age of which we are treating, God will accomplish His intention in Isa. 25:8, "The Lord God will wipe tears from off all faces and the rebuke of his people shall he take away from off all the earth."

We have already noted that Jerusalem is to be "the joy of the whole earth" (Ps. 48:2). And this betokens the Universality of Joy and Gladness.

When the aged Simeon took the infant Jesus into his arms he premised the office of the child in being "a light to lighten the Gentiles and to be the glory of thy people Israel" (Luke 2:32). This association of child life with the bestowment of ecstacy is borne out in the anticipations of the prophetical era. The Psalmist foresees the saving of "the children of the needy" (Ps. 72:4); "a little child shall lead them" (Isa. 11:8) and "the streets of Jerusalem shall be full of boys and girls playing" (Zech. 8:5).
